It was ordered that the amendments be engrossed and the bill read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended so as to read: "An act to amend sections 3946, 3951, and 3954 of the Revised Statutes."

ELISHA E. RICE.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senate to take up for consideration the bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice. It will take, I think, but very little time. If it were to take time, I should not urge it upon the attention of the Senate.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments, in line 7 to strike out "59" and insert "41" before "cents;" to strike out the word "coin" after "cents;" and at the end of the bill, in lines 11 and 12, to strike out the words "with interest at 6 per cent. per annum;" so as to make the bill read:

That the accounting officers of the Treasury be, and they are hereby, authorized to allow and pay to E. E. Rice, late United States consul at Hakodadi, Japan, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $585.59, (coin,) being 10 per cent. of his salary as consul at said port from July 1, 1869, to November 3, 1871, that being the usual allowance for rent of that consulate.

The amendments were agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

GILDEROY M. HARDY.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy, guardian of the minor children of Watson C. Howard, deceased.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to direct the pension agent at Indianapolis, Indiana, to issue duplicate check No. 103634, for $1,403.87, in favor of Gilderoy M. Hardy, guardian of the minor children of Watson C. Howard, deceased, for one lost on August 7, 1875, if the Secretary of the Interior be satisfied that the same has not been paid.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with amendments.

The first amendment of the committee was in lines 8 and 9, to strike out "guardian of the minor children of Watson C. Howard, deceased," and to insert "in the place of."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to add to the bill:

And provided further, That the said Hardy shall first execute a bond, to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in due form, to save the United States harmless against any loss or injury by reason of such duplicate check or payment of the original.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It ought to provide for sureties to the bond.

Mr. WRIGHT. The Secretary of the Interior is to approve of the bond.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He is only required to see that it is in due form.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am willing to have any amendment the Senator wants put to the bill, but the provision is precisely as with every bill of the kind that has passed, as far as I remember.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to submit in all seriousness to my friend from Iowa that I think he is mistaken when he says we pass bills of this character requiring only a bond from the party himself and without saying even in that case that the bond shall, in the judgment of the Secretary, be pecuniarily sufficient. This bill provides, hearing it read once, that the bond shall be in due form and shall be approved by the Secretary in that sense. What I think all such bills provide is that the bonds shall be with sufficient surety, satisfactory to the Secretary who issues the duplicate check.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no objection in the world to having the bill amended in any respect the Senator may ask touching that matter. I think the bill conforms in every particular with bills we have passed heretofore; but I shall not object to any amendment. I only ask that this bill be passed, and with all guards that are necessary, for the reason that is a case of extreme hardship. The Department would issue this check but for the fact that the law provides that no duplicate checks shall be issued for an amount exceeding $1,000. This happens to exceed that amount, and for that reason alone they have declined to issue it. If it is not sufficiently guarded I am quite willing that it shall be amended in every respect.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can the Senator refer to the present statute about the extent to which duplicates may be issued?

Mr. WRIGHT. If the Clerk will be good enough to send me the report and the papers I will refer to it. The law is copied in the papers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us find the law.

Mr. WRIGHT. The law is the act of February 2, 1872. I have a copy of the law here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is in the Revised Statutes, I suppose, is it not?

Mr. HOWE. While the Senators are looking up the statutes——

Mr. WRIGHT. Here is the statute; it is here.

Mr. HOWE. I ask them to allow me to call up Senate bill No. 892.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us do one thing at a time, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects to the request of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Here is the law. We have got it right here. We will not delay my friend from Wisconsin more than a moment, and my friend from Iowa will see, I think, that he is not correct when he says that the bill as it now stands follows the present state of the law. I will pass over all that part of it not necessary and read:

> Upon notice and proof of the loss of the original checks, under such regulations in regard to their issue and payment, and upon the execution of such bonds, with sureties, to indemnify the United States, as the Secretary of the Treasury shall prescribe.

So that my friend will perceive that the statute, which he wishes now to supplement because it does not apply to this case, itself requires that these bonds shall be with sureties. I do not object to the bill being considered, but I only make the suggestion to my friend. I hope he will not think I am exacting in the matter.

Mr. WRIGHT. Will the Secretary read the bill?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read the bill, as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. After the word "bond" I suggest to insert "with sufficient sureties."

Mr. WRIGHT. Insert "with sureties" after "approved."

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will do.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. The original check was in the name of Hardy, not as guardian. The bill as introduced provided for the issue of the check to him as guardian. We now omit all reference to a guardian, and the title ought to be changed in that respect. I move to amend the title by striking out "guardian of the minor children of Watson C. Howard, deceased."

The motion was agreed to; and the title was amended so as to read: "An act for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy."

DANIEL WORMER.

Mr. CONKLING. The other day a bill was partially considered, and at the request of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. WRIGHT] recommitted to the Committee on Claims. It was reported back, and I ask that it may now be acted upon. It went to the committee for a particular reason stated. The committee has reported and adheres to its former report. I do not mean to struggle with that report, but I ask that so much as the committee has allowed this man shall now be put in the form of a statute.

By unanimous consent the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 1808) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York, $3,500, in full compensation for expenses incurred in carrying out a contract with the United States to furnish twelve hundred cavalry horses.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Claims with an amendment in line 6, to strike out "$3,500" and insert "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Can we hear the report read?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Secretary commenced to read the report submitted by Mr. COCKRELL from the Committee on Claims on the 3d of April.

Mr. CONKLING. If I can have the attention of the Senator from Vermont I want to make a suggestion. I think this report pretty clearly shows that this man has been very economically dealt with by the committee. It is a long report; and the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. COCKRELL,] who is here, is very familiar with this case. I think it quite likely that he can make a statement which, although it would not be sufficient for my convenience, might be for that of the rest of the Senate, and thus we might dispense with the reading of the report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That will be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. COCKRELL. When the contract was made for the delivery of these horses, the contract was very specific and required them to be delivered in a certain way and at a certain place. Mr. Wormer undertook the contract, and after the execution of the contract, and after he had made the preparations and expended this amount of money, and probably a greater amount, in carrying the contract into effect, a new order was issued by the Inspector-General's Department requiring an entirely different mode of inspection; and under this mode of inspection all the contractors throughout the whole country refused to deliver their horses. They were to be branded, and the brand would ruin the value of the horses in the market if they were rejected. That was something that had never been required before. When the Government found that no horses would be delivered under that order, the order was rescinded and changed. Mr. Wormer claims that he expended larger sums of money than this, and he did expend probably between $4,000 and $5,000. He was allowed $3,500 by the House bill. Our committee cut it down to $2,000, on the ground that a portion of the amounts that he had expended, for example $500 or $800, was for interest on money which he had borrowed to pay for horses. We thought that that was not legitimate, as it was his duty to furnish the money, and we therefore reduced the allowance to $2,000 as the lowest estimate of the amount which he had expended in getting the horses ready for delivery under the contract.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He did not deliver them in fact.

Mr. COCKRELL. He did not deliver them in fact.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, at the cost of a moment of the Senate's time I rise to say a word. Although I shall not resist this amendment, I mean no offense when I say that I was greatly surprised after what took place here on the occasion of the recommittal of the bill that it came back with the amendment which is now presented to us; and I feel bound to say that not only according to the statement of this claimant but according to the statement of other people, reputable people, people deserving credit who knew these facts, this bill when passed at the amount stated in the amendment will leave this man the loser of a large sum of money which he actually paid in the performance of this contract, which in substance was disregarded and violated by the other contracting party.

I do not feel it my duty at this stage of the session, and against the report of the committee, to make any resistance to the amendment, believing that I rather consult the interest of this man who feels greatly afflicted and very injuriously treated, by allowing the bill to pass as amended. But I feel bound to say, in deference to the judgment of a number of constituents of mine, familiar with this transaction, that in their opinion—I of course have no personal knowledge of the facts myself—this man will be the victim of a serious and as they think unjustifiable injury.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to state in connection with the amendment, that in the first affidavit which was taken of Mr. Wormer, he stated his expenses at $2,000 and over; it was upon that statement that the committee placed that amount.

Mr. CONKLING. When he came to itemize he always showed items amounting to more.

Mr. COCKRELL. But afterward he produced in evidence new amounts which he said were not embraced in the items composing the $2,000; but the committee adhere to his first statement in the matter.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH ASIA.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate bill 892.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 11, to strike out the name of "G. G. Garibaldi" from the list of persons authorized to lay cables.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out sections 2 and 3, in the following words:

> SEC. 2. That in order to encourage and aid in the construction and laying of said line or lines of telegraph, the Secretary of the Navy is hereby directed to detail, for the surveys and soundings on and along that portion of the Pacific coast in America and Asia where it is proposed to establish said telegraph cable or cables, one or more steam-vessels, to be at the disposal of said company, to assist in surveys and soundings, laying down and submerging of cable or cables, transporting of materials connected therewith, and generally to afford any assistance calculated to promote the success of the enterprise.
> SEC. 3. That the Government of the United States shall at all times have priority in the use of the line or lines of said company for all diplomatic and Government business, and in order to secure the same from injury by evil-disposed persons, to the interruption of public business, the Secretaries of War and Navy are authorized to direct the commanders of military and naval districts or stations, traversed or occupied by the stations or lines of telegraph, cable or cables, belonging to said company, and other officers acting under the authority of the United States, to use any force at their command to protect the same. Said lines or cables shall be open at all times to the public, and to any other company, upon the payment of the regular charges for the transmission of dispatches, excepting when in use by the Government of the United States.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

> SEC. 2. That any telegraph line or cable laid by said company shall be subject to the following conditions, stipulations, and reservations, to wit: The Government of the United States shall be entitled to exercise and enjoy the same or similar privileges with regard to the control and use of such line or lines or cable or cables that may, by law, agreement, or otherwise, be exercised and enjoyed by any foreign government whatever; secondly, citizens of the United States shall enjoy the same privileges as to the payment of rates for the transmission of messages as are enjoyed by the citizens of the most favored nations; thirdly, the transmission of dispatches shall be made in the following order: first, dispatches of state, under such regulations as may be agreed upon by the governments interested; secondly, dispatches on telegraphic service; and, thirdly, private dispatches; fourthly, the lines of any such cables shall be kept open to the public for the daily transmission of market and commercial reports and intelligence, and all messages, dispatches, and communications shall be forwarded in the order in which they are received, except as hereinbefore provided; fifthly, before extending and establishing any such line or lines or cable or cables in or over any waters, reefs, islands, shores, and lands within the jurisdiction of the United States, a written acceptance of the terms and conditions imposed by this act shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State by the said company.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to amend the amendment by adding a section to it:

That the right to alter, amend, or repeal this act at all times is hereby reserved to Congress.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I do not know that there is any objection, except one of principle, to be urged to that amendment. I think in principle the amendment is bad. I think when the Government enters into a contract with a party it ought to make some specific terms, and be bound by those terms, and stand by them; but to enter into a contract and hold one party only bound, with the other at liberty to make a new contract whenever it pleases, I do not think is right. Time is of the essence of this legislation. I do not know whether the friends of the bill will object to that or not or whether it would be any discouragement in the way of investing capital. I would not invest a dollar of capital in any company on these conditions.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg leave to differ with my honorable friend from Wisconsin on the subject of the principle of this proposition. The United States, in the first place, are not entering into a contract; they are granting a privilege, a monopoly.

Mr. HOWE. Not a monopoly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, a monopoly; I repeat, Mr. President, a monopoly in respect of this particular transaction. I do not mean by that to say that Congress would not have the right to grant a similar privilege to some other association of persons to land a cable at some other place, and so on; but in its essential characteristic it is granting a privilege by public authority to these persons firstly for their private profit, and secondly for the general benefit of the public, just as we grant a right to a railroad corporation.

Now, I submit that in no just sense are the United States contractors or entering into stipulations. They are the trustees of the public welfare; and in such an amendment as I propose these trustees, the supreme tribunal of the land, reserve to themselves the authority to protect private rights by exercising the power of complete visitation over the grantees of this privilege or monopoly. That is the principle upon which it stands, if I am correct in my ideas.

I do not believe that Congress or any State ought ever to grant privileges of this character, or any other character analogous to these, without reserving to the supreme power—not the other side of a contract as between private parties, but to the supreme and independent tribunal of the people, bound to guard their interest and to do justice—the right to protect their interests and to see that justice is done by a provision of this character.

Mr. SARGENT. That which is asked to be done by the Government in favor of this company is but very slight. They have the simple privilege of landing on our shores. If the cable is built it will be by an American company, and will be the only opposition in the world to the English monopoly which now is a great inconvenience to the people of the United States. I presume, however, if this amendment were adopted the Government would exercise a reasonable discretion in using any power which was reserved under it. Of course it cannot be expected that private individuals will put their money into an enterprise of this kind (their own money, asking none of the Government) to the extent of some millions, which will be necessary in order to complete this cable, provided they are to be the sport of congressional caprice, provided there is to be no permanency in their ability to protect their investment and reap some reward from it. Congress, however, is a reasonable body. That is my experience of it on the average; and my impression is that the persons who are named in this bill and are authorized to land this cable would believe that Congress would not lightly confiscate their rights or take them away under any pretense that was not founded in solid reason. For that reason, I think, although with some hesitation, that perhaps we may be able to go on and have this opposition company organized and an American telegraph line across the Pacific. I would suggest to the Senator having charge of the bill that under all the circumstances it may be better to let the amendment go upon the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATON BIILL.

Mr. WEST. I desire now to call up for action the report of the conference committee on the post-office appropriation bill. It is printed and on members' desks, and I am in hopes we can get an agreement upon it by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear the report explained. I hope the Senator from Louisiana will be kind enough to state the points.

Mr. WEST. This report involves some forty-seven amendments. If the Senator will indicate to me on what particular point he desires an explanation I shall be happy to give him the information, such as I have.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My chief point is so far as legislation, as we call it, comes in, wherein we have changed the laws by this bill.

Mr. WEST. Well, sir, first in connection with the transportation of the mails by railroad the conference report agrees upon a reduction of the rates hitherto paid of 10 per cent., and provides for the appointment of a commission, the appointment to be made by the President of the United States, to examine into that subject and make report at the commencement of the next session as the basis of future legislative action in that regard.

The next point of legislation is as to the provisions of this bill as affecting the compensation of postmasters throughout the country, being a reduction of the amount paid at large of about $500,000 per annum. The particular features of that reduction are embraced in the bill itself, limiting the amount of compensation to any postmaster at $4,000 as heretofore, excepting the city of New York, and reducing what are known as the medium offices, which have hitherto had attached to them the same amount of compensation as the first class, namely, $4,000 a year, to $3,000, and making various changes in the same way looking to a reduction of the specific amounts paid.

Then the legislation on third-class matter is embraced on the thirty-eighth page of the print now before the Senate. It changes the present law to the extent of admitting transient newspapers and magazines, regular publications designed for advertising purposes, &c., and all printed matter of the third class, except unsealed circulars, to be transmitted in the mails at the rate of one cent for every two ounces or fractional part thereof.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that increase or diminish the rate?

Mr. WEST. That diminishes the rate. The present rate is one cent an ounce. This increases the rate, however, on unsealed circulars, and makes other provisions looking to facilitation of the transmission of printed matter through the mail, and continues the rate of one cent per ounce on all merchandise, as it is now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Will the Senator kindly tell me whether these changes were introduced on the part of the Senate in the Senate amendments to the bill, or were they in the original bill in some form?

Mr. WEST. All the legislative provisions of this bill, I think, or very nearly all, were stricken out by the Senate Committee on Appropriations, and their action was sustained by the Senate; but that action was more with a view to a conference between the two Houses in the hope that an agreement on legislative provisions that might be beneficial to the service would be arrived at, and such conclusions have been arrived at, and the report as submitted meets with the approbation, as I understand, of the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, as represented by their chairman in the committee of conference.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We have been trying all the session and at former sessions to keep legislation out of appropriation bills; but now we seem to have got it to quite an extensive degree agreed upon. While I am not prepared to say whether in my opinion the changes made are wise or not, I want to put in as one member of the Senate as vigorous a protest as I can without taking up any time to do otherwise than state it against this method of legislation. If we legislate indefinitely in an appropriation bill about the Post-Office, it may well be said "why should we not do it in every other appropriation bill;" and the result is, as we have all seen at this session, to draw us into endless discussions of matters that the appropriation committee per se has not the time to attend to and to get us into continual trouble and difficulty in respect of amending the laws as well as breaking down the appropriations as they now stand between the two Houses. I suppose it is totally useless to vote against this report on this ground, but for one I wish to put in a humble but very respectful protest against it.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to ask the Senator who has charge of this bill whether or not the provision as to postage on transient newspapers, magazines, &c., is in substance the same as passed by the Senate in a bill coming from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads?

Mr. WEST. It is the same recommendation as was made by the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads of the Senate, with such enlargements and amendments as have been in the mean time discovered to be advisable.

Mr. DAVIS. One question further. I understand that it does not affect the present status of newspapers as to circulation within the counties of their publication.

Mr. WEST. It makes no reference to that, and does not touch that in any respect whatever.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, I think it appropriate that I should make a statement in relation to the question of third-class matter, because I notice in almost every paper that has come under my observation a very great mistake in relation to what are the provisions of this bill. It is known that the Senate one year ago increased the rate of postage on third-class matter from one cent for two ounces to one cent an ounce. It is also known that at this session the House of Representatives passed a bill repealing that clause which made the increase and sent it to the Senate. The Senate considered it, and in a revised bill adhered substantially to the old rate of one cent per ounce, with some additional things, sending however transient newspapers and magazines at a little lower rate than the old law. The House incorporated into this appropriation bill the same provision repealing the amendment of last year increasing the rate of postage on third-class matter. That was the manner in which it came before the committee of conference.

Now, as the bill stands we allow transient newspapers and magazines and all printed matter named in the third class, nothing else, to go at the reduced rates, leaving everything else in the third class, photographs, envelopes, music-sheets, &c., and merchandise of all kinds, bulbs, cuttings, and roots, and leaving the great amount of third-class matter at one cent an ounce, precisely as we established it in the amendment of last year and as we again re-affirmed in the bill of the Senate this year, and allowing the printed matter in the third class to be reduced, thereby slightly reducing the revenue. We have added, however, to that provision papers published primarily for advertising, not newspapers, not such as we understand newspapers to be, for giving intelligence and educating the public, but newspapers that go out in a large sheet with a half-dozen circulars upon them, just as one merchant sends out his individual circular on one sheet, and yet it is called a newspaper, and it is so printed, for the sole purpose of avoiding the revenue. Now, we put that sheet and the sheet that is gratuitously circulated or circulated for mere nominal rates at one cent for two ounces, and make it pay just what the man who sends his circular pays—the same rate; not two cents a pound, as the newspapers pay, but eight cents. Thereby we shall increase the revenues on third-class matter, I think, about as much as we reduce them by letting the printed matter go in at half the old rates.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not know that I shall engage at all in the discussion of the merits of the conference report in this case, because I am not sufficiently familiar with it to do so, but I desire to take this occasion rather in the nature of a personal explanation than otherwise, to correct a misunderstanding, to say the least, of positions taken by me when a member of the House of Representatives as to amendments to appropriation bills.

As I understand, the House of Representatives during the present session, has undertaken on appropriation bills to change existing laws, and to say to us that unless we assent to such changes they would not make the appropriations required by existing laws. This is, as I understand, the position taken by the House, and stated to us by our honored chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe is stated also by leading members of the House as the position of the House of Representatives; that is, that they will by amendments to appropriation bills propose changes to long-existing laws which have been sanctioned not only by the approval of the President of the United States and by both Houses of Congress, but by twenty years' time, and unless we will agree to change such laws, they will not appropriate money for the pay of the President of the United States, the judges of the courts of the United States, the Congress of the United States, or for the ordinary and vital operations of the Government, and it has been said that I have at some time in my past history occupied such a position.

I wish now in this presence and everywhere to disclaim that I ever held or could have held such a position. Such a position is revolutionary, utterly so. It would destroy this Government whenever asserted and held to by either House. To hold such a position would be foreign to my nature, foreign to my convictions; it would make me a partisan utterly reckless of the fundamental principles of a free government administered by separate departments and by a Congress composed of two independent bodies. I never did and never could maintain such a position.

Now, Mr. President, I shall very briefly call attention to what was said and done in regard to this matter, and show the position that has been taken by the House of Representatives on this question. At three different periods while I was a member the power of either House to make amendments has been brought prominently before the Congress of the United States. In 1856, the House of Representatives attached to the Army appropriation bill this clause substantially: "No portion of the money hereby appropriated shall be expended to enfore the so-called laws of the Kansas territorial Legislature." The question came up in the Senate of the United States whether this was a proper amendment. I will say now, after an examination of the debate in both Houses, that no member in either House claimed that either House could attach an amendment changing a specific law and compel the other House to assent to it. No such claim as that was asserted. The claim now made was not then conceived of by any one; but it was insisted that these so-called laws of Kansas were not laws, and that the House of Representatives might therefore say, not that the Army should not be used to enforce the laws of Congress, but that it should not be used to enforce enactments of a territorial Legislative Assembly which were denounced by the House of Representatives as revolutionary, null, and void; in other words, that the Army should not be used to subvert the law. Such was the ground upon which the House of Representatives placed its action. That amendment came here and was the subject of a learned discussion, a very able discussion, and I will now ask the Secretary to read and I will call the attention of my democratic friends especially——

Mr. MORTON. I do not desire to disturb my friend from Ohio in his remarks, but for one I will not consent to have the regular order superseded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not want to interfere with the Pinchback matter. I am ready to go on now and finish my statement.

Mr. SARGENT. I suppose it will not take long to finish this report. This is a very important report.

Mr. SHERMAN. I was going to say that I did not want to interfere with the Pinchback resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Indiana yield?

Mr. MORTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WEST. I do not wish to occupy the position of interfering with the regular order; but I want to understand from the Chair whether there is anything that can take precedence over a conference report on an appropriation bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The regular order can.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business takes precedence.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator from Indiana calls for the regular order to displace this bill, he can do so.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business takes priority; but the Senator from Indiana has waived it.

Mr. MORTON. Only for the present.

Mr. SHERMAN. I take it the conference report will not occupy long. Now I ask the Clerk to read so that every Senator can hear what Mr. Hunter said in 1856, as chairman of the Committee on Finance, having charge of the appropriation bills, as to that amendment of the House of Representatives which I have stated to the Army bill of that year.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

> Now, sir, what I said was, when either House sought to make the appropriation bill the means of forcing on another a measure which was obnoxious to it, in either alternative it was revolution in itself, that is to say, a change of constitution; for it forced the other House to yield its constitutional privileges in order to get the Government along. It would be revolutionary if they failed to be coerced in this way, and stopped the wheels of the Government to compel them to do it; because it is their constitutional duty to carry on this Government, and respect the constitutional privileges of the other branch. I know votes can be brought up in which I have voted for legislative measures on the appropriation bills. I have always believed that it was irregular, that it was improper; but I have never advocated the doctrine of voting for it in one House when known to be obnoxious to the other. But even in regard to the tariff amendment of last year, it will be found by referring to the debate, that I admitted then, that if it was obnoxious to either House the other had no right to insist; and consequently, when the Senate, out of abundant caution, struck it out—against my vote I admit, but struck it out in reference to some such contingency as this—the House acceded to it, and admitted the propriety of doing so. I only urged it upon the ground that it was agreeable to the House, where it passed almost without reference to party. If it were agreeable to the Senate, too, and agreeable to all sides, I should not say there was anything revolutionary or improper in the act. But what is revolutionary, and what is improper, in my estimation, is for one House to attempt to use the appropriation bills to force on the other legislation which is obnoxious to it, to make it give up its will, its views of propriety, its feeling of what is right.

> To prove his position he reads authorities going to show that the House have no right to tack an entirely distinct subject-matter to an appropriation bill. If this proviso had no connection with the subject-matter of the bill I might grant his position. It might be factious to a certain extent; but the proposition which I maintain is that the provision to which the Committee on Finance objects and proposes to strike out is strictly germane to the subject-matter of the bill. It is in regard to the employment of that very Army for the support of which we are providing in the bill under discussion at the present time. What I contended for was that the subjects were of entire relevancy and intimately connected with each other; that there was no other mode in which the power which raises and grants money could protect itself, unless by a dissolution of the Government, but by limiting and restricting the mode in which the money should be expended.

Such is the doctrine of Mr. Fessenden, admitting the position of Mr. Hunter, that we could not propose to change an existing law by an amendment to an appropriation bill, but we might, when we appropriated money, direct the purpose for which it should be used; and the amendment proposed by the House in 1856 was nothing but a direction that the Army, and the money appropriated for the support of the Army, should not be used to enforce laws that the House had declared to be revolutionary, null, and void. That proposition went back to the House; and we, in the debate there, as is shown by those participating, myself among the rest, acknowledged that we had no right to change the law, but we had a right to direct the application of the money we appropriated which did not propose to change existing law.

Mr. EATON. I should like to ask my friend from Ohio if he acceded to that doctrine as laid down by Mr. Fessenden?

Mr. SHERMAN. I will go further before answering. This led to a long discussion between the two Houses—to a controversy which existed some time, until finally the House receded from its position, much to my regret at that time, on the ground stated I think by Mr. Seward, that while this was not perhaps a change of an existing law, it was an attempt by the House to declare what the law was, and might be held on that ground to influence and affect the power of the courts to pass upon what was the law in Kansas. Finally the House was compelled by the action of the majority to recede from that position, and the bill passed without that proviso.

Now let us look at another historical period. In 1858 a similar controversy arose; and I say to Senators, and I defy any one of them to contradict me, that the House of Representatives sent to the Senate of the United States the appropriation bills without amendment of a legislative character. They asserted no such power as is now claimed. There was not a single provision in any one of the appropriation bills that was not required by existing law. It was after the panic of 1857; it was in 1858, when the country was suffering greatly from the distress of the time; and the House undertook to reduce the appropriations and sent to the Senate clean appropriation bills, the discretionary items greatly reduced. But the Senate, as usual in those times especially, loaded down the appropriation bills without limit, piled mountain upon mountain, and they so came back to the House. It seems, then, that with rather more youthful ardor than I possess now I "pitched into" the Senate with a great deal of force and vigor at any rate, if not with much discretion. I did denounce this conduct of the Senate and did stand by the right of the House of Representatives to limit appropriations, and I did say that the House of Representatives was the proper body to guard the disbursement of public money, as I say now, and that the Senate from its organization is not the best body to limit appropriations, and that the executive authorities are not the proper persons to reduce expenditures, because they are the persons to expend the money; and, to use my language, "if we appropriate they will squander."

After having examined the speech I then made, a part of which has been honored by being made a resolution of the House of Representatives, I say, with some abatement for a little intemperance of style and language, that I approve and indorse every principle laid down then by me; but so far from supporting the position now taken by the House of Representatives it exactly conflicts with it, because the House of Representatives then did not pretend to change any law whatever in their appropriation bills; and we were resisting on the part of the Executive certain abuses that had sprung up, and on the part of the Senate this very habit of loading down the appropriation bills with extraneous amendments. Let me here read what I then said:

> First, we were told yesterday by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that all these appropriations are in pursuance of existing law.

That was so with the House appropriation bills. Then I denounced in language which has already been quoted, and I will not read again, the course of the Senate and the course of the President, and I made these allegations against the executive authorities. I said:

> Under a section of a law passed in August, 1842, which was designed only for that bill and for that year, the Departments assume the power to transfer appropriations made for one purpose to any other purpose in the same Department, thus defeating all checks. Without law they use money appropriated specifically for the service of one fiscal year to pay for the service of another fiscal year.

And, sir, a republican Congress, in both Houses, a few years ago corrected this gross and glaring abuse; and now the law of the land is that money cannot be thus transferred. Here was a great republican reform.

> Another abuse by the Executive Departments is in their habit of making contracts in advance of appropriations.

I arraign them and give the cases and instances where they have done it, involving the Government in expenditures in advance of appropriations. I denounced that abuse of the executive authorities, and I denounce it now; and a republican Congress, republican in both branches, have corrected that abuse and prohibited it.

> In this way the Executive is gradually sapping the foundations of the Government and destroying the constitutional power of the House. Instead of a representative republic, we are degenerating into a bureaucracy, governed by red tape and subaltern clerks. While the powers of the House are invaded, the Executive takes care to extend, by construction, his just powers. Of this we have an example in the Utah war. What power has the President, without the consent of Congress, to order the Army to Utah, and thus involve the Government in an expenditure of millions upon millions?

Here was another abuse.

> We have the undoubted power over supplies, and yet the President so acts as to leave us no discretion. He creates the necessity for expenditures; and when we are asked to appropriate money to pay them, all the reply we have to our inquiries is, that the Army was ordered there by the President, as the Commander-in-Chief of the forces.

All these abuses of the executive authorities have been corrected by the republican party since it has come in power. And Senators, now when we are legislating as we are doing, have no conception of the loose condition of affairs in this country from 1856 to 1860, when the executive authority rode rough-shod over your Constitution and your laws affecting the appropriations of money under these devices that I pointed out. That is why I arraigned the executive authorities. Here is how I arraigned the Senate for doing just exactly what the House has now done:

> The Senate also has been guilty of an invasion of our privileges. When we send bills there they are returned to us loaded down with amendments for the very sums which we refused to give. They send these amendments here and we are impliedly told that unless we agree to them the entire appropriation bill will fall, and Congress be called back in extra session. It will be recollected that the appropriation for the Washington aqueduct, and many other extravagant items of expenditure, were carried through in that way.
> The Constitution of the United States gives to the Senate power to propose amendments to revenue bills, but expressly withholds from it power to originate such bills. But, by the abuse of their limited power to amend, they defeat the exclusive power of the House. But not only that. The Senate at this session, by direct usurpation, has exercised the power which the Constitution confers upon this House alone. It has originated a loan bill, sent it here, and it is now upon the Speaker's table. Is not a loan bill a bill for raising revenue? There was some dispute as to appropriation bills being revenue bills, but there can be no doubt about this bill.

And now, Mr. President, here are two counts of the indictment against the Senate that I made, both of which were true. The Senate had loaded down our bills to provide for the public service, framed in accordance with existing laws, with innumerable amendments of a legislative character, making additional appropriations and changing laws; and besides they had assumed to pass, not appropriation bills—because either House can pass an appropriation bill—but revenue bills, loan bills, and the like. Therefore, as a member of the House of Representatives fresh from the people of Ohio, I did arraign the President and Senate, and I believed that arraignment was just and right, and I so believe to this day. But, sir, the Senate then assumed to do only a small part of what the House now proposes. It only proposed amendments, but the House propose changes of existing laws, and demand that we agree to them upon the penalty, in case of refusal, of stopping the wheels of government.

Mr. MERRIMON. If the Senator will allow me I wish to ask him a question, and I do it the more readily because of his large experience in this branch of Congress and also in the other. Conceding that, wisely and regularly, as I do, there ought not to be any general legislation in an appropriation bill, I beg to ask the Senator whether republican Congresses and democratic Congresses, and republican Houses and republican Senates, and democratic Senates and democratic Houses have not for the last quarter century and more, time after time, legislated in the general appropriation bills?

Mr. SHERMAN. I commenced by saying that I had Mr. Hunter's long opinion read in which Mr. Hunter said that had been the habit in both Houses, but he said whenever either House undertakes to change a law and attempts to coerce the other House to consent to that change of the law, it is revolution.

Mr. MERRIMON. If it is revolution in one party, it is revolution in another.

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senate may propose amendments of a legislative character, but if the House objects the Senate should withdraw them at once. When the House proposes legislative amendments and the Senate decline in their good judgment because they do not think the law ought to be changed, the House ought at once to withdraw that amendment. There is the very thing. Either House may propose amendments, but neither House can, upon the penalty of revolution, defend all appropriation bills.

Mr. MERRIMON. Have we——

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope my friend will let me go through. I want to come down now to another time. I do say that this speech of mine made in 1858, so often quoted recently, is entirely consistent with the position I have always occupied, and now occupy, against both branches whenever they have presented themselves in this attitude of forcing legislative amendments in appropriation bills. I stand by that position of the Senate now. The House cannot force us to change a law unless we think it is right and just to change it upon any threat whatever.

Mr. MERRIMON. Still you have repeatedly yourself voted for legislation in appropriation bills.

Mr. SHERMAN. I thought my friend was astute enough to see the difference between a kindly offer of an amendment for the acceptance of the House and an amendment saying, "Pass this and agree to this change of the law or we will not pay the President of the United States, the judges of the courts, or make the other vital appropriations." There is the difference. Both Houses at all times have proposed amendments; but no House, no Senate, ought ever to insist upon them beyond submitting them to the willing judgment of the other House.

In 1860 this same question came up again and I happened to be then chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, which had also charge of the appropriation bill, and the House again passed clean appropriation bills. I was against all legislative amendments, and, so far as I remember, there were no legislative amendments in those bills. We obeyed the law and appropriated for every salary or sum required by law.

When they came back from the Senate they were again loaded down in the same way, and I shall never forget a conference which was held in one of the committee-rooms of the Senate Chamber, where Mr. Hunter—a gentleman whose words I read—and Mr. Toombs and Mr. Seward acted on the part of the Senate, and the question came up on our agreeing to certain amendments of the Senate. We expressed our disagreement. There was a good deal of disposition then on the part of the Senate to say, "Gentlemen of the House of Representatives, you must agree to this amendment or we will not pass your appropriation bill." The House of Representatives met it in the proper way: their conferees would not yield on any essential point, and we did not. We told them, "Very well, gentlemen; we are willing to appropriate everything that is required by law, but not one dollar more unless it meets our judgment;" and the result was in this conference that the very doctrine laid down by Mr. Hunter was agreed to unanimously by the conferees and the bill passed without further controversy; that is, we agreed that if there was any amendment of existing law in the appropriation bills that the Senate did not agree to we would withdraw it at once, and if there were any amendments proposed by the Senate that either gave more money than the law required or changed the law, and the House would not agree to them, the Senate would promptly recede from them. If you will look at the records you will find that was done and the bills passed, and that is the only principle on which Congress can legislate. The Constitution declares that Congress shall be composed of a Senate and House of Representatives, and that every bill shall receive the sanction of both Houses, depending on the qualified veto of the President. Neither House can force the other to consent. It must be a free consent, without any pressure, without any threat, express or implied. When the law stands on your statute-book and it is proposed to change it, both Houses are bound to obey the law and to appropriate sufficient money to execute the law, and neither House can force the other to change that law except by their free consent.

Now, Mr. President, it seems to me that after all our experience upon this matter we ought not to have any further trouble. I am very glad that the post-office conference committee has agreed upon a report. There is much of a legislative character in this conference report. I have no objection to that provided it is legislation which both Houses agree to. Then it is the law; but you cannot make an appropriation bill the fulcrum or the lever by which to force an agreement against a dissenting House or Senate.

Mr. MORTON. I feel myself constrained to call for the regular order.

Mr. EATON. I hope the Senator from Indiana will give way one moment.

Mr. MORTON. I have given way for some time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Here a speech has been made which, if evidently not so intended, does reflect on the action of the House.

Mr. MORTON. I simply want to get through with the pending business. My friend from Delaware is in the midst of a speech. I wish to hear that speech.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should rather give way to allow a reply to be made to the remarks of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is fair and just that we should have the reply now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana asks for the regular order. The unfinished business is before the Senate.

Mr. WEST. Am I to understand that by the ruling of the Chair an appropriation bill in the closing hours of a session can be ruled out of consideration by a mere calling for the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no rule that gives priority except to unfinished business among the special orders, which takes priority of all other business. The practice of the Senate has been to consider conference reports at any time; but there is no rule that gives them priority. The unfinished business has priority.

Mr. DAVIS. I believe it is in order to move to lay aside the regular order and proceed with the conference report?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is in order after the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business. The Secretary will report the unfinished business.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senator having charge of this bill will make a motion to lay the unfinished business aside, and I make this suggestion the more readily because I have been on a committee of conference that has had something to do with this bill. I hope the chairman of the committee of conference will insist on proceeding with the conference report. It is important that all the appropriation bills shall be considered promptly. The session, I hope, is drawing to a close. It is proper, and it has been usual, not only at this session but at all sessions since I have been here, to consider reports of conference committees on appropriation bills as always in order though other business may be pending. That is to say, other business has always given way for it without exception. I hope the chairman who has charge of this bill will move to lay aside the regular order and proceed with the conference report. I take it it will not last very long.

Mr. WEST. If the Senator will reflect a moment as to the nature of the business the Senator from Indiana calls for, he will understand my embarrassment in making such a motion. More properly the motion should come from somebody else.

Mr. DAVIS. When I addressed the Senator from Louisiana I did not think the regular order was one affecting the Senator so closely, being from his State.

Mr. WEST. Affecting the State.

Mr. DAVIS. The claimant of the amount asked for the contested seat here is from his State. I therefore see readily how he would be embarrassed. I move to lay aside the regular order and proceed with the consideration of the conference report.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hope that will not be carried, but that we shall proceed with the regular business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The unfinished business is the resolution relative to an allowance to P. B. S. Pinchback, pending which the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. DAVIS] moves to postpone this resolution and all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the subject which has been before the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. I do not wish to waste time in discussing the order of business. I think we do take a great deal of time in doing that which could be better used. But I would like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that to-morrow is set for the continuance of the trial of the Belknap case, and so far as we can see it is likely to occupy at any rate the remainder of the ten days' grace which by a provisional general appropriation bill has been gained by Congress for the regular disposition of the appropriation bills. The regular order, the Pinchback matter, promises to occupy all of this day and probably late into the night. The Senator from Delaware, who is noted for a faculty for continuance which is very much to his credit, probably will occupy two or three hours longer. That will bring us to near dinner-time, when, if we do not finish the matter, we shall take a recess until night in order to dispose of it and come back at seven or eight o'clock, and if we then finish the Pinchback resolution we shall be extremely fortunate. In the mean while this appropriation bill goes over, and to-morrow at twelve o'clock we are confronted with the impeachment trial, and so on from day to day until that is finished. I should like to know when we are to get action on this report. If there ever was a time when there ought to be precedence given to appropriation bills and everything springing out of appropriation bills, it is at the present time when we are seeking for the key to the "dead lock" and trying to get means to carry on the Government.

Although my feelings and sympathies are in favor of the resolution brought forward by the Senator from Indiana, and I intend with the light which I now have to vote for the proposition which is brought forward by his committee, I shall vote on a call of yeas and nays or on a division to give precedence to appropriation bills. If there is not a rule of the Senate giving them a precedence, I am somewhat surprised by the knowledge of that fact. I know that for years it has been the practice in both Houses, without an exception, to give precedence to appropriation bills; and when they arrive to the condition of an agreed committee of conference report, I know the practice in the other House is that a member can even be taken off the floor in order that the conference report may be considered. The Senate has uniformly acted in the spirit that it would give preference to reports of committees of conference, and I must confess that I am painfully surprised when I find that we have no rule which carries that out. At any rate there is a common law of that kind, long action of the Senate in that direction, acquiesced in over and over again; and if ever there can be an interpretation of a strict rule, it is furnished in this case by the uniform action of the Senate for years past.

I trust, sir, that we may conclude this report. I doubt if anybody wants to speak at any great length upon it. The speech which my friend from Ohio has made has been rather for personal vindication than otherwise. He being honored with the particular notice of another body thought it necessary to show that he was consistent. I do not know that any brother Senator wants to show that he was inconsistent, or desires to reflect on him in any way. If other matter in connection with the subject is to be considered, it will require very brief treatment; for of course we do not want to go into a discussion of policy, of the question whether it is right to make amendments on appropriation bills having a legislative tendency.

Mr. MORTON. I was not surprised at the ruling of the Chair, for I had never understood that any committee in this body had superior privileges to the floor to any other committee for its business; and so far as the necessity for urging this conference report to-day is concerned, I do not see it. We all know it will pass in some form. We know that the appropriation bills do pass. This matter that is before the Senate ought to be disposed of and I think can be disposed of soon if we allow it to go on. I know the great gift of continuance that my friend from Delaware has; but, as I said before, I am pretty familiar with the state of that speech in which he is now [laughter] and I hope he will be allowed to continue it. I hope he enjoys it. I think it cannot last very much longer. I hope we shall go on with the regular order. I trust my friend from West Virginia will withdraw his motion, but if he does not, I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. DAVIS. I know there are other speeches besides that of the Senator from Delaware which will probably consume the day on the Pinchback matter. But dropping that for a moment, it is most important, in my judgment, that the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill should be considered now from more than one fact, especially as there is a fair belief, and that belief is founded on facts, that this is one of the bills that the two ends of this Capitol probably will agree upon so as to become a law. I understand that the House now is waiting for our action and cannot take action until we send this report to them. That makes it all-important that we should not delay it. It has been the usage—I do not recollect a single exception—when a conference committee was ready to report, especially near the end of the session, even when a Senator was on the floor and was making a speech, that he gave way for the purpose of having a conference report acted upon. I believe it has been the uniform custom. I hope now that the Senate will sustain my motion to let the conference committee's report be considered.

There is another reason in addition to that. I can say to the Senator that a dead lock may be brought about here if he asks for the yeas and nays on this, because it may be found that there is not a quorum present. We do not know now whether there is or not. If he calls for the yeas and nays and there shall be found not to be a quorum, neither the Pinchback resolution nor the conference report can proceed. I hope the Senator will not call for the yeas and nays, but will let the post-office conference report be considered.

Mr. MORTON. From my knowledge of the temper of my distinguished friends on one side, I expect them to avail themselves of appropriation bills and any other object that can present itself to prevent the consideration of the unfinished business. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. INGALLS. I shall vote, when the proper time comes, to pay Mr. Pinchback his per diem and mileage; but he has waited three years and a half for this desirable consummation, and I presume he will not suffer materially by waiting a few days longer. If he is to receive the money, at best he will lose nothing but the interest, and if he is not to receive it he will be no worse then than he is now. On the last day of the last month a joint resolution or bill was passed extending the different appropriation bills for the period of ten days. This is the 5th of July. The time has already half expired. The post-office appropriation bill is certainly one of the most important, so far as the people are concerned, that will be presented for the action of the Senate. I therefore believe that, while I am a friend of the Pinchback measure and should like to vote with the Senator from Indiana, it is my duty to vote against the postponement of the post-office bill, and I shall feel called upon to record my vote upon that side.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from West Virginia moves the postponement of the present and all prior orders for the purpose of continuing the consideration of the report of the committee of conference on the post-office appropriation bill. The yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when Mr. BAYARD'S name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BAYARD] telegraphed me this morning to state on the call of his name that he was paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. PATTERSON, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. WALLACE] on this question. If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The roll-call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 31, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Cameron of Wisconsin, Cockrell, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Paddock, Sargent, Saulsbury, Wadleigh, Windom, Withers, and Wright—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bruce, Cragin, Harvey, Hitchcock, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, and Sherman—8.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Logan, Maxey, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, West, and Whyte—34.

So the motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

The message further announced that the House had agreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes providing a penalty for mailing obscene books, and other matters therein contained, and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails.

The message also announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate:

A bill (H. R. No. 1909) for the relief of John W. Chickering; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia.

RECOMMITTAL OF A BILL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I move that the bill (S. No. 854) to repeal a part of section 4713 of the Revised Statutes of the United States relating to pensions be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions. It is done with the approval of the chairman of the committee.

The motion was agreed to.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. ANTHONY submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

PAY OF P. B. S. PINCHBACK.

Mr. MORTON. I now call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the Pinchback resolution.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the following resolution, reported by Mr. MITCHELL, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, April 17:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which he was a contestant up to the period of the determination of the contest by the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY concluded the speech begun by him on Monday last. His speech in full is as follows:

Mr. President, I do not rise to participate in the discussion of questions connected with the election in Mississippi, which have been unnecessarily brought into this debate. I am not surprised, however, like the Senator from Minnesota, [Mr. MCMILLAN,] at the statements that have been made in regard to the election in that State, because I believe the Senate will bear witness that upon all occasions, "in season and out of season," whenever an opportunity is afforded the honorable Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON,] he is sure to refer to the condition of affairs in Mississippi. If my memory is right, it was he who first alluded in this debate to Mississippi; and the remarks which he made drew out from my colleague, very properly as I conceive, a correction of the errors of statement in which the Senator from Indiana was indulging in regard to the condition of affairs in that State. I am not surprised that the Senator from Minnesota is greatly alarmed and greatly agitated and greatly astonished at what took place before the committee. He resides in a State where there are no colored people; and when he went down South and listened to their tales of wrong, without appreciating fully the condition and character of the witnesses before him, he was prepared to credit without question every story that they told, even, perhaps, their stories of witchcraft, conjuration, &c. I am not surprised, therefore, that he is astonished; but I will not indulge in any remarks on Mississippi affairs. I rise to speak to the question regularly in order. I rise to enter my protest against the payment of something like $20,000 out of the Treasury of this country to P. B. S. Pinchback, who was a claimant for a seat on the floor of the Senate. I do not regard the amount, $20,000, as a very large sum when I take into consideration the vast expenditures of this Government. When I take into consideration the wasteful extravagance that has been indulged in within the last few years, I do not consider the sum of $20,000 a very large sum; and yet I say that it is a sum entirely too large to be taken from the public Treasury and given as a donation—I measure my words when I say to be paid as a gratuity to a man who has no more shadow of claim or right to any sum of money whatever out of the public Treasury than I have to the money in the coffers of the British exchequer.

What legal right has Pinchback to this money? I presume it will not be contended that he demands this money under any claim of legal right. I have heard no such assertion yet made, and I venture to say that no Senator will make the assertion that he has any legal right whatever to a dollar of this money that is proposed to be given to him.

Then upon what is his claim for this $20,000 based? Has he any equitable claim to this money? From what does the equity arise? Has he rendered any service to the country? Can the honorable Senator from Indiana, or any other Senator, point to any special service which Mr. Pinchback has rendered to the country within the last three years? True, he has all that time been obtruding himself upon the attention of the Senate and has given to our friends on the other side of the Chamber the benefit of his company, and has already cost the Government a very large amount of money. Why, sir, the time his application for a seat on this floor has occupied in this Senate within the last three years, if it could be measured in dollars and cents, together with the cost of investigations into his right to a seat on this floor, would amount to a sum of money much larger than is generally apprehended. I have not the data before me; but I venture the assertion that it would not fall far short of $50,000. Without the shadow of a rightful claim to a seat on this floor he has persistently, and I had liked to have said impertinently, pressed his claim upon the attention of the Senate, so that the consumption of time of the Senate, together with the expenditure of money in subpœnaing witnesses and paying witnesses, has amounted, in my judgment, at least to the sum I have indicated. I can find nothing upon which any equitable claim for this payment can be based. On the contrary, I find in the evidence before the Senate, in the records of the Senate, that which ought to scout from this presence any claim by that man for compensation whatever.

Let us look at the facts. Pinchback claims to have been elected a Senator in January, 1873, and by whom was he elected? Your records disclose the fact that he was elected by an assembly illegal and revolutionary; that he was elected by a legislature that usurped the functions of the legislative department of that State; that he was elected by a legislature that never had a legal existence, but was foisted into power by Federal bayonets, by fraud and by force combined. These facts are known and read of all men; they have been detailed in this Senate, not by democrats alone, but by honorable Senators on the other side of this Chamber, who have declared the legislature that elected Pinchback had no legal existence and was a usurpation in fact, devoid of the status of a legislative body. Is not that true? Let us refer to the history of Louisiana for the last few years. What was the condition of affairs in 1872? In the month of November of that year an election was held. That election was declared by a leading newspaper published in the city of New Orleans, a republican paper and the organ of the party in that State, to have been exceptionally quiet and peaceful; and yet after it was ascertained that the result of that election was the election of a democratic Legislature and a democratic governor, a conspiracy conceived in fraud, a conspiracy conceived in the spirit of treason to the State, a conspiracy which ought to have subjected to the penalties of treason the conspirators who entered into it, combined and united for the purpose of defeating a democratic Legislature and a democratic governor, to excite revolution in the State and to usurp the government of the State, to defeat the will of the people, and to foist over that State a usurping government.

I speak, Mr. President, that which the records of this Senate disclose. I speak not merely my own opinions, but I utter the opinions of honorable Senators who differ with me in politics. I have before me the report submitted by Mr. Carpenter, a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. That report was signed by Senator ALCORN, of Mississippi; that report was signed by Senator LOGAN, of Illinois, by Senator ANTHONY, of Rhode Island, and concurred in principally in all its facts by Senators Hill of Georgia and Trumbull of Illinois; and in that report they declare most emphatically that it was a usurpation, that it had no legal existence, and that if the election was not vitiated by fraud the McEnery government was elected by about ten thousand majority. When, therefore, I say that this man is a representative of a usurpation, that he came here as the representative of a revolutionary body which had usurped the places of government in the State of Louisiana, I speak that only which this report of your committee proclaims and discloses.

Well, sir, elected by that body with full knowledge of the illegality of its existence, himself a particeps in the crimes that were committed in that State; one of the chief inceptors of that revolution; a man that originally entered into the conspiracy, he came here, I repeat, with a pertinacity and I will say with an impudence intolerable, and pressed his claim to a seat in this body for three long years, till at last the Senate, composed of a majority of the republican party, were compelled to drive him home and to deny his claim, after exhausting patience, after tolerating perhaps because of his color this impertinent person's claim upon the Senate. Now, sir, after the Senate has been compelled to turn him from this body because he had no legal right to a seat on this floor, the further impertinence is presented on the part of this man of making a claim for the compensation and mileage of a Senator; and honorable Senators have favored that claim. I shall not say that anything is wrong on the part of Senators in reporting this matter or in favoring it. I impute nothing wrong to Senators. I speak of the man himself. I speak of him because he had full knowledge from the very beginning that he was not entitled, because he himself was a part of the conspiracy. He had a full knowledge that the government which he claimed to represent was an illegal government foisted upon the people of Louisiana by Federal bayonets enforcing the order of Durell, who because of his complicity in the affair was ultimately driven into disgrace, and to avoid impeachment retired from the bench.

The claim of Pinchback is presented and urged here, and it has been intimated by the Senator from Indiana that unless it is passed it is a proclamation that the rights of colored people are not to be respected in this body. I assert, and the records of this body and of the other House of Congress will show it, that a very large proportion of the time of both Houses of Congress has been occupied with considering and providing for the interests of the colored people. Of all the people on the face of this earth they are the last to complain of the action of the national Legislature, for much of the time of the Senate and of the House for the last several years has been occupied with the peculiar interests of the colored people of this country. A rejection of this claim will be no proclamation, it will be no declaration that the rights of colored people are not to be respected. There has been no disposition manifested on this side of this House not to respect the just rights of colored as well as of white men. I am only sorry that on the other side of the Chamber I have sometimes thought that I could observe a partiality, for reasons which I shall not name, toward the race to which I do not belong. On this side of the Chamber we concede to all men their just rights under the Constitution. We are prepared to award to the colored man all the rights that belong to him under the Constitution and laws of the land, but at the same time we maintain that he is no better than our own race, and we are not prepared to award him superior rights to ourselves. We respect the rights of all and mean to stand by the rights of all, white and colored. We do not intend, however, to give any preference to the colored race from political motives or otherwise. We believe at the same time that we are better friends to the negro race than our republican friends, whose partiality for the people of color springs from political considerations rather than from motives of justice or disinterested benevolence.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator from Delaware says that the colored people have no right to complain against the Congress of the nation on account of any deprivation of rights. That, perhaps, to a certain extent is true. I desire to ask the Senator from Delaware what political or civil right has been extended to the colored race in the last ten years by the aid of a democratic vote in either branch of Congress?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If my honorable friend will simply walk across to the democratic House of Representatives he will find there that by the justice of the democratic Representatives of the people of this country they have permitted colored Representatives to come in there and take their seats, when they have been contested, too, by white men. No, sir; the whole record of the democratic party from the very foundation of this Government to the present time establishes the fact that they regard strictly the Constitution and laws of the country; and whether they approve of those laws or not, they observe and obey them and mete out to all alike both white and black the full measure of rights which they secure.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me one other question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not care to be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. ALCORN in the chair.) Does the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will yield again.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator says the democratic House of Representatives at the present session has been very generous in admitting colored Representatives. I will ask him if the same democratic House have not turned out all colored Representatives who were elected by republican votes?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir; on the contrary they have denied admission to white men who were contesting the seats of colored people, and the white men were democrats and the colored men were republicans.

If my honorable friend is so unfamiliar with the history and character of the democratic party all he has to do is simply to walk across to the other end of the Capitol where democrats are in the majority and he will see an illustration of its observance of the Constitution and laws and the security which it furnishes to the rights of all. If the Senator desires to ask another question I will yield again.

Mr. LOGAN. I will ask the Senator a question if he will yield.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I should rather make my speech first.

Mr. LOGAN. I should like to ask which was elected in the cases he referred to, the white man or the colored man? They turned the white man out, the Senator says. Which was elected?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no doubt they acted perfectly right and denied the seat to the white man who was not entitled to it, and gave it to the colored man who was entitled to it.

Mr. LOGAN. Exactly; then I give them no credit for it.

Mr. SAULSBURY. But I was about adding this further remark, that I have great doubt whether that would have been the case had the Senator's party been in the majority.

I have said that this man comes here as the representative of a revolutionary body. I have said that the records of the Senate disclose it, and I mean to prove that assertion. I mean to prove that I am uttering nothing but what were the sentiments and opinions of republican Senators three years ago on this point. You remember that the report of Mr. Carpenter proposed as a remedy for the condition of affairs which he found in Louisiana to hold a new election under Federal auspices for the purpose of establishing a legal government in that State, which he said did not exist. In the report which he made he states emphatically that if the election of McEnery is not treated as a fraudulent election then he must be recognized as the legal governor, because McEnery had a large majority of the votes of that State. But Mr. Carpenter and the members of the committee with whom he was associated, (all of whom were republicans, there not being at that time a single democrat upon the Committee on Privileges and Elections; every member of that committee was a republican,) with all their party attachment, with all their party prejudice, with all their party predilections, upon a full examination of the case were driven to the conclusion that the Kellogg government was a usurpation, and that if there was any legal government in the State of Louisiana, it was the government headed by McEnery.

That was their conclusion. But they expressed the belief that the election of McEnery and his ticket was fraudulent. I think in that point they were in error. I think that their report ought to have been not only that the Kellogg government was a usurpation, but that McEnery was governor, and that the Legislature elected with him on the ticket was in fact the legal Legislature of the State of Louisiana, and that it had been displaced by a usurpation of power on the part of the Federal Government, on the part of Durell, who issued his order, and on the part of the President of the United States, who authorized the employment of troops for the purpose of enforcing his nefarious order. That should have been the report. It would have been justified by the facts. They ought to have come before the Senate and exhibited what we sometimes meet with in history, when men forget their party passions and party feelings, and, looking at matters as they really exist, rise above all party prejudices and party passions, and come forth and denounce that which is wrong, though perpetrated by their own party. Perhaps that was too much to expect from this committee, however. We are all human beings. We are subject to frailties. We are subject to be influenced by our prejudices and by our passions, and I attribute to that honorable committee no feeling or infirmity which I am not willing to admit may attach to myself. I know the frailties of humanity, and I do no discredit to the committee when I say that they, like myself, are subject to the weakness and infirmities of humanity, and perhaps did not see and could not see the truth as it really existed. If they could have risen above it all; if they could have discarded all bias; if they could have really looked at the facts as they existed, and come forth to the Senate with the report that the McEnery government, having received some 10,000 majority of the votes cast in Louisiana in 1872, was a legal government, it would have been a sublime spectacle, worthy of the imitation of all parties for all time to come. But they did not do so; and I do not say that they could arrive at that conclusion, because of the infirmities which cluster around this poor humanity which clothes us all. However, they did come to the conclusion that McEnery's government had received a large majority of the votes actually cast, and they came to a further conclusion that the Kellogg government was a usurpation, in existence in violation of right, supported and propped by Federal bayonets, and they proposed as a remedy for what they considered an abnormal state of affairs, a State without a legal government in existence and controlled by a usurpation, that an election should be held under Federal law by which the people of Louisiana could re-establish a legal government in that State.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate to that proposed law. I want Senators to mark the phraseology of the first section of that bill, which fully sustains all that I have said in reference to the character of that government. It was introduced into the Senate I believe on the 27th of February, 1873:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

I read the first section—

That the election held in the State of Louisiana on the 4th day of November, 1872, for governor, lieutenant-governor, secretary of state, attorney-general, auditor of public accounts, and superintendent of education, and for senators and representatives for the General Assembly of said State, is hereby declared null and void; and it is further ordered and declared that the persons who were entitled to hold the said State offices on the said 4th day of November shall continue in office and be recognized as the legal officers of said State by the Government of the United States until their successors are chosen and qualified in accordance with the provisions of this act.

That was the bill reported from that committee, declaring that that election was null and void for reasons assigned in the report of the committee. Their reasons were that McEnery's government, which had received a majority of the votes in that State, was a fraud. That was one of the conclusions to which they came. The second conclusion was that the Kellogg government was not elected, but was placed there by the order of Durell and the enforcement of that order by Federal power, and was a usurpation. Therefore the conclusion of the committee is that that election was null and void, and that conclusion is formulated in the law to which I have referred.

Mr. MITCHELL. Do I understand the Senator from Delaware to hold that the reason the Senate should not make compensation to Mr. Pinchback as a contestant in this case is because the Senate has decided that he was not elected by the Legislature of Louisiana?

Mr. SAULSBURY. If my honorable friend from Oregon will just be patient, and if my strength holds out, I hope he will hear every point discussed which this case covers.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is a question which can be answered by "yes" or "no," and I should like to have the answer. It is a question, and I think a pertinent one.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Very well. I will come to that question after a while. My remarks are perfectly extemporaneous, and if I see proper to publish them I do not care to publish with them a speech of the honorable Senator from Oregon.

That I say was the conclusion of the committee, a conclusion which they embodied in a law and proposed for the consideration of the Senate of the United States. That proposed law was considered. It was debated in this body. I remember very well the impression which it made. I remember the strenuous efforts of the honorable Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] to defeat the object proposed by the committee. I remember with what heat, with what energy, with what ability he fought the committee. I will do him the credit to say that he is not only a bold but, if I may judge by the success which he has had in shaping and molding and reversing the opinions of Senators on the other side, he is a successful captain. He at that time represented the forlorn hope, antagonizing the committee at every step, and yet persisting in his determination he captured the opposing forces and wheeled them into line, and made them tributary in the end to the accomplishment of his purpose. I am happy to say, however, that he did not capture the whole republican vote of the Senate, but that there were enough to unite with the democratic party, when the issue came upon the seating of Pinchback, to say that he was not entitled and should not be admitted to a seat in this body.

This bill was discussed time and again and finally reached a vote. The vote on that bill was taken, and I will read now the yeas and nays. Some Senators voted for that bill that I suppose will now vote to pay Pinchback.

I find the names of the following Senators in favor of that bill, which declared that the election held in the State of Louisiana in 1872 was null and void and proposed to hold a new election under Federal authority:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Carpenter, Corbett, Cragin, Ferry of Michigan, Frelinghuysen, Gilbert, Hamlin, Howe, Logan, Machen, Osborn, Ramsey, Sawyer, Sherman, Sprague, Stewart, and Wilson.

Those gentlemen all voted for the bill. They sustained the report of the committee, and voted for a bill which proclaimed in its very first section that the election in Louisiana was null and void for reasons which had been assigned in the report which was submitted to the Senate. Upon that bill there was a discussion, and I propose to show what honorable Senators said in reference to that matter. I will read from the speech of Senator Schurz:

What was their first act?

Speaking now of the Legislature which elected this man Pinchback—

What was their first act? They impeached the governor. Throwing aside all the forms of impeachment prescribed by law, they impeached and suspended the governor, if a summary decree can be called impeachment and suspension. They who had not a shadow of right based upon law, upon votes, upon an election, upon legal returns, proceeded to undo one governor and to make another. That second governor was Pinchback. The National Government recognized him as the governor of Louisiana. Then they proceeded to what they called the canvass of the votes in the Legislature, not canvassing legal returns of votes in any legal form, but a canvass on the ground of newspaper reports, wild guesses, and forged affidavits. What I say here is by no means an exaggerated assertion, for it is distinctly proven by the testimony, and I think it is denied by no one. Then they declared the man of their choice, Kellogg, governor, Antoine, lieutenant-governor, and so on all the State officers of Louisiana.

Thus the usurpation is consummated, a usurpation without the shadow of a law as an excuse, with nothing but fraud and force to stand upon; a usurpation palpable, gross, shameless, and utterly subversive of all principles of republican government; a usurpation such as this country has never seen and probably no citizen of the United States has ever dreamed of. The offspring of this Legislature is the Kellogg government, and that government is called by the Senator from Indiana the lawful government of the State of Louisiana, which, he insists, we are bound to recognize.

That is what Mr. Schurz said on this subject. I now want to read what Senator SHERMAN said in reference to this subject. I am now reading the testimony of republican Senators in reference to the character of the government which this man Pinchback claimed to represent. Said Mr. SHERMAN:

The proof then shows that as to the McEnery government the election was so managed as to defeat the will of the majority and prevent a fair election, and in the other case that the actual majority of the votes returned according to law were not in favor of the government set up by Kellogg. Those two facts, it seems to me, are reasonably established.

Now, what shall we do? Shall we set the example for all time to come of allowing a government to be established permanently that was not elected by the majority of those who voted? Shall we, on the other hand, allow a government to be perpetuated that was organized, engineered, conceived, and founded in fraud? Why, sir, to establish either of these two propositions is to subvert the republican principle. Therefore I am disposed to acquiesce in the decision of the committee that we ought to set them both aside, under the powers given to us by the Constitution of the United States to guarantee to the State of Louisiana a republican form of government.

That was the language of the Senator from Ohio. The Senator from Nevada [Mr. STEWART] said:

Is that a republican form of government? On the one hand, it is admitted that the election was fraudulently conducted. Every contrivance was resorted to to prevent the people giving a fair expression of their opinion. That is hardly denied. On the one hand was an organized conspiracy to deny the people the right to vote and on the other a want of legal forms.

Now it seems to me that we are placed in this predicament; that by our action we must do one of three things. Non-action keeps a government in place that did not have a majority of the votes, was not elected by the people. Non-action does that because the President tells us that in that event he will continue to recognize the Kellogg government. Action to recognize the McEnery government recognizes and indorses a conspiracy that has been repudiated by the action of the Administration, by various judicial decisions, and by the action of both Houses of Congress in counting the votes for President of the United States.

Then, what is the other alternative? The other alternative is to order a new election, and the committee have very sensibly proposed to allow the people of Louisiana to have the right that other citizens of the United States have, to elect their own officers.

I might go through the whole catalogue. I might find what the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. ALCORN] said; but I will read first what the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] said:

While I am upon the floor I desire to say, in justification of the motion made and in justification of the taking up of this proposition to consider the bill now before the Senate, that there has been a pretended government set up in the State of Louisiana by force and by fraud no man can for one moment deny. That to-day the government there exists in fraud, and in nothing else, no man who knows the facts will deny. That a pretense, an attempt, was made to establish a different government in the same way is true. That the election was a fraud, that the whole thing was corrupt, that there was a combined effort on the part of certain men to perpetrate frauds and deprive the people of their rights and their privileges as citizens, no one can deny. That there was an organized fraud for the purpose of electing McEnery, the evidence is plain and clear. That returns were forged for the purpose of accomplishing that result no man will deny. Then so far as that pretended government is concerned it is steeped in infamy and fraud, and should not be permitted for one moment to exist.

That was the opinion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] in reference to this Kellogg government in the month of February, 1873, when the facts had just been elicited and brought to the attention of the Senate. The righteous indignation of Senators then spoke out. I could quote from the speeches of various Senators, the Senator from Wisconsin, [Mr. HOWE,] the Senator from New Jersey, [Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN,] and others, expressions of opinion showing that they did not think that the Kellogg government was a legal government.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. With the permission of the Senator from Delaware——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Delaware yield?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Yes, sir.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I understood the Senator from Delaware to read my vote declaring that the Kellogg legislature was not a valid legislature.

Mr. SAULSBURY. It was on a bill the first section of which declares that the election was null and void. I read the section.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I think that the Senator from Delaware does not exactly state the whole of that case. My recollection may be in error. My recollection of that vote is this: We were about adjourning and a bill was introduced to provide for a new election as the best way of settling that question, referring it again to the people, and I voted to refer it again to the people. That is the vote the Senator from Delaware has quoted. I voted in favor of the bill while the democracy voted against referring the matter to the people. That being the situation of the case, it became necessary for us to go to work deliberately and to examine the testimony to see which of those legislatures was the true legislature. I did that at great pains, taking a great deal of time, giving my remarks in full, canvassing the votes of all the parishes; and I came to the conclusion that the legislature which elected Pinchback was the true legislature, and so voted.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I think we all remember that memorable night, and the animated discussion participated in principally by members on the other side. The democrats on this side of the House never did enter into the discussion of that question until the amendment of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. HOWE] was accepted by Mr. Carpenter, which recognized the Kellogg government and proposed to keep it in existence for a specified time. Not until that amendment was accepted by Senator Carpenter did a single democrat rise in his place to discuss that question. The discussion was had by honorable Senators on the other side of the Chamber. We all know with what zeal and energy the Senator from Indiana fought the Senator from Illinois, fought the Senator from Wiconsin, (Mr. Carpenter,) fought all the Senators who discussed the question. As I before said, he maintained his side of the question and succeeded eventually before the three years were out in capturing the very antagonists which he encountered in that debate.

[At this point the honorable Senator yielded to a motion for an adjournment.]

Mr. SAULSBURY. At the time I gave way on Monday for an adjournment until to-day, I was discussing the character of the Louisiana Legislature which assumed to elect Pinchback, and had attempted to show that by the action of this Senate through its committee, through the opinions of Senators expressed in debate, and through the action of the Senate in the rejection of Pinchback's claim to a seat on this floor, it had been declared from the beginning until the present hour that the government which Pinchback claimed by its election entitled him to a seat on this floor was a usurpation and not a legislative body. In doing that I wish to impress this fact, that the rule which has heretofore been adopted by the Senate of making compensation to honest contestants who have come here as the representatives of a legislative body does not apply. His is an anomalous case. He was the representative not of a legislative body, but the representative of a purely usurping body. My object was to show that upon a full investigation of the facts connected with the existing Kellogg government, and the illegal assembly claiming to be the Legislature of Louisiana that elected Pinchback, it was regarded at the time not only by democratic but by republican Senators to be a usurpation without any claim of right, and upheld by the influence of Federal bayonets. I might if I saw proper strengthen this view by quotations from the speeches of other Senators who expressed opinions at the time, but it is unnecessary. There were at that period but very few members of this body and but very few intelligent persons in this country who expressed opinions on the subject who did not admit that great wrong was done to the people of that State, and denounced Durell, Kellogg, and the other conspirators against the peace and dignity of Louisiana.

Even the President of the United States, who interfered to sustain the usurpation in a special message which he sent to this body asking the interposition of Congress, did not attempt to justify his action on the ground that Kellogg's government was elected; nor could he have done so without disregard of all the facts in the case. Indeed there has been no period since that time to the present when the popular judgment of the country, as expressed through the press, has not uttered its condemnation of that usurpation. True there has been a forced acquiescence on the part of the people of Louisiana in a condition of affairs which they were impotent to prevent and also a toleration of this usurpation on the part of the country, because it had the support of the Federal Executive and must necessarily pass away in a very few years. But the acquiescence of the people of the State and the toleration on the part of the people of the country have not rendered valid and lawful a government which was in its inception a usurpation and during its continuance has been a tyranny and despotism. It was this usurped government which Pinchback desired to represent on this floor, and which for three years he diligently sought by the aid of the Senator from Indiana to have recognized by his admission to a seat in this body. That recognition has never been given by the Senate, but on the contrary denied and he dismissed and sent home. Of the character of that government and of the pretended Legislature which elected him he, Pinchback, had full knowledge. He knew as well as we know that it was a revolutionary government. He was one of the principal conspirators in the treason against the State. What right, then, I ask, legal or equitable, has he to the money you propose in this resolution to take from the public Treasury and give to him? Does he come within the usage which has prevailed in this body in reference to contestants for seats on this floor? Certainly not. That rule was clearly stated in the report submitted in the Sykes case by the Senator from Tennessee, [Mr. COOPER,] which was on Monday commented on by my colleague, [Mr. BAYARD,] so that I need not now dwell upon it. Whatever may be my individual opinion in reference to the propriety of the usage which has obtained in reference to compensation allowed honest contestants, I should not object to its application to Pinchback if his case were like those; but his is no such case; it is entirely distinct from any other that has been before the Senate and cannot be assimilated to the Sykes case or to any other.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will it disturb the Senator if I ask a question?

Mr. SAULSBURY. No, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. I inquire if the Senator from Delaware did not concur in the report made by the Senator from Tennessee in the Sykes case?

Mr. SAULSBURY. Certainly. I have just said, however, that the Pinchback case could not be assimilated in any respect to that case.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now one other question. I inquire of the honorable Senator if the Senate had not determined long before that report was made by the Senator from Tennessee in the Sykes case that the body that elected or attempted to elect Mr. Sykes was not the Legislature of the State of Alabama?

Mr. SAULSBURY. My friend from Oregon shall hear before I close my remarks just what the Senate has done in that regard. I propose to show that in my remarks, and the Senator from Oregon shall hear from me fully on the very point as to which he interrogates me.

The Senator from Indiana insisted that this case comes within the rule laid down in the report on the Sykes case, and referred to the legislative body that elected Sykes in no very flattering terms. Now I come to answer the question of the honorable Senator from Oregon. I will refer to the Sykes case; and I say that this is a very distinct and very different case from that presented by Mr. Sykes. The honorable Senator from Indiana called the legislative body which elected Mr. Sykes a mere sham, a pretense, a mere debating society. Why, sir, what are the facts? Does not the Senator from Indiana know, does not the Senator from Oregon know something of the history of the legislative body which elected Mr. Sykes a Senator on this floor? There was not in that legislative body a single member who did not hold the certificate of his election under the constitution and laws of the State of Alabama. The Legislature that elected Mr. Sykes met in strict conformity to law. Every member in either house of that legislative body that met in the capitol of Alabama was a candidate before the people for election. The election officers returned to the canvassing board the votes cast in the different precincts of the State. That canvassing board examined the returns thus made and certified, as they were bound under the terms of the constitution and laws of Alabama to do, their finding to the secretary of state. The secretary of state, as in duty bound under the constitution and laws of the State, within ten days thereafter, sent to the members certified to him to be elected a certificate of their election; and every member in both houses of the capitol legislature which elected Mr. Sykes went into the legislative halls clothed with the only authority that could give the right to take a seat in the Legislature, to wit, the certificate of the secretary of state as to his election. That was the character of that capitol legislature that elected Sykes. Over the senate that elected Mr. Sykes the lieutenant-governor presided, as required by the constitution of Alabama. The house of representatives was organized by the speaker of the preceding house of the Legislature of that State, as required by the laws and the constitution of that State. In every essential feature the legislative body that elected Mr. Sykes was a legal legislative body, and outside of that there never was a legislative body in that State during that time that had the form or the authority of law.

Mr. MITCHELL. But, if the Senator will allow me, has not the Senate of the United States decided the very reverse of what the honorable Senator from Delaware is contending for?

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will come to that. The Senator and myself are both members of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and he knows exactly as I know what has taken place in that committee. I say the Senate of the United States never has determined that question upon facts proved in the cause. It is true that a majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections reported to this body that the Sykes legislature was not a legal Legislature, and the Senate adopted that report. But how was it made? There was not a scintilla of evidence before the Committee on Privileges and Elections at the time they made that report. No witness was examined. It was made on paper statements. That report was based on no evidence furnished to the committee, and the Senate of the United States has never had a scintilla of evidence furnished to it in reference to the character of the legislative body that elected Mr. Sykes or elected Mr. SPENCER. I now speak that which I know, and testify to that which I have seen and heard, that at the present session of the Congress of the United States the State of Alabama appeared before the Committee on Privileges and Elections by her counsel and offered to submit proof on this very question, offered to show by evidence conclusive that the body that elected Mr. SPENCER was not a legal body, and that Mr. SPENCER never was legally elected. The counsel of the State of Alabama filed charges and specifications before the committee and asked the privilege of summoning before it witnesses so that that testimony might be laid before the Senate, and the Senator from Oregon voted to reject the application, and the majority of the Committee on Privileges and Elections refused to the State of Alabama the poor privilege of submitting proof upon that point on the very ground now claimed by the Senator from Oregon that the case was res adjudicata. It has never been res adjudicata. It has never been decided upon proof, upon evidence, but upon mere statements without proof and without affidavit or oath.

Mr. MITCHELL. I suppose the honorable Senator from Delaware will not contend that there can be two legislatures in the same State at the same time.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Why did not the Senator from Oregon permit the investigation to be made to see which was the Legislature? Was it because he was fearful that the proof submitted by the State of Alabama would show conclusively that Sykes was elected by a legal legislature and that SPENCER was not? What was his motive? The State, one of the sovereign States of this Union, came before that committee and demanded an investigation into these facts and offered to submit its proof, and was denied. What is the legal inference that the country will draw? That it was a question which would not bear investigation, which it was ticklish at least to open. The State of Alabama tendered herself ready to show that the legislative body which elected Mr. SPENCER was not a legal legislative body, and it was denied.

The Senator from Oregon ought not now to set up the report of the committee on a former occasion, because that report was not based upon evidence furnished the committee. He ought to have permitted, as I insisted at the time, the State of Alabama to be heard upon the proofs, and then the Senate should have had the privilege of weighing the evidence and determining the question upon proofs and not upon verbal statements.

Mr. MITCHELL. Now, one word inasmuch as the honorable Senator says that the matter was decided without proof. The controversy was as to which was the Legislature of the State of Alabama; that which was known as the State-house body that elected Mr. Sykes, or the court-house legislature that elected Mr. SPENCER; and I undertake to say that the Committee on Privileges and Elections did inquire into that matter, not in the absence of proof, but on full proof, legal proof bearing on that question, and decided the question.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Was there a single witness before the committee? No; and when the State of Alabama wanted to examine witnesses before the committee the door was shut in her face, and she was refused a hearing.

Mr. MITCHELL. She had the records.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Her counsel was sent home without the privilege of making inquiry on that subject. I always contended that the Senate ought to have the proofs and determine the status of the legislative bodies claiming to be the Legislature of Alabama upon proof submitted, and not upon mere declarations or statements. I think I have answered the Senator from Oregon, and I think I have answered pretty well the remarks of the Senator from Indiana about its being a mere sham, a mere pretense, a mere debating society. Why, sir, if there ever was, in my judgment, a legal body in any State in this Union it was that capitol legislature, every member of whom had the credentials of his election, presided over in the senate by the lieutenant-governor according to requirements of the constitution of the State, and the house of representatives organized by the speaker of the last house of representatives in conformity to the laws of Alabama. I am not going to say that all there were elected; but if there had been any man there who was not elected under the laws of Alabama, his seat could have been contested by any person claiming it. But no contest was made. In a spirit, however, of revolution the republican members that were elected, less than a quorum in either house, assembled in a court-house, a place belonging to the United States Government and not to the State of Alabama, and there called in the aid of others, enough to make a quorum, men who never had a pretense of being elected; and that was the legislative body that was set up as the lawful Legislature of Alabama, a legislative body that in my judgment had no status, but was revolutionary from beginning to end, and as I believe a full investigation upon proofs and facts would have shown and disclosed. It may be that the Senate, in the absence of such proof, upon the statements made and submitted in the report which was presented, not upon proofs, not upon the oaths and affirmations of witnesses, may have passed upon it; but at the present session of Congress, I hold, that when the proof was offered, when the tender was made of an investigation into the facts, the committee ought to have investigated and submitted to this Senate the proofs in reference to the facts.

I say, therefore, Mr. President, that the case of Pinchback is an entirely different case from that which was presented by Mr. Sykes. It cannot be assimilated to the Sykes case in any respect. He came here, not representing a legislative body, not representing a body clothed with the forms of law, but representing a body that was foisted into power by the illegal order of Durell enforced by Federal bayonets, and the report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections showed conclusively that the Legislature was defeated by about 10,000 votes. It was not composed of men who had either the authority of law or the votes of the people; and Pinchback himself was a party in the revolution, so that whatever equity he might otherwise have had is destroyed by his own act; it is the settled doctrine of the courts of this country, legal and equitable, that no man shall be permitted to take advantage of his own wrong.

The Senator from Indiana, on Monday, spoke of outrages in Louisiana. Yes, sir; there were outrages; outrages which will go down the pages of history; which will be remembered, long after the present generation shall have passed away, as a blur and a dark, damning spot upon the record of American history. Yes, sir; there was outrage, when the rights of the people of Louisiana were overthrown by Federal power, when even the President of the United States lent himself to a conspiracy that was formed in Louisiana for the purpose of depriving the people of that State of their just rights and of the legal form of government——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I call the Senator to order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Well, sir; on what ground?

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DAVIS in the chair.) The Senator from Vermont will state his point of order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My point is that he is speaking language not fit for this Chamber——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I say, sir, that the people of Louisiana——

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator will be kind enough to stop. When he says the President of the United States lent himself to a conspiracy to deprive that people of their rights, I submit he is not in order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of the President of the United States, as I have before said in discussing this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like the Chair to rule on the point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair of course must rule the point of order well taken; but the Senator from Delaware has said that he did not mean any reflection, and I take it nothing more is necessary.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Whether the point be well taken or not, I have said heretofore in discussing this question that I had hoped that the President of the United States was not appriscd of the fact that there was a conspiracy; and when I used the word "lent" I did not mean to say that he was himself a party to the conspiracy, but if I had said so I should have only uttered what I know many people believe. I wish, however, in debate not only to be courteous to the President of the United States, but courteous to my brother-Senators and to everybody else. I think, so far as I understand the amenities of private or the courtesies of public life, I have been as careful to observe them as any gentleman on this floor. The Senator from Vermont, who may be very quick in his perceptions, is not always the most observant Senator, in my opinion, of the courtesies due to Senators or due to other persons.

But I do say that there was a conspiracy; I do say the facts prove that it was a conspiracy, and the facts further prove that that conspiracy sought the interposition and aid of the Federal power to obtain its object. I hope the President of the United States was ignorant of what was going on. I do not therefore mean to say that the President of the United States knew what was going on; but I do say that there was by the custom-house officials and the Federal officers in Louisiana, and Pinchback himself, according to the evidence had, was a party to the conspiracy to defeat the will of the people; to overthrow that will and to institute over the people a usurpation and a tyranny. Unfortunately it was done by the aid of Federal power, which I repeat is a disgrace and a blur upon free institutions, and will be so regarded in the future history of this country.

The Senator from Indiana predicts that there will be further outrages during the coming presidential campaign. That Senator scents blood afar; he is always ready to imagine and suspect that something will be wrong on the part of the democrats in the Southern States. Sir, I have seen nothing, I have heard nothing, that justifies the least suspicion on the part of the Senator from Indiana that the democrats of the Southern States are to rise in hostility and murder and shed the blood of the colored people among them. What proof is there that so grave a suspicion should be uttered in the Senate of the United States that such is the intention of the good people of the Southern States? Why, sir, there is no people in this broad land that have exhibited for the last three or four years a greater reverence for law, a stricter observance of the requirements of law. There is no people on the face of the earth that have been more humiliated, and in their humiliation—I had like to have said in the degradation that has been fastened upon them—they have been carefully observant of the requirements of law, lest they might provoke a spirit of hostility in the northern mind. And yet with that spirit manifested throughout every State in this Union the Senator from Indiana rises in his place and proclaims in the hearing of the people of the United States that during the present presidential campaign there is to be murder, there is to be outrage, there is to be bloodshed; and thus "the bloody shirt" is flaunted again in the face of the American people. Sir, that shirt is worn out. It did not win at Cincinnati; it will not win in November next.

It is time the country had peace and repose; it is time that these wild passions should cease to animate the discussions of honorable Senators; it is time that the voice of peace and harmony should be heard throughout this land. Are not the industries of this country prostrate? Is not every interest of the country suffering because of this continual agitation, this continual alarm, this continual threat of trouble and discord? Go where you will, travel east or west, north or south, and the voice of lamentation, I will not say of woe, but the voice of regret at the depression of business, the complaint that honest men are out of employment, is heard everywhere. Go through New England, and your merchants are failing, your factories are being closed up. Go to Pennsylvania, your forges are blown out and your coal-mines are being closed, and thousands and hundreds of thousands of operatives are without employment. Go through your agricultural countries everywhere, and agricultural labor is not properly rewarded, your cereals at a reduced price. Business is stagnant everywhere, the sails of your commerce are flapping idly at your docks, your ships are an unproductive investment, your freights are low, and your commerce is declining. Go to your shipyards, and there the noise of the hammer is not heard as it used to be. Everywhere that you go there is depression in all the business interests of the country, and it is time that this discord was hushed, it is time that we had all united to build up the material prosperity of the country and to restore the harmony which should prevail among the people of these United States.

But, sir, there are fears other than those which the Senator has heard. There are some, too, that may not be wholly groundless. Let me ask at the present time why General Sheridan, the man who only a few short months ago wanted to declare the southern people banditti and try them by military court-martial, has been transferred to the Department of the South, to have charge of Alabama, of Mississippi, of Louisiana, and of Arkansas? Why is that? I will not undertake to say; but I say that there is felt in certain quarters an apprehension that it may be for the purpose of influencing the votes in those States in the election. I do not say that it is so; but I know that men more intelligent than myself entertain fears that that possibly may be the case. All these rumors should be dismissed. We should live in concord, and peace, and harmony; we should hold a fair election, and by the result of that election every law-abiding citizen of these United States would most cheerfully abide.

But, Mr. President, I must close. You propose by this resolution to take $20,000 out of the public Treasury and give it to P. B. S. Pinchback. I say "give it." It does not belong to him upon any principle, legal or equitable. It does not belong to him in any respect, nor does it come, in my judgment, within the rule heretofore acted upon by the Senate of the United States; but it is a gratuity, clear and absolute; nothing less, nothing more. How will you go home and justify this donation to your constituents; how will you tell the poor man whom you meet depending on his daily labor for his bread; how will you tell the farmer at his plow who is toiling in the hot sun for bread to support his wife and children; how will you tell the mechanic who labors at the anvil or labors in the shop; how will you justify that vote when you tell them that you took $20,000 out of the public Treasury of this country, which they had helped to put there by taxation, or which they will be compelled to replace by taxation; how will you justify it to that class of men?

You may regard it as a small matter; but sometimes the straws are said to break the camel's back, and if this should prove the item that calls the public attention to the wasteful extravagances of this Government under republican rule, I say let it be. I know that throughout this broad land there is a desire for retrenchment and reform. It was my fortune a few days ago to meet in council representative men from every part of this Union; and from every quarter, from every tongue, from every lip, I heard repeated the demand of the people of this whole country for "reform and a restoration of the Government to its former purity and economy." That wish was met, that demand obeyed and expressed in the nomination made at Saint Louis of a man who has guarded well the interests of the people in his own State and reduced their annual taxation from more than $15,000,000 to $8,000,000. The country everywhere hails that nomination as the assurance of deliverance, and from Maine to California, from the lakes to Mexico, from field and city, from hamlet and village, from cottager and from capitalist, wells up the approving response, "We hail the day when the Government at Washington is to be reformed and purified by the man who has reformed and purified the government of his own State." Then will "the winter of our discontent be made glorious summer by this sun of York." Let me assure our republican friends he will be here on the 4th of March. I leave this question and shall vote against the resolution.

Mr. MERRIMON. I offer a substitute for the resolution. I move to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That the sum of $5,000 be allowed to P. B. S. Pinchback to pay the reasonable expenses incurred by him as contestant for a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

Mr. President, I did not concur in the report made by the committee, and am not therefore in any sense bound by it. At the same time I do not concur in the view taken by my friend from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY] who has just taken his seat. I may say that in my judgment Mr. Pinchback was in no sense entitled to a seat in this body. I will go further and say, that I do not believe he had the shadow of a claim; but a very large and respectable minority of the Senate believed otherwise. They voted that their deliberate judgment was otherwise. They said by their votes and by their speeches, and upon their consciences, that they thought he had a right to sit in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Louisiana from the 4th of March, 1873, for six years next thereafter. In my judgment, the Senate is bound to pay some respect to the judgment of that large minority and allow that there was some ground for contest, and in the application of a reasonable rule that ought to apply in all cases like this, the contestant ought to be allowed his reasonable expenses incurred in that behalf, and no more. I think there are various good reasons, very often, why a contest should be made for a seat in the Senate as well as a seat in the House, and where there is reasonable ground for such contest, it is just to the contestant, although his right shall be denied at last, that he should be paid his reasonable expenses incurred in the contest. If that were not so, very often the contestant, by reason of his poverty, or his unwillingness to hazard expense, would not be able to assert his right, whereby great injustice would be done to him, and possibly greater injustice to his State and the country generally. The proper rule, in my judgment, in such a case is—I am sure I am correct and I think it must commend itself to the judgment of everybody—that the reasonable expenses of such contest ought to be paid, and not a farthing more.

In reflecting over the matter, it is impossible for me to ascertain by examination or by any sort of reasoning how it was that the Senate ever adopted the rule and practice of allowing a contestant the salary of a Senator for the time occupied in the contest. It seems to me that it is not only not founded in reason, but that it is exceedingly unwise and impolitic. Very often it encourages, as I believe it did in this very case, persons having no claim, or scarcely the shadow of claim, to come here to contest the right for years, confidently expecting in the end that the Senate would allow such contestant the pay that he would have received if he were occupying a seat in the Senate and discharging the duties of a Senator to the country. I remember a case that happened three or four years ago in the Senate where a pretended contestant from my own State who had not the slightest shadow of claim, and yet he was allowed the pay of a Senator for more than one year. The contest seemed to have been kept up on his part or on the part of his friends to the end that he might realize this salary, with not the slightest hope that he would ever be admitted to a seat or that he had any right to be admitted. The manifest effect of such a practice as this, of such a policy as this, is to encourage persons who have no reasonable ground of claim to come to the Senate and contest the right to a seat here. That it has had this effect in many cases I do not doubt. I believe that the only way to suppress such an evil is to adopt the reasonable rule, the just rule, that where the Senate is of opinion that there was reasonable ground of contest—and that is material—the contestant, though he may not be admitted to a seat in the Senate, shall be paid his reasonable expenses. That is the true and reasonable rule.

This rule ought to apply to the case of Pinchback. In my judgment he did not have a reasonable ground of contest, but, as I said a moment ago, a very large minority of the Senate said that he did have reasonable ground; they voted so, and it is my duty, I am bound by my obligation as a Senator, to pay high and profound respect to the judgment of that large minority. They said that in their judgment he did have reasonable ground of contest, and inasmuch as he had reasonable ground of contest, in the application of the rule I have laid down, which I believe to be just, the Senate ought to allow him a reasonable sum of money to pay his expenses incurred in that behalf. I think such an allowance ought to receive the sanction of the Senate and of every just person, having due regard to the views of the minority and the interests of the public.

I have said that $5,000 is sufficient for that purpose. Am I correct in that? Is that a reasonable sum? The contest was pending for three years. A thousand dollars a year for the time that he necessarily was detained here looking after his case would pay all the reasonable expenses he would be at in this city. He was here necessarily less than half of the three years. That allows him $3,000 to pay the necessary expenses at the capital and $2,000 to pay the incidental expenses and the expenses of traveling to and from the State of Louisiana. It will cover all his expenses. I venture to say that if he was reasonably economical in his habits of life $5,000 would more than pay the expenses he incurred in that contest; and as a matter of justice, as a matter of sound policy which the Senate ought to observe, that is the sum which ought to be allowed him and not one dollar more. That is as much as I am willing to allow him, and as much as I will vote for.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. Without combating the view the Senator states, I make this inquiry of him: What does he do with the fact that in this House and in the other, always, in substance, so far as I know, the rule has been to pay a contestant, without measuring the merits of his claim in a case which would stand long enough to receive the consideration of the House in which it arose, his entire compensation from the time he would have been entitled to his seat had he been seated. What does the Senator do with that fact; and how does he distinguish this case from many other cases in which that has been the judgment of the two Houses?

Mr. MERRIMON. I was going to advert to the precedents which have been cited, and I may as well do it now, although I did not intend to do so at this particular point.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not want to divert the Senator, but I attended to what he said, and I wanted to know how he disposed of that matter in his own mind.

Mr. MERRIMON. On looking at the report made by the Senator from Oregon, I find that every case cited by him has happened since the late war; and I believe that every case cited by him is a case coming from one of the Southern States. There were peculiar circumstances surrounding those cases. The contestants that came here, and who received pay, were, I believe, uniformly of the dominant party, and they were poor persons for the most part, and came from a section of country oppressed, poor, and prostrate. They had very little money; they made strong appeals to the sympathy—certainly not to the judgment—of the Senate and of the House. The Senate and the House inadvertently—perhaps too generously—allowed this practice to spring up which has prevailed only since the late war. I say that the peculiar circumstances, the extraordinary circumstances surrounding the various contestants who have been allowed as is provided by the resolution reported by the committee here, were such as to lead the Senate into a practice that certainly cannot meet the sanction of the Senate itself, or of Congress, or the country. I cannot conceive, I repeat, of any solid reason why a man contesting for a seat here should receive the same salary if he is not admitted as if he had been admitted. I do not think I had the attention of the Senator from New York while I was going on to explain the particular circumstances which led to the decisions of the Senate referred to by the committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg the Senator's pardon; I was diverted for a moment by another Senator.

Mr. MERRIMON. I say every one of the cases cited in the report has happened since the late war, and every one was a contestant coming from the Southern States. Every one of them belonged, I believe, to the dominant party. When they came here, coming from a section that was poor and impoverished, and the most of them poor themselves, they appealed to the sympathy of the Senate rather than to its judgment, they appealed to the sympathy of the House rather than to its judgment, and the Senate and the House inadvertently, in a spirit of generosity and liberality, gave way to a practice that certainly cannot meet the sanction of the Senate now.

Mr. MITCHELL. Will the Senator allow me?

Mr. MERRIMON. Yes, sir.

Mr. MITCHELL. Does the Senator from North Carolina know of any case of a contestant, either since the war or before the war, where a different rule was applied in making compensation from that stated in the report of the committee.

Mr. MERRIMON. I confess I do not; I take it for granted that my vigilant friend from Oregon took his time, and had ample opportunity to examine the matter, and cited every case in his report that could be cited. On looking to his report you will see that it is drawn with care, with some elaboration. I thought then that he cited every case he could. I have not made search for the cases; but going upon the reason of the thing, going upon the justice of the thing, going upon sound policy, which the Senate ought to observe in all cases, it seems to me manifest that this rule is wrong, and if it is wrong the sooner we correct it the better.

Mr. MITCHELL. Then, that having been the rule always heretofore in the Senate, would it not be more consistent with propriety and justice to present the suggestions contained in the amendment of the Senator in the form of an amendment to the rules of the Senate, so as to apply to other cases?

Mr. MERRIMON. We can only change the rule and practice by beginning some time. I propose to begin it now because I believe this is the first case where I as a Senator have been called to vote, and I am the more ready to do it because here is a colored man on the one hand and there is a white man on the other claiming an allowance in like cases. This case of Mr. Sykes, of Alabama, has not yet been decided, but there is a resolution now pending before the Senate proposing an allowance to him just such as it is proposed to make for the contestant in this case, and I shall not support that unless the Senate by its vote in this case shall show a deliberate purpose to sanction the policy which has prevailed since the late war, and only since the late war so far as I can ascertain. There can be no complaint by the friends of this contestant, there can be no complaint by the friends of the contestant Sykes if the Senate shall adopt this reasonable rule, and it will correct an evil, an evil and vicious practice, a reckless expenditure of money which encourages men to come here and make contests where there is no reasonable ground for them.

I believe that my amendment ought to prevail on the reasonable ground that contestants ought not to be driven from the Senate. They ought to be encouraged to come where there is reasonable ground for contest, and the Senate must be the judge of that. Where a large minority, as in this case, say that there is reasonable ground, I think it a case where a reasonable allowance ought to be made, although a majority of the Senate decide otherwise; but if it were manifest that the contestant had none and his right met the approval only of a few Senators, in that case the Senate ought to say, "There is no reasonable ground and he ought not to be paid anything." That cannot be said here, however, for I repeat, a very large and respectable minority of the Senate voted upon their consciences and oaths that they believed there was reasonable ground for this contest, and therefore he ought to have his reasonable expenses paid. I believe the same rule ought to apply to Sykes. I believe that Mr. Sykes ought to be allowed his expenses because a very respectable minority said that Sykes's claim was just, although a majority decided otherwise. I think he ought to have a reasonable allowance for expenses, and no more. The present practice, I am sure, whatever the motives and considerations that led to it, is vicious, ought to be abandoned at once, and there is no more proper occasion than the present to begin to correct it.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator will allow me, what inhis theory of this case does he do with the counterpart of this proposition—I think I may call it the counterpart—I mean the practice which says that should some man be chosen to-morrow or in December from Louisiana, and come here next December and be seated to fill the vacancy now existing from that State, he would be entitled to draw his pay from the commencement of the term, so as to receive pay over again for the three years which have gone? What does the Senator, if I may inquire, say is right in that regard, after having paid, as he proposes, reasonable expenses to the defeated contesting claimant?

Mr. MERRIMON. I say in reply to the Senator from New York, without hesitation, that that practice is very wrong. It is paying him who did nothing, who had not even the color of right, who was not here, who was not elected, money for services which he never rendered; and if the law so provides, I believe it is the duty of Congress at once to correct such an abuse.

Mr. CONKLING. Does the Senator say the law so provides?

Mr. MERRIMON. I do not; but I take it that it does or the practise would not prevail.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator will permit me a moment. The Senator said this practice had prevailed only since the war. I think the Senator is entirely mistaken about that, and I happen to turn to two cases, which, as I understand but reflect the general practice. I refer to the case of Mr. Yulee, from Florida. I have here a resolution granting per diem and mileage to Hon. David L. Yulee for contesting the seat of Hon. Mr. Mallory of Florida. That resolution was adopted in 1853.

Mr. MERRIMON. Do you say he was allowed salary?

Mr. MORTON. Per diem and mileage.

Mr. MERRIMON. Although he was not seated?

Mr. MORTON. He was rejected. I have the case also of Frederick P. Stanton, contestant for a seat from Kansas in 1861:

Resolved, That the usual mileage and pay be allowed and paid to Frederick P. Stanton, contesting a right to a seat as Senator from the State of Kansas.

I merely refer to these two instances, which occurred before the war, to show that my friend is mistaken.

Mr. MERRIMON. Well, I was not aware of those cases; I had not examined the cases; but I took it for granted that the Senator from Oregon had cited all the cases he could find on the subject. But, sir, it does not affect the argument that I am making or the position which I occupy.

It is an abuse. It is an abuse that ought to be corrected. It is an abuse in two points of view that are outrageous, in my judgment. One is, that it encourages men who have no reasonable ground of contest to come to the Senate and contest seats. It is an abuse in another point of view, that thousands and tens of thousands of dollars are paid out to contestants who often have not the shadow of a right or a claim; and if I were disposed to cite particular cases and comment upon them, I might make this view of the matter more forcible and clear.

We know how easy it is for abuses to creep into legislation and to creep into the administration of government, and this is one of them; and the practice—whether the law allows it or not—I have not looked to the statute to see how that is, to allow a Senator when he comes in, after the term for which he was elected has begun, to have pay from the beginning of the term, when he has done no service, when in fact he was not elected, is another abuse that ought to be corrected. If there is no law that sanctions it, those who administer the Government ought to be called to account for it, and the practice ought to be suppressed. If the law allows it, it ought to be repealed at once and the abuse corrected in that way. This occasion is appropriate. Here are, as I have suggested, two cases, one a republican and a colored man, the other a white man but a democrat; and a more opportune time could not be presented when the practice should be established of paying a contestant a reasonable sum to pay his expenses incurred in his contest and no more.

In regard to this very contest, if this resolution passes, the contestant will receive from $18,000 to $20,000, more than three times the sum necessary to pay the expenses that he incurred; and, pray, what service did he ever render this country? What service did he do the Senate? What service did he do the State of Louisiana? What effect had his contest but to produce a discussion that lasted and annoyed the Senate and the country, too, for more than three years? If he had known that the practice of the Senate was to make only a reasonable allowance to pay his reasonable expenses, the probability is that the contest he made would not have lasted a third of the time it did, if indeed it had been made at all. It suited his interest to protract the contest as long as possible; he was in better condition out of the Senate than in it if he expected a salary for nothing. The longer the contestant can protract the contest the better for him. He would rather it would never come to an end. He would come here and stay about the Senate, and stimulate his political friends and protract it as long as possible. This remark is applicable not to one party more than to another. We know human nature. We know its weakness. We know how evils of this sort creep in, and we ought to know how to correct them when made so manifest as this case makes those to which I advert.

I ask for the yeas and nays on my substitute.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I listened to the remarks of the Senator from North Carolina, and it struck me that there was a great deal of good judgment in what he said; but this is the conclusive answer to it, I think: that every act, whether it is a contract, the performance of a duty, or the commission of an offense, must be regulated by the law that exists at the time, and not by a law that is made afterward. It would be a very hard thing, after all this protracted attendance here by Mr. Pinchback, after all the trouble and excitement and anxiety, if we should make a new rule. If my friend will introduce a proposed law carrying out his views, making it applicable in the future, I think I should agree with him; but as it is, I cannot consent by my vote to change at the present time the law in reference to what has transpired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Before the vote is taken upon this proposed amendment, I wish to say just one word, not to enter at all into the general discussion. Upon one or two occasions, when this question has been up, I have taken the position which is taken by the Senator from North Carolina; that is to say, as a matter of principle, if it were a new question, it seems very clear that the safer and better ground, and the just ground, is the one that he maintains. I remember when the Senator from Maryland, no longer a member of this body, [Mr. Hamilton,] asked to take up a resolution making an allowance to Mr. Sykes on the same basis as in this case, I objected to it, and insisted that the true basis was that he should be allowed for his expenses.

I say, therefore, if this were a new question, I should unhesitatingly vote in accordance with the suggestions of the Senator from North Carolina; and if the question shall be presented in the form of a proposed law, I shall so vote. I think, however, as the Senator from New Jersey has just said, that there is very great impropriety, that there is marked injustice, in saying that in this case we will depart from a rule that has been settled from time immemorial in the Senate, and that we will apply a rule to the case of Pinchback that never has been applied to any other case.

There is another thing about it, as far as the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina is concerned. I am not satisfied that the sum proposed by him is a fair and a just sum. If the question is to be settled upon that basis, I think the true way would be to refer the matter to a committee, that it might be investigated. It will not do to say at once that $5,000 is an adequate sum. I can well see that upon that basis, taking only the elements that the Senator himself suggested, $5,000 would not be an adequate sum. He says $5,000 would cover all expenses for the three years. I am sure the Senator would not be prepared to say that that was correct as applied to any Senator on this floor. We claim, and claim with justice, that we are barely able to pay our expenses and live on our compensation. Therefore $5,000, it would strike me to begin with, is hardly adequate, and I would be unwilling to say that that should be the sum without some evidence to justify it or to sustain it.

I have suggested to the Senator from Oregon, [Mr. MITCHELL,] who has this resolution in charge, that I was opposed on principle to the rule upon which this allowance is made, as I am; but the authorities cited show that the uniform practice of the Senate is the other way. I do not think it is fair that we shall depart from that rule in this instance, nor do I believe that it would be fair to depart from it in any special instance, but I think that at the earliest day possible this rule should be changed. It seems to me to be exceedingly unfair, quite as unfair as the rule which obtains that if a person gets his seat next December he draws pay back to the commencement of the term. There is neither logic nor justice in any such rule. I do not think there is any in this, but then it has been observed and I feel bound to follow it as the law stands. I do not think it would be just to the person claiming this seat that you should adopt a new rule now and apply it to his case.

I have but one word more to say. To say that Pinchback comes here as a pretender and that it is presumption for him to ask that this money shall be allowed to him, I think is quite unfair.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am sure that I have treated that gentleman with all respect.

Mr. WRIGHT. I am referring to what was said before.

Mr. MERRIMON. I spoke of what he demands.

Mr. WRIGHT. The claim he here sets up has been termed an impudent one on the part of Pinchback, and that, too, at the close of an investigation and discussion as full and exhaustive as any that I have ever known on this floor, when it was determined by a bare majority that he was not entitled to the place. During the time that I have been here there has been no instance, there has been no case, that at all approximates in my mind and judgment in merits looking to the discussion and looking to the action of the Senate. I therefore have no trouble and no hesitation so far as a claim of right is concerned in granting an allowance. The only doubt I have is as to the rule. I feel bound to follow the rule that has been established, but at the earliest opportunity I shall then and at all times do what I can to see that a different rule shall be established.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, notwithstanding the reasons which move me have been stated so well and so clearly by other Senators, as the yeas and nays have been demanded on this amendment and as I shall vote against it, I wish to assign briefly my reasons for that vote.

If I do not feel at liberty to characterize as unsound or vicious the rule which has prevailed in the Senate heretofore, it is because that rule has received the sanction of such names as I find recorded in the affirmative of resolutions illustrating it. I see here an instance in which Mr. Douglas of Illinois, Mr. Everett of Massachusetts, Mr. Seward of New York, Mr. Sumner of Massachusetts, and other Senators recorded their judgment and their vote in favor of the rule which had prevailed and which has since prevailed in the Senate. Speaking in the presence of such names I must abate of course the udgment which might otherwise be mine. Upon the propriety of this doctrine, were it an original question left to my own judgment, I could never ascertain the propriety first of paying to a claimant whose claim is pronounced null the salary and mileage of a Senator, as was done in the instance in my hand, which occurred in 1853, and then when a claimant with proper qualifications, election, and return comes and is seated, paying him over again for all the time which has elapsed before his election took place, and of course before his claim was made. If the Senator from Iowa, and I believe it was he, pronounced that rule unfounded in justice, or reason, or right, I should agree with that statement if I felt at liberty to agree with it, as I should feel but for the very imposing array of names and of judgment which can be found in its favor. Notwithstanding the deference which I feel bound to pay to these precedents and to their makers and authors, I think I may prudently pledge myself to vote as to future cases for any legislative provision or any rule of the Senate which shall adjust more exactly according to the rules of right and justice, as I understand them, this whole matter.

When I come to consider the pending case, I encounter the difficulty stated by the Senator from New Jersey. Not only since the war, as was said by the Senator from North Carolina, but long before the war, in the Senate, and in the House of Representatives up to the time I left it, (I am told by a Senator that the more recent rule there is otherwise,) it has been the practice, it has been the deliberate action of both Houses to allow full compensation in a case like this. In the instance which I have in my hand the vote was 22 to 19, a somewhat close vote, and I find recorded in the negative Senators who are still here and who sit in my vicinity; but with varying majorities, sometimes greater and sometimes less, for a long period of time, as far as there could be a common law of the two Houses, a parliamentary practice which had become indurated by much repetition, the rule has been established that Mr. Pinchback, for example, coming here with any case which so far commended itself to the Senate as to lead to consideration, as to lead to a difference of opinion (I guard my statement in this way because very likely had a man come with a claim wholly preposterous he would have been denied this rule) with a case having enough of merit to elicit inquiry and to result in a serious difference of opinion in the Senate, was entitled to receive, in short, that measure of compensation which he would have received had success and not failure waited upon his claim.

The present claimant came in the presence of that condition of things, of that settled law, if I may call it law, and although not statute law, it was the unwritten and observed law of the Senate; and not, as I understand, by any process or exertion of his own but by repeated orders in the Senate he was deferred and postponed, and again deferred until three years, with the much-coming of all that time, had elapsed, and then by a very close vote it was held, for reasons which, by the by, did not affect him personally, but which went to matters impersonal to him, the organization of the government of the State from which he came, that he was not entitled to his seat. Now for us to proceed at this time not only to express our judgment in favor of another rule for the future, but to make that expression retroactive and apply to this man a measure which has never been meted out to any other claimant as far as I know, seems to me an act of injustice which I have heard no argument of convenience, economy, or otherwise to palliate.

Mr. EATON. Will the Senator give me the name of the contestant in the case to which he has alluded?

Mr. CONKLING. In the book before me?

Mr. EATON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONKLING. I have the Senate Journal of March 17, 1853, in which it appears that—

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution submitted by Mr. Morton—

Not the present Senator from Indiana, but Mr. Morton, from Florida then—the 7th instant, to allow per diem and mileage to the Hon. David L. Yulee during the time he contested the seat of the Hon. Mr. Mallory in the Senate.

And on the question, Shall the resolution pass,

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 22, nays 19.

I heard the other day some Senator remark that Mr. Thomas, of Maryland, was not paid for the time which elapsed while his claim for a seat was pending, and it was also observed that he made no claim for compensation and the question did not arise. If so, that case is not in point either way; and such seems to have been the fact, because I see the action taken in the case of his successor, Mr. Vickers, refers to that circumstance. Omitting, then, instances of this sort, which are hardly instances, as far as I know the rule has been uniform in such a case as this to pay compensation such as is prescribed in the resolution reported from the committee and awaiting our action.

Then the rule of late, since 1862, has been to do another thing, which, I must say, seems to me considerably worse, considerably more indefensible. It is illustrated by what grew out of the case of Mr. Thomas, and I will refer to that one case. On the 8th of June, 1872, Mr. Vickers, then a Senator from Maryland, addressed an inquiry to the presiding officer of this body touching his right to compensation. In that communication it appeared that Philip Francis Thomas was elected to the Senate of the United States by the Legislature of Maryland for six years, commencing on the 4th of March, 1867, and ending on the 4th of March, 1873; that Mr. Thomas was not admitted to his seat, and it is recited that he did not receive compensation, and it is said that he did not claim compensation. That, however, did not affect the immediate question for which I cite this report. On the 7th of March, 1868, which was, as the Senate will see, a year and three days after the commencement of the term for which Mr. Thomas had been elected, George Vickers was elected to the Senate for the residue of the term ending March 4, 1873. Those are the facts on which the question arose, and here is the report of the committee, which concludes thus:

> Your committee report the following resolution and recommend its adoption:
> Resolved, That George Vickers, a Senator from Maryland, is entitled to receive pay as such for the year commencing March 4, 1867.

That is, he is entitled to pay beginning on a day a year and three days before he was chosen; and a year and a still greater length of time before he took his seat; a year during which he was in no expectancy of being a Senator, a year during which nothing proceeded as to him touching the matter of a seat in the Senate; a year during which another man was claiming that seat and but for the contingency of his rejection would have held the seat during that year and all the years succeeding in the six which constitute the entire term. That report is signed I see, by—

ALLEN G. THURMAN.
B. F. RICE.
M. H. CARPENTER.
JOSHUA HILL.
HENRY B. ANTHONY.

I venture to suggest to Senators that if they would aim at a reform in this regard no part of this evil is greater than the part illustrated there. The idea that when some months hence a Senator shall be chosen from Louisiana as to whom no question arises and he comes here and takes his seat, he is to be paid as other Senators are paid, his salary, his mileage for coming, and his mileage for returning, and then over and above that he is to reach back for more than three years and be paid a lumped sum of some $20,000 of accrued earnings before he began to earn anything, or before he ever heard of the possibility of his being chosen, and when the facts and circumstances of the case had not affected him in the estimation of a hair, is not at all tenable. That is not a case where one man was elected, as he insisted, and another man claimed to be elected, and he was engaged in a contention with that man as to which should succeed to the seat, but a case where he was in no sense in question. The Legislature of Louisiana, if it be sitting, reaches out to-morrow and takes some man who is not even in a state of expectancy, more surprised himself than any other citizen of Louisiana, if you choose, and suddenly translates him, if it be a translation, into the Senate of the United States, and thereupon by this doctrine thus construed he falls heir not only to the seat, not only to all the compensation attached to it, not only to everything which concerns every other member of this body, but he also falls heir to a sort of sinking fund, a something which has been running and accumulating somewhere, under some doctrine of chances or peradventure, and which amounts to $20,000.

Mr. COCKRELL. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir.

Mr. COCKRELL. Would the Senator be willing, in such a case as the one he has been illustrating in Louisiana, the Legislature electing next winter a Senator to occupy the seat claimed by Mr. Pinchback, to vote to give him pay from the beginning of the term? Has that been the rule of the Senate?

Mr. CONKLING. Yes, sir; it has been.

Mr. EATON. It never will be again, I hope.

Mr. COCKRELL. I want to know if the Senator would be willing to adhere to that rule? I say for one that I would never sanction it if from the beginning of the Government it had been adopted at each session of every Congress.

Mr. CONKLING. If the Senator from Missouri has honored me with his attention at all, I think he must have inferred something of an unreadiness on my part to vote for such a rule as that. I have endeavored to make that manifest. I have been not arguing, for my remarks do not rise to the height of an argument, but suggesting that in the present case, being a claim for compensation accruing under the law as it stood, upon facts already past, I had great difficulty in treating it as a new question and applying to this present claimant doctrines and reasons which never applied to others, but the reverse.

Now coming to the future claims of a Senator, I infer, from seeing the names of Senators here, and the import of that which they have certified by signing their names, that they thought the law of 1862, which is still a law, contains provisions under which the Senate is in some sort bound in such a contingency as the Senator refers to, namely the election of a successor of this claimant, to go back and pay him over again; and I commenced my remarks by saying that if some Senator would introduce an amendment to that law, or a rule of the Senate, if a rule would reach it, guarding us against this in the future, I thought that would be very wholesome. But when, instead of such a provision for the future, it is said now that we shall turn around in respect of this man, whose rights are fixed, whose rights are vested—if I may so say, and I believe I may as that is a phrase regarded by the law—and uproot this practice as to him, then, as I said before, I find as a difficulty in the way very well and generally understood principles not only of reason, and equity, and good faith, but of law.

I am willing, Mr. President, for one, to vote now for any notice, for any amendment, for any other matter or thing which shall acquaint every citizen of the State of Louisiana and of every other State that, should he accept an election to a vacant seat which has been vacant for three years, that election will imply that he is to receive compensation like every other Senator, neither more nor less, and that it will also imply that he is not to receive compensation for three years during which he rendered no service, during which he never thought of being a Senator, and during which he has, so far as I can see, no more claim in equity or justice to the money than I have or than my friend the Senator from North Carolina.

I am reminded by a Senator near me that the same rule which we are discussing was the rule adopted in the case of the colleague of the Senator from North Carolina. I believe that that Senator himself has said on the floor that so cogently did he feel the injustice of this rule that he offered to his predecessor, the claimant of the seat, every part of the compensation due by the action of the Senate to him anterior to the time when he became seated, and I believe the fact that he did make that offer exposed him on some occasions to some injurious remark. Perhaps it was in reference to that that he spoke when he said that feeling that this compensation was not due to him he proposed to his predecessor, to whom if to anybody it was due, that he should take it, which is a very strong illustration of the view which that Senator took of the justice and propriety of such a provision as this.

Returning from some digression on this subject, I would vote cheerfully for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina if it were offered as an amendment to speak to future cases, to take effect upon men who have no vested rights and who have not proceeded under a different and well-grounded expectation. As to those men I feel bound to observe the law as it stands. As to the present claimant, to be entirely frank, I may admit that I feel a little more careful to see to it that by no act or omission of mine does any injustice visit him because of considerations which have been alluded to, and which I do not choose more pointedly to refer to, but which considerations do not single him out in my estimation as a man who should be visited with any stint of compensation or any stint of consideration beyond other men. I do not mean to imply that there is any Senator moved by the fact that this man's race, or his history, or the circumstances surrounding his claim to a seat in the Senate should make any difference against him. I only mean to say that for one I wish to see to it, I wish to be careful and industrious in seeing to it, that no invidious distinction is made against him.

Mr. MERRIMON. I beg to assure the Senator that the fact of this contestant's race has not in the slightest degree influenced my action.

Mr. CONKLING. The honorable Senator did not understand me to impute that to him; did he?

Mr. MERRIMON. I did not so understand the Senator. In the same spirit manifested by himself in that respect, I desire to say to the Senator and to the country that this fact has in no sense influenced my action. I would do by him just as I would do by the Senator from New York, or any Senator on this floor, or myself, because, if duly elected, he had a right to be here, he had a right to have his rights respected in all respects and to the fullest measure, and I would not want to mete to him any other. If his case was alone here, I might have the same reluctance to ask to see the practice of the Senate changed now; but his case does not stand here alone. Here we have the case of a republican and a colored man on the one hand, and the Senate has also before it for consideration the case of a democrat and a white man on the other hand; so that no invidious discrimination need be made.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would suggest to the Senator that the other case is entirely different in regard to the length of the contest.

Mr. MERRIMON. That is very true; but the rule I insist upon can be applied to the case of Sykes as well as to this case. Sykes not having contested so long, of course the reasonable compensation to him would not be so great.

Mr. CONKLING. The Sykes case is not before the Senate.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is not before us now, but it will be here for our action.

Mr. CONKLING. It is not before us now.

Mr. MERRIMON. Not at this moment, but we know that it will be before us in the course of a day or two.

Touching the force and effect of the practice, I wish to say a word. The Congress is not like a court; it is not bound by precedents like courts of justice. Every case stands upon its own merits, and it is competent for either branch of Congress to decide a question coming properly within its proper jurisdiction according to its special merits. It is true that long practice will have some weight.

Mr. EATON. I would suggest to my friend from North Carolina, following out his present suggestion, that in one of the cases cited by my friend from New York the vote stood 19 against 22, and he says the strongest men in the Senate were against the practice, thus showing what the Senator from North Carolina is now saying. I desire him to enlarge upon the fact that every case stands upon its own basis. There is no general rule at all.

Mr. MERRIMON. I venture this remark, Mr. President, and I do not make it by way of reflection upon any party, that wherever those allowances were made the decision of the Senate was more or less influenced by political considerations, which in my judgment ought not to enter into an allowance of this sort. I believe this allowance should be made just like an allowance made for the services of a master by a court.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to remind the Senator, if he will allow me a moment, that the case in 1853 arose when the Senate was largely democratic. If he will look at the vote—which I will remind the Senator from Connecticut I did not fail to read, and I stated that it was 19 to 22—he will find as I read that Senators like Mr. Sumner, and Mr. Seward, and Mr. Edward Everett were found voting with democratic Senators in the majority.

Mr. HAMLIN. And Mr. Badger.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. Badger also, I am reminded, who was from the Senator's own State. He will find also in the negative the same mixture of politics. The Senator suggested some time ago that most of these cases had arisen since the war. He must remember that since the war the Senate has been republican in majority, but anterior to the war when the Senate was all the time democratic, these cases can be found bristling all along, not only this one in 1853 but several others which I remember without looking to the record.

Mr. MORTON. I will state to the Senator that in the case of Stanton in 1861 the Senate was unanimous.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am not making a point against any party. I believe the practice, with all due respect, to be vicious. It is competent for the Senate to correct it now, and it ought to be done at the earliest moment. Speaking of the distinguished names read by the Senator from New York a moment ago, when we come to remember them we can well see how they gave way. There was not a more generous heart in this world than that of George E. Badger. He could scarcely refuse to give a man his pocket-book, as a pure matter of charity, if he asked him for it. We all know the character of Mr. Sumner and Mr. Seward. They were generous men. A man had simply to ask them for money and he got it. They gave way; that was their fault; they gave when they ought not to have given.

The vote read by the Senator from New York shows that there was a great diversity of opinion and that opinion was about equally divided on that subject; but I need not go into that. The point I am making is that these precedents are not binding on the Senate. While the Senate will pay respect to the practice observed in the past, it is not binding upon the Senate like decisions of a court. The Senate will decide every case upon its own merits. Nor would there be any breach of good faith toward contestants in stopping this practice now. We have Mr. Pinchback on the one hand and Mr. Sykes on the other. At the time they began their contests they had no shadow of right to one dollar to pay them for the expenses incurred in the contest. There was no law allowing them any compensation. If there had been a law, this resolution would be unnecessary. The allowance that may be made now or the allowance that may be made in any case rests entirely in the discretion of the Senate. The Senate must say whether there was reasonable ground for contest, and having decided that there was reasonable ground for contest, (as I say there was in this case by reason of the large minority vote in favor of the contestant,) then in the next place it must decide what is reasonable compensation. I believe the sum which the substitute I have offered allows is ample to cover the expenses reasonably incurred by this contestant. I give him a thousand dollars a year to pay his expenses here and $2,000 to pay his traveling expenses to and from New Orleans. It would more than pay his reasonable expenses; but if there was doubt upon that question I should not have a moment's hesitation about a reference to a committee, as suggested by the Senator from New York, in order to ascertain what were the reasonable expenses. If I took the view some Senators do, that the Senate is bound by this vicious practice—and I do not mean to be offensive to the past or any person of the past—I should not hesitate to vote the appropriation; I should feel bound to vote the appropriation; but I am not so bound. The Senate is not bound by these precedents. This contestant had no shadow of right at the time his contest began to be made to one dollar. Whatever he may get is a pure gratuity. It is the conscience of the Senate that moves the Senate to allow him a reasonable compensation for making a contest which a large minority of the Senate said he had reasonable grounds for doing.

I shall, therefore, without compromising my conscience in any measure, vote for the substitute which I have offered; and I repeat again that I will make this rule apply, so far as I am concerned, not only to this contestant but in the Sykes case and in any case which shall happen while I have the honor to hold a seat in this body.

Mr. MORTON. I merely rose to express the hope that we may have a vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. DAVIS in the chair.) The question is on the substitute offered by the Senator from North Carolina, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote for the substitute, and if it is adopted afterward vote against the resolution as amended.

Mr. McDONALD. I ask that the substitute be reported.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all after the word "resolved" in the resolution reported by the committee and to insert:

That the sum of $5,000 be allowed to P. B. S. Pinchback to pay the reasonable expenses incurred by him as contestant for a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Louisiana.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll on the amendment.

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On all matters of a political character I am paired with my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] This I deem to be somewhat a political question. This gives $5,000. I would not perhaps vote for it at all; but the Senator from Massachusetts if present would vote "nay."

Mr. KEY, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] As this seems to be considered one I shall not vote. If present he would vote "nay," and I should vote "yea," on this amendment.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON.] I take it he would vote against this amendment, and I should vote for it.

Mr. MORTON. I suggest to the Senator to vote in order to insure a quorum.

Mr. MERRIMON. At the request of the Senator from Indiana, upon my understanding with the Senator from Arkansas, I vote "yea" in order to insure the presence of a quorum.

Mr. PATTERSON. I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] If present he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 10, nays 31; as follows;

YEAS—Messrs. Cockrell, Davis, Jones of Florida, Kelly, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Saulsbury, and Withers—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—31.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hamilton, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Key, Maxey, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—32.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs on the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am inclined to vote in favor of this resolution because as far as I understand it the previous practice of the Senate warrants it, although I think that practice is founded on a wrong principle. In order to dispose of the question if we may, I move to amend the resolution by adding to it the following as a guide in other cases, which I believe to be the sound principle upon which we ought to proceed:

Resolved, That hereafter in cases of disputed claims to seats in the Senate no other or greater allowance shall be made to a defeated claimant than in such case shall seem to the Senate just.

Resolved, That in no case shall any pay be allowed to a Senator to begin earlier than his election or appointment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I would favor that, as far as I am concerned, as an amendment provided it does not apply to cases now pending. I do not know what was the intention of the Senator in moving it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It does not so apply by its terms. It is "hereafter in cases of disputed claims," cases hereafter arising.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should not be willing to vote for it if it applied to any cases now pending.

Mr. LOGAN. It is all right if you change the word "hereafter," so as not to apply to cases now before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. It should read "in cases hereafter arising."

Mr. EDMUNDS. I modify the amendment to meet the views of the Senators, so as to read:

Resolved, That in cases of disputed claims to seats in the Senate hereafter arising, no other or greater allowance shall be made to a defeated claimant than in such case shall seem to the Senate just.

Resolved, That in no case shall any pay be allowed to a Senator to begin earlier than the date of his election or appointment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as modified, to the resolution of the committee.

Mr. EATON. I hope the honorable Senator will not offer that as an amendment to the resolution. I am very willing and ready to vote for the principle contained in the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, but I cannot vote for it in connection with this resolution. I shall be very glad to have the Senate take action on the subject by a separate resolution, and not marry it to this matter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator does not give any reason for that opinion.

The amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question recurs upon the resolution, as amended.

Mr. WITHERS. I move to strike out all after the word "Louisiana" in the resolution reported from the committee and insert the following:

That Francis W. Sykes, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Alabama, and that Joseph Segar, claiming to have been elected a Senator from the State of Virginia, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which they claimed to have been elected up to the period of the adjudication of such claim by the adverse action of the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that to strike out what has just been inserted on my motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it has been offered as an amendment to the resolution reported from the committee.

Mr. WITHERS. It is an amendment to the resolution offered by the committee.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the Senator from Virginia will not attempt to encumber the resolution by that provision. As far as the Sykes case is concerned, there is a resolution pending here in charge of the Senator from Tennessee [Mr. COOPER] which the Senate will consider at any time, I have no doubt, that he asks it. As far as Segar's case is concerned, it is not before the committee at all and I do not know anything about it.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate very briefly by stating the reasons which induce me to offer the amendment.

It seems from the vote of the Senate, as well as from the declarations made by the Senator who reported the resolution, and I believe all the Senators who have spoken in favor of its adoption, that the uniform action of the Senate has been in this direction. While a great many Senators admit in terms that the rule is subject to abuse, and that probably in this case itself it may give rise to doubts, and that it is very desirable to effect a reformation in that particular, all who favor the resolution say that we are governed by precedent established by the previous action of this body and it is imperatively necessary that we shall pass the resolution as it was reported.

Assuming that to be true, I base upon that declaration of the wishes of the Senate my argument for the adoption of the amendment which I have suggested. The case of the applicant from Alabama, Mr. Sykes, is so well understood by the Senate and the fact is so thoroughly appreciated that it stands precisely on the same ground as the case which is under consideration, that I need not dwell upon it; but with regard to the other claimant I have a word or two to say, because I desire to bring his case clearly and unequivocally before the Senate, many Senators being I know entirely ignorant of the merits of the case and of the standing of the applicant, as well as of what I believe to be the injustice with which he has been treated by the refusal or neglect of this body to take action in his case.

The chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with somewhat, as I thought, of unnecessary warmth, repelled an intimation that that committee has ever acted in any manner that would justify the allegation that they made any discrimination for or against any person whose case came before them; but when I recall to his recollection and that of the Senate the fact that this applicant, Joseph Segar, has had a claim pending here for years; that when his petition was presented to the Forty-third Congress, claiming his pay and compensation as a Senator of the United States by virtue of an election by the Legislature of Virginia and under the sanction of credentials signed by the name of the executive officer who at that time was the head of the Virginia government as recognized by the United States; when I recall to their recollection the fact that the validity of that government had been recognized by every Department of our National Government, legislative, executive, and judicial; and when I recall again to their memories the fact that that claim was permitted to sleep and die with the Forty-third Congress without any report ever having been made upon it, and that the same petition, based upon the same grounds, was presented to the present Congress, the Forty-fourth, first referred to the Committee on Claims, and upon a report from that committee very properly referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that up to the present time, among the closing days of this first session of the Forty-fourth Congress, no report has emanated from that committee whatever upon this case—I think that I have established the claim upon the part of this constituent of mine to recognition at the hands of the Senate, and that it will also be seen that his case has not been treated with that consideration and equal fairness which has been adjudged to other claimants.

What are the facts with regard to this applicant? I think his petition has been waived aside, and in the minds of many Senators they have declined to consider and investigate the matters it embodies, because, they say, he was elected by a little Legislature which convened in Alexandria, and which never did represent the sovereignty of the State of Virginia, and was not its valid and legal Legislature. I would recall to the recollection of Senators present the fact that whatever circumstances may have surrounded the origin of that Legislature, whatever doubts might have arisen in the minds of different Senators as to the validity and legality of the body which claimed to represent the sovereignty of the State of Virginia, and the executive which did exercise actually all the powers of the governor of the State, the recognition of that body by the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the United States Government has precluded all further question upon that point. I do not think it necessary to go behind the fact of this recognition in order to argue as to the validity of that Legislature. I need only mention the fact that the passage of the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery throughout the broad limits of this nation owed its efficacy to the vote of that very Legislature which I have now alluded to; that the vote of the State of Virginia as passed by its Legislature was absolutely and indispensably necessary to give validity to the thirteenth amendment abolishing slavery. There was the highest possible exercise of legislative power; there, it seems to me, was the highest possible recognition of the validity of the existence of that Legislature and that State government. I think, therefore, it is too late now to raise this plea as a bar to the claim of this poor, old, poverty-stricken gentleman, who comes and asks at your hands some small compensation which is due him under the laws of the land; and it is not only due to him legally, but due to him in every moral and equitable aspect that the case can present for our consideration. He was a Union man—intus et in cute. From the very beginning of the struggle between the two sections of this country he took his stand on the side of the Union, and he was loyal to the flag from the beginning to the end of it. What have been the consequences to him individually? His loyalty and his devotion to the Union of these States has resulted in dragging him down from a position of pecuniary independence to one of almost abject poverty. It has deprived him of official position; and the very Government for whose benefit and in defense of whose rights he made all these dearest sacrifices has turned a deaf ear to every appeal that he has made to them, whether for compensation for property sacrificed for the benefit of the Government or for the recognition of a position to which he had been regularly and legally elected.

Mr. SARGENT. Was he not paid one sum in the House?

Mr. WITHERS. He was paid by the House, but he has never received one cent in the Senate. The claim which he presents himself here before us is a claim for some compensation for his services as Senator, to which place he was duly elected by the Legislature of Virginia. His credentials which are now on file in your Secretary's office show that they are in proper form, duly authenticated by the signature of the then governor of Virginia.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Do I understand the Senator to say that the same Legislature that elected Mr. Segar was the one that agreed to the thirteenth amendment of the Constitution?

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir; that is the information which I have had laid before me in connection with the subject, and it agrees with my recollection.

Mr. DAWES. I think it was the same Legislature that gave the consent of Virginia to the erection of the State of West Virginia.

Mr. WITHERS. Yes, sir; it certainly was the same Legislature which gave its assent to the formation of the State of West Virginia, and my recollection and information is that it was also the same Legislature which gave its assent to the thirteenth amendment; and that assent was indispensable to secure the requisite number of States to give validity to that amendment.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have always thought that Mr. Segar ought to have been paid something—I do not know how much or for how long—for his services here. He remained here and attended for a long time expecting to be recognized as a Senator. At the proper time on a report of the committee I would be perfectly willing to vote to pay him. Indeed he requested me to present his petition at one time. I did so, and I read all the papers in connection with it. I presented it and it was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, but no report has been made. However, I have to say that I shall certainly vote for no new proposition, especially when embracing a new set of facts, as an amendment to a resolution that has been debated so long as has this Pinchback case. Certainly we ought to dispose of this Pinchback question. I am very glad the Senator from Virginia has called our attention to the case of Segar, because I believe the United States have neglected to give him that recognition which the circumstances would justify in paying him a reasonable sum. I should vote with the Senator from Virginia for doing it, but certainly not on the resolution now before us. The Senator will agree with me probably that it is not a very wise system of legislation after a subject has been thoroughly discussed, with which the Senate is already familiar, to present a new subject embracing different facts, in the nature of an amendment.

Mt. WADLEIGH. Perhaps, Mr. President, what I shall say to the Senate on the case of Mr. Segar will save the Senator from Virginia the necessity of making any further remarks upon that subject. The case of Mr. Segar was referred to me at a previous session of the Senate, but there came to me no evidence in support of the claim and no statement of facts, so far as I could find among the papers, except an extract from a debate in this body upon the claim. In that debate leading democratic Senators, in opposition to the claim, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. THURMAN] among others, said they would never vote for any such proposition. There being no evidence in support of the claim and no facts proved before me that would warrant me in making the report in its favor or against it, I retained the claim in my hands. During the present session of Congress and at a recent day, Mr. Segar has been to me and presented to me evidence in his case which proves facts that I think entitle him to receive payment. It was my purpose so soon as I could get the time to draw up a report in writing and present that report to the Committee on Privileges and Elections and through them to bring it into the Senate.

I, for one, am willing to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia, because I think Mr. Segar is justly entitled to receive the compensation which the amendment provides.

Mr. LOGAN. Would the Senator be willing to add it to this resolution?

Mr. WADLEIGH. I should be satisfied with that. I think it is a just claim.

Mr. WITHERS. I do not see anything incongruous in the amendment which I have suggested. On the contrary, it seems to me eminently right and proper that it should go on this particular resolution, because the resolution itself is predicated upon the assumption that the uniform practice of the Senate in paying those who appear before them as claimants to seats within this body has been so invariably followed that it should be adhered to in the case of Mr. Pinchback. If that be good logic and sound reasoning, it seems to me that it is eminently right and proper that another case which stands precisely upon the same ground, so far as regards certainly the prima facie right, should stand upon the same footing also. I see no incongruity or impropriety whatever in incorporating it in the same resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator indulge me a moment?

Mr. WITHERS. Certainly.

Mr. CONKLING. The distinction which I see between the pending resolution and that case is this: The case of Mr. Segar has never been examined by a committee and reported upon. It may have been examined but no report has been made. I know the reverse is true of Mr. Sykes's case. It seems there has been a report in that case, and I have heard that report indorsed by Senators here in such wise as leads me to suppose there was no objection to it in committee. Therefore if the Senator would offer his amendment to apply to the case of Sykes alone, it might be sustained; but when he proposes an amendment in a case which has never been examined by a committee, which has not received the report of a committee, he must see I think that he requires me and other Senators as little instructed as I am to go rather blindfold in voting upon a case of which I have no knowledge as a Senator in the ordinary course of business, because it has not been considered before, and of which I have no advice from a committee because no report has been made.

Therefore I suggest to the Senator that if he adheres to his amendment he had better confine it to Mr. Sykes. Whether after what I have heard from the Committee on Privileges and Elections there will be objection to that, I do not know, but I infer not. Certainly as to Segar it rests upon a different foundation.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. WITHERS. I appeal to Senators. I want to make a remark or two in reply, but I will yield to the Senator from Indiana if he wishes to say a word.

Mr. MORTON. As to whether Mr. Segar ever presented his credentials here the committee has no knowledge. I have none. It is only a matter of rumor. It is a matter that ought to be examined by getting at the facts and reporting upon them. The Senator from New Hampshire a year or two ago said he had no evidence of such a fact. From what was said by the Senator from Virginia, I think the subject ought to be examined and reported upon. I hope there will be no attempt to delay the passage of this resolution by putting a matter of this kind upon it.

Mr. WITHERS. There is a good deal in the suggestion made by the Senator from New York and also in the suggestion made by some other Senators on the floor with regard especially to the case of Mr. Sykes as to the fact that his case has been considered and reported upon by the committee and is in charge of a Senator of this body, as I am informed. My limited experience here has caused me perhaps to be guilty of a slight discourtesy toward the Senator who has it in charge by moving without his assent the amendment so far as it relates to Sykes. Therefore I withdraw that portion of the amendment which relates to the claim of Mr. Sykes.

Mr. MITCHELL. The Senator means the claim of Mr. Segar, I suppose.

Mr. WITHERS. If Mr. Sykes's claim is in the hands of a member of the Senate, reported from the committee, then I allude to that case; not otherwise.

Mr. LOGAN. I want to say, if the Senator from Virginia will allow me, being a member of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, that I certainly have no knowledge of this Segar claim, except such knowledge as we gain merely by rumor. I have no right to question what he says about it and about its being in the hands of the committee, but it certainly ought to be reported on to the Senate so that the facts may be had. I did not know before that the Senator from New Hampshire had charge of the case. Certainly it was not reported back to the committee; at least, I had never heard of it. I only say that it ought to be reported to the committee and by the committee reported to the Senate before it is acted upon, so that we may have the facts and the Senate may act intelligently. I have no disposition to oppose the claim of Mr. Segar; but I cannot vote for his claim without some knowledge of it, and I certainly lack the knowledge in reference to his services or his election or anything else in connection with it. These other cases (the case from Louisiana and the case from Alabama) I do know something about, because I have some evidence in regard to both of them; and I am willing to vote for both of them, although I would rather have them considered separately. One member of the committee has charge of the case of Mr. Sykes, and it will doubtless pass the Senate whenever called up—at least, if this case passes, it certainly will; but the case of Segar, I think, ought to be examined and reported upon before the Senate acts upon it. I certainly do not want to act upon it myself; I do not want to vote for it or against it without some knowledge of the facts.

Mr. WITHERS. The Segar claim was presented to the Senate in the Forty-third Congress. It was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, from whom it was never reported. The reason of the refusal and neglect of the committee I now fully understand from the remarks which were made by the Senator from New Hampshire, who has it in charge. I did not intend in what I said before, and do not intend in what I say now, by any means, to reflect on the fairness of the Senator who has the matter in charge, nor of the committee, which of course could not act upon it until it was reported back by the subcommittee to whom it was referred. But I think that Mr. Segar and those who represent him on this floor had a right to assume that it was designed by the Senate that no report should be made on his case inasmuch as it had been so long in the hands of the committee, he himself never being cognizant of all the facts in the case, and had not been reported by that committee. It seems to me a good time to ingraft his case upon that of the claim from Louisiana in order that the Senate may indicate very clearly its purpose of carrying out what has been the uniform practice of the Senate in the case of all other applicants. For that purpose I desire to have it put upon the resolution. I see no greater impropriety in investigating the facts connected with his election than I have seen in the investigation of the facts which every member thoroughly made as to the circumstances connected with the election of the claimant from Louisiana. I see no reason why all the facts which bear upon the case should not be elicited now under the operation of the amendment which I have suggested, and why a vote should not be had upon it just as well as if it were reported from the committee. I know that both parties, democratic and republican, at the time it was introduced in the Forty-third Congress gave the claim the cold shoulder. They did not pretend to look into the merits of the case or investigate it in any respect, but merely assuming that the Legislature that professed to elect him had no legal existence, they whistled his case down the wind and left poor old Mr. Segar a prey to misfortune.

Mr. SARGENT. If a committee of this body upon an examination of the facts shall report that Mr. Segar is entitled at our hands justly to a sum of money I will give that report respectful consideration, and if satisfied that it is correct will vote the money, but upon no other terms. I certainly would not vote for a proposition to make it a rider on the Pinchback matter, and it seems to me strange that my friend from Virginia, ordinarily discreet as he is, should require a black horse to get his white horse through the race.

I know something with reference to the Segar case. I had heard for a number of years past that there was some claim of Joseph Segar for remuneration by Congress and it sounded familiar to me, and yet it may be that any impression which now rests in my mind from that statement may do him injustice, and that Mr. Segar may have a perfectly proper claim. I remember that Mr. Segar was in the Thirty-seventh Congress, which was almost entirely a republican Congress. I was a member of it and with the majority, an enormous majority responsible for what happened. Mr. Segar came claiming to represent a constituency somewhere in Virginia; some dozen or two persons from the evidence taken had voted for him and elected him to the House. Finally he was allowed to come in, although he was a volunteer candidate. He came in simply because nobody else ran and nobody else thought there would be a chance to come in. My recollection of that is not clear, but I think that subsequently he was not allowed to come in and there was some sum of money paid for him on this second arrangement of the matter, from $3,000 to $9,000, I forget which. At any rate a very substantial sum of money was paid to Mr. Joseph Segar.

It seems, then, there was an opening, it being in some sort an inchoate State, to get into the Senate of the United States. This is the last part of the matter, the third act of the drama, which I should like to understand before I can vote understandingly for this measure. It is barely probable that it was a proper Legislature; it is barely probable that after the State of West Virginia was organized there was enough of what might be called loyal counties of old Virginia left to organize them into a species of volunteer government and to claim to have a Legislature, a governor, &c., with power to elect a Senator in Congress, and that we ought to recognize the claim so set up. I do not desire to prejudice that matter, but, as I understand it at present, I am not disposed to assent to it. I understand Mr. Segar took the place of a Senator-elect for the State of Virginia who died. This government sprang up in revolutionary times; it had a meager constituency, and two men claimed to represent the old State of Virginia. When one of those died an effort was made to put Segar in his place, and the claim was that the Senate of the United States should receive him. The Senate did not seat him. The claim may be good, but it will require a careful report of a committee, well fortified by facts, before I can assent to it, especially as I am not disposed to give money from the Treasury of the United States to a man simply because he is old and poor. It is a circumstance we could certainly argue more cases on, and subsequently we shall be asked to pay a large amount of money; and it looks very much like a habit or a system of making claims of this kind, which leads me in a new one to be particularly scrutinous.

I do not want to speak in any spirit of unkindness toward Mr. Segar. As far as I remember him he was rather an agreeable old gentleman in those times. But I say we ought not, unless there is good cause for it, to vote money out of the Treasury; and certainly it is rather an inauspicious time to require a resolution in favor of a black horse to carry a white one.

Mr. WITHERS. That is only an indication that the bottom rail has got on top. I want to see that my friend did not misunderstand me, for I hope I did not so badly express myself as to give legitimate ground for assuming that I had predicated this claim for Segar on the ground that he was old and poor. I claim it on the ground that he was elected by a Legislature and his credentials were signed by a governor who by the official action of the United States in all its departments had been recognized as the legitimate Legislature and the legitimate governor of Virginia. I claim it on that ground. I presume that that recognition, I will say here, would have precluded any necessity for going behind it to investigate the polls to ascertain how many votes were cast in favor of any single member of that Legislature, or of how many members it was composed, or anything of that sort. The fact that it had been recognized by all the departments of Government as a legal Legislature of Virginia, it seemed to me, settles all that question, and the Senate would not desire and we had no right to go behind their action in the premises.

I think the argument I urged in behalf of the claim I presented may not properly be regarded as having no foundation further than that the applicant was an old and a poor man. I adduced these circumstances merely to show (and I think it was a perfectly legitimate deduction from them) that it is a case where there was a legal right of which the applicant had been denied, and in consequence of that denial he had been reduced to very low means, if not entirely to poverty, and that his age precluded him now from doing much in his own behalf; and these facts rendered the case still stronger why his claim should receive the favorable or just consideration at least of the Senate of the United States.

Mr. MORTON. I simply rise to express the hope that the friends of the original resolution will allow the vote to be taken. If the Senator from Virginia does not choose to withdraw his amendment, let the vote be taken upon that.

Mr. DAWES. I will detain the Senate but a moment. I do not know that the Senator from California spoke of Segar's case accurately. I was upon the House Committee of Elections, which had the examination of Mr. Segar's case each time it came before them. My memory is not very accurate, but the first time he came into the House he occupied a seat about six months. After this, upon a report of the Committee of Elections, he retired from the House. The next time he was admitted by the House, according to my recollection, against the report of the Committee of Elections, and he was compensated in this way for his contest on the occasion when he was unsuccessful. Of course when he was admitted there was no occasion for voting compensation.

Mr. SARGENT. Will the Senator allow me to ask him in what Congress did he sit and was rejected? Was that in the Thirty-seventh or Thirty-sixth Congress?

Mr. DAWES. It was at the beginning of the war that he first came in.

Mr. SARGENT. The Thirty-seventh Congress?

Mr. DAWES. I do not know which Congress it was by number. It may have been the Thirty-seventh. At that Congress he was rejected, after having occupied the seat about six months. At the next Congress he came and was admitted, according to my recollection, against the report of the committee. At that time it was the policy in the other branch, which—if I may be allowed to allude to what occurred at this end of the Capitol—governed this branch as well, to admit to representation any portion of the States that were in rebellion as fast as the Army wrested them from the rebellion; and so men were hurried in. It was supposed that it contributed largely to the re-establishment of the Government in those States. Mr. Segar was compensated for the unsuccessful contest by having his claim put into a resolution with five others, six of them in all, and they were allowed $3,000 apiece for their expenses.

Mr. SARGENT. There were three of them.

Mr. DAWES. There were six, I think.

Mr. SARGENT. John Kline, Joseph Segar, and John M. Butler, as shown by the Journal.

Mr. DAWES. I know there was a resolution embracing six, and I thought his name was in that. It was $3,000 apiece, was it not?

Mr. SARGENT. Yes, sir.

Mr. DAWES. The question about his claim to a seat in the Senate, according to my recollection, was this: There was a Legislature that purported to be the Legislature of Virginia which held its sessions in Alexandria. That Legislature, as I have said, was recognized by every department of the Government of the United States. Its acts were treated as the legal acts of the State of Virginia, and the most important of them all which gave the assent of Virginia to the erection of a new State within its limits, without which the whole proceeding creating the State of West Virginia would have been unconstitutional. There was according to my recollection—older Senators here may correct me—a Senator elected by that Legislature and admitted to a seat by the Senate who died here. He died, I think, of the small-pox in this city, and to fill his place, unless I am mistaken, Mr. Segar was elected by the same Legislature that elected the man who died.

I want to give Mr. Segar something. I always voted against his right to a seat in the House because I did not quite agree with the policy that prevailed at that time. It had all passed out of my mind until brought up here by the Senator from Virginia. If he were elected by that Alexandria Legislature, I do not think that the Senate can afford to go back upon its record by saying that at least it had not any such legal existence as could send a member of this body here. After that, I hope the Senator from Virginia will hold on to the name of Joseph Segar. It may be proper to withdraw it from this resolution, but I hope he will not lose sight of it until that old gentleman receives compensation, who, as he says—and I happen to know that what the Senator from Virginia says is true—sacrificed everything to the cause of the Union when his State was strongly against it.

Mr. WITHERS. I wish to make a correction, before the vote is taken on this question, of a statement which I made. It is this: that the Legislature which elected Mr. Segar did not themselves pass upon the ordinance of secession, but that that Legislature called the convention which did act upon it; and of course if the Legislature was illegal the convention was not legal at all.

Mr. MORTON. I rise to ask for a vote. It is getting late and I hope the friends of the resolution at least will not prevent a vote from being taken.

Mr. SPENCER. I move to strike all out after the word "Louisiana" and insert:

> And Francis W. Sykes, late a contestant for a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, be each allowed an amount equal to the pay and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which they were respectively contestants up to the period of the determination of the respective contests by the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that strike out the part adopted as an amendment?

Mr. MITCHELL. I rise to a point of order. There is already an amendment pending to insert words at the very same place offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order. This is not an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. The Senator from Alabama does not propose this as an amendment to that amendment.

Mr. SPENCER. I supposed the Senator from Virginia had withdrawn his amendment.

Mr. WITHERS. The Senator is correct. I had withdrawn one portion of it, the portion which related to the claim of Mr. Sykes. I did so at the suggestion that it was in the hands of another Senator here and had been reported by the committee, and that it would be discourteous for a different Senator to present it in this way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia, as modified, is pending. This proposition of the Senator from Alabama is not an amendment to that amendment, as the Chair understands.

Mr. SPENCER. I will move it as an amendment to the amendment, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That will be in order.

Mr. ALCORN. Mr. President, the debate has disclosed the fact, as in truth it exists, that there is no precedent attaching to the Senate which should govern the vote of any Senator upon this floor, and I rise to state the grounds upon which I base my support of the resolution to pay Mr. Pinchback. My vote depends on the fact that I believe he was entitled to a seat in this body for the time mentioned in the resolution. As he held in his hands credentials from the governor of Louisiana properly signed, I thought he was entitled to be admitted upon his prima facie case, after the Senate had recognized the governor of that State, and after the executive and judicial departments of the nation had recognized the governor of the State of Louisiana. The Senate, however, decided that he was not so entitled. I vote for his payment because I believe he was entitled to his seat and is entitled to his compensation. In any other case arising here I should exercise my judgment as to the justice of the claim and would stand ready to vote just such compensation as I believed to be proper upon the merits of the particular case presented for action.

There is, in my judgment, no precedent that should govern or control the vote of any Senator. Precedents may attach as to forms, and they apply properly only to forms; they do not apply to substance when cases are before Congress which involve matters of substance.

I follow precedents in matters of form; but in matters of substance touching the revenues of the country, I follow the suggestions of my own judgment and vote according to the dictates of my own conscience. That is the rule that I adopt for myself, and it is the rule that I have acted upon and shall continue to act upon.

Now, with regard to the action of Senators, while I would not be willing to use any term of reproach to any Senator who sees proper to apply for a compensation which he never was entitled to, to apply for payment for a term of service when he was not present and that did not belong to him, yet I should feel that if it was my case I was subject to the reproach of my constituents if I should claim and receive compensation from the Government for services that were not performed by me. And, sir, to show practically my judgment in this matter, I may state that I did not take my seat for ten or twelve months after I was elected to the Senate. There was no one disputing my place; there was no one disputing my title to the seat. When I came here I did as I held an honest man should do, and as I hold to-day an honest man should do; I took compensation from the day that I was sworn in to discharge the duties of a Senator, and no longer, and I would not receive from the Government compensation for that period of time that I chose to absent myself from the Senate after I had been elected a Senator.

Now, one word with regard to the case of Mr. Segar. I wish Senators to understand that when Mr. Segar's case came before the committee for investigation, the principle there set up in his behalf involved a class of cases that belong to the Southern States. How was it with regard to the State that I have the honor in part to represent to-day? Under the proclamation of the President in 1865 the provisional governor of Mississippi called a convention of the people. That convention amended the constitution. That amendment struck down, so far as the State of Mississippi was concerned, the institution of slavery, for that convention declared that slavery should no longer exist in Mississippi. The Legislature followed upon the heels of that convention, and that Legislature ratified an amendment to the Constitution abolishing slavery in the United States, and that Legislature elected two Senators to the Congress of the United States under the proclamation of the President—a Legislature recognized by this Government.

Those two Senators stood outside your door for a long twelvemonth of time, were refused admission, and up to this good hour have received no compensation for their services. That was the precedent then; and yet Senators to-day tell us that always, invariably that when gentlemen have been elected to this body they have been paid a compensation for their time. There was no fourteenth amendment then. We were here. I speak knowingly upon the subject for I was one of that class of Senators who stood outside this door and asked to be admitted upon the credentials which we held in our hands. I held up to the Senate the action of that Legislature. I said: "Here is the adoption of the amendment to the Constitution by the Legislature that elected me to the Senate. You hold good the action of that Legislature in adopting the amendment to the Constitution of the United States abolishing slavery. How then can you disregard the action of that Legislature when it comes to the question of electing a Senator to the Congress of the United States?" But while I stood here with Mr. Segar and others outside asking to be admitted, a gentleman in the other branch of the Congress of the United States introduced a resolution that struck us full in the face. Mr. HALE, if I remember aright, introduced a resolution in about these words: "Resolved, that treason is a crime, and that rebels deserve to be punished;" and that resolution passed the House of Representatives by a unanimous vote, our democratic friends voting to adopt that resolution. Not one dissenting vote in the House of Representatives could be found on that occasion to strike down or resist that resolution. We were threatened with prosecution here for treason rather than that we should be admitted to seats in the Senate of the United States; and when that resolution was adopted I felt very much inclined to go home even without compensation.

But to-day, if Mr. Segar and other gentlemen of his class are to be paid, I claim that the Senators from the State of Mississippi, and the Senators from the State of Alabama, and the Senators from the State of South Carolina, and the Senators from all the Southern States whose Legislatures had voted to adopt the amendment to the Constitution striking down slavery, the benefits of which accrued to the Constitution and made good the thirteenth amendment, should be entitled to compensation; and I ask the committee that shall be empowered to investigate Mr. Segar's case to refer to the files and find there the credentials of each and every Senator from the Southern States who held the same ground that he did, and although they may not show that they did suffer so much for the Union, they could, each and every one of them if alive to-day, I presume, show that they did suffer terrible penalties on account of disunion. I know that I could make some proof in that direction, and I would claim, if the sympathies of the Senate were to have anything to do with it, that we were entitled to come in for a share of the sympathies of the Senate of the United States in voting us compensation.

I believe in truth however, to be serious, Mr. President, that we were entitled to compensation. I believe that the Senators who stood here at that time were entitled to be paid, and the same rule that applied here should attach to the members of the House of Representatives. You collected your taxes; we paid our revenues; you had the benefits of our legislation; the Legislatures were recognized by every department of the Government of the United States; but we stood outside and had no voice in this body or in the other House; and I say that every principle of justice, equity, and good conscience demands that we should be paid. Certainly we should be paid if Mr. Segar's case is to be considered and he is to be paid. He has no better title to his pay than the rest of us.

I have said more, Mr. President, than I intended to say when I rose, and therefore I shall not occupy more time.

Mr. MITCHELL. It is getting very late now and very warm. This matter has been discussed for several days, and I hope we shall have a succession of votes until we close it out.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. SPENCER] moves to amend the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. WITHERS.] The Secretary will now read it as proposed.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. WITHERS] is to strike out all after the word "Louisiana" in the resolution reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and to insert:

And that Joseph Segar, claiming to have been elected a Senator from the State of Virginia, be allowed an amount equal to the compensation and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which he claimed to have been elected up to the period of the adjudication of such claim by the adverse action of the Senate.

It is proposed to amend the part just read by striking out all after the word "that" and inserting:

Francis W. Sykes, late a contestant for a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, be each allowed an amount equal to the pay and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which they were respectively contestants up to the period of the determination of the respective contests by the Senate.

Mr. SARGENT. The question I believe is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. On the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SARGENT. I wish to say one word in reference to the portion of the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia. When this matter of Segar was brought to the attention of the Senate, the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] as shown by the debates, moved "to refer that thing" to the Committee on Privileges and Elections. His attention being called to the fact that he was not treating the petition with sufficient respect, he expressed the apprehension that he was treating it with too much respect. The petition, however, was received, as all petitions are received which are respectful in terms, and referred to the committee. I am sorry that the Senator from Ohio is not here to give us his views on this matter. But in my reading of the laws of Congress passed at various times for the benefit of Mr. Segar it seems to me that Congress has been very generous to him. Certainly the House of Representatives has been. The House of Representatives, in opposition to its Committee of Elections, gave him his seat during one entire Congress. Of course he received the pay of the station. During another Congress it received him and paid him, when it was decided by both the committee and the House that he was not entitled to his seat, the sum of $3,000. And on page 670 of the seventeenth volume of the Statutes I find that Congress made him compensation to the extent of $15,000 besides what had already been paid to him on another account, just probably, but certainly showing that there has been no disposition to treat him unjustly and unfairly. It was enacted:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, directed and required to pay to Joseph Segar, of Virginia, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $15,000, the same being the balance still due him, after deducting what he has heretofore received, for the use and occupation of his farm in Elizabeth City County, Virginia, by the Army of the United States during the late rebellion.

I think this justifies the statement that I made that Congress has dealt very generously with him, and it is nearly time that we begin to be quite just, because these things go along from time to time and always at last Mr. Segar triumphantly prevails and puts money in his purse. I am opposed to this proposition being fastened on the report of the committee, and if it is I shall vote against the whole measure.

Mr. MORTON. The Segar matter is in the hands of the committee. The Senate is not prepared to act upon it. The Sykes matter is in the hands of a Senator who will no doubt take occasion to present it at a proper time. It has no connection with the Pinchback matter. I hope we shall vote these amendments down and adopt the resolution.

Mr. WITHERS. In view of the expression of opinion on the part of so many Senators of a determination to oppose this amendment because it has not been reported on by the committee I will withdraw it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the Senator from Virginia is withdrawn.

Mr. SPENCER. Now I offer my amendment as an amendment to the original resolution. The proposition has been reported by the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Alabama proposes an amendment to the resolution, which will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed to strike out all of the resolution reported by the committee after the word "Louisiana" and to insert:

And Francis W. Sykes, late a contestant for a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, be each allowed an amount equal to the pay and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which they were respectively contestants up to the period of the determination of the respective contests by the Senate.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that the case of Mr. Sykes has been reported favorably from the committee.

Several SENATORS. Certainly.

Mr. MCMILLAN. Does that affect the amendment offered by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. EDMUNDS?]

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; that was adopted.

Mr. CONKLING. This comes in before that; and then that applies to cases arising hereafter.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the resolution.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I shall vote against the amendment. I shall not vote for the resolution with the amendment added. If the Senate see proper to adopt the amendment, they may do so; but for myself, I shall not be betrayed into a vote for the claim of Pinchback which I believe to be illegal, which I believe ought not to pass. This claim of Sykes has been before the Senate heretofore, and it has been discussed. A resolution was offered by the late Senator from Maryland [Mr. Hamilton] which met with but little favor at that time. Suggestions were made that the amount was entirely too large, that Mr. Sykes ought to exhibit an account of his expenditures, and that amount, it was said, would be allowed. That was the way his claim was treated then. Now, when a great wrong to the public Treasury is to be perpetrated by paying out some $20,000 to Pinchback, it is proposed to add, as a sweetening to the dose, an allowance to Mr. Sykes, who heretofore has asked in vain for an allowance.

Mr. MITCHELL. That was all before the report of the committee.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I will vote against the resolution, whether it includes Mr. Segar or Mr. Sykes or anybody else.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama, [Mr. SPENCER.]

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WEST. I offer the following amendment:

Also, that William L. McMillen and John Ray, contestants for the seat vacated by the resignation of William Pitt Kellogg, a Senator from Louisiana, be each allowed pay and mileage as Senators for the unexpired term named.

I will state that these two gentlemen made their appearance as claimants for the seat commencing in December, 1872, and expiring on the 4th of March, 1873, vacated by William P. Kellogg by resignation. Their claim for compensation was submitted to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and reported upon favorably; I hold the report in my hand. While settling these questions of contested elections it is eminently proper that the Senate should take the opportunity to pay persons elected as Senators whose claim preceded that of the ones now submitted.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator say that both were reported favorably?

Mr. WEST. Both reported favorably.

Mr. ANTHONY. Both claiming the same seat?

Mr. WEST. Yes, sir. This is the report on their claim for compensation made by Mr. Carpenter:

The committee reported against seating either of them, but both had incurred expenses in the prosecution of their claims.

By analogy to the precedents of the Senate, your committee are of opinion that both Ray and McMillen would be entitled to the salary of a Senator from the time of their election until the disposition of their claims respectively by the Senate.

Then the report goes on to say that they regard that proposition as vicious and claim an itemized account. This is now three and a half years ago, and whatever items they may have had in their possession at that time I doubt if they have them now. This is a proposition in accordance with the recommendation made by the committee that they should both be paid, and gives them about $1,800 apiece. They both attended here during that whole winter presenting their own case, and their expenses were necessarily heavy.

Mr. MCDONALD. I desire to ask the Senator from Louisiana if one of those parties did not voluntarily withdraw his credentials?

Mr. WEST. One of these gentlemen withdrew his credentials for the seat claimed by Mr. Pinchback after the 4th of March, 1873, but never withdrew his credentials as a claimant for the other seat. There are two different terms entirely. There is no proposition to pay Mr. McMillen for the term that Mr. Pinchback claimed.

Mr. MCDONALD. He may possibly get into that other seat yet. [Laughter.]

Mr. WEST. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." We can meet that when it comes.

Mr. SHERMAN. Allow me to make a suggestion. It is now nearly five o'clock. I assure the Senator that if he introduces two other new topics I shall, in order to satisfy my conscience, want to know something more about the cases. I thought Mr. McMillen, whom I know personally, had withdrawn, left here, abandoned his case. We are all tired out with this Pinchback case.

Mr. WEST. Well, Mr. President, there is nobody more tired of it than I have been; but I am not here advocating any claims of any individual on personal grounds. What the Senator says about Mr. McMillen having withdrawn his claim is correct, but that applies to an entirely different term. I am in receipt constantly of letters from both these gentlemen somewhat reproaching me for my neglect in prosecuting their claim. I have waited for this opportunity. The term here referred to expired on the 4th of March, 1873, at the time you now take up the claim of Mr. Pinchback; and could there be a more opportune moment to settle the whole matter than now and on this occasion, especially as the Senate has done this in the case of Mr. Sykes? These are the disputed cases from Louisiana. There is no dispute about the facts of the claim of these two gentlemen, and I deem it nothing more than right that their claim should be considered now. If the Senate choose to vote it down, I cannot help that. It is my duty to those gentlemen to prefer their claim now.

Mr. MORTON. I hope the amendment will be voted down. It is obvious that if the resolution be loaded in this way it will be lost. I trust the amendment will be voted down here and come up in proper shape hereafter.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The observations of the Senator from Louisiana have thrown some light on this thing; for it appears that at a certain date the Committee on Privileges and Elections, in respect to this Louisiana business, did report about Ray and McMillen that neither was entitled to the seat, but that each claimed in good faith, and the state of political affairs there was such that the committee did not think either ought to be admitted; and so they say:

By analogy to the precedents of the Senate, your committee are of opinion that both Ray and McMillen would be entitled to the salary of a Senator from the time of their election until the disposition of their claims respectively by the Senate; but regarding this precedent as vicious, your committee recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the actual expenses necessarily incurred by John Ray and William L. McMillen, claimants to a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, in the Forty-second Congress, in presenting their respective claims to a seat in the Senate, be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate; which expenses shall be presented itemized and verified by the oath of the said Ray and McMillen respectively, and the amounts shall be audited by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate.

There you have a report of the Committee on Privileges and Elections upon the claim of two gentlemen to seats that would have been valid if the respective Legislatures that elected them had been valid.

Mr. CONKLING. When was that report made?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was endeavoring to ascertain myself, but from this extract from it before me I am not able to tell. It was I suppose, when Mr. Carpenter, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, reported on the subject of this political trouble in the State of Louisiana about the rights of these two gentlemen to seats. It preceded the matter of Mr. Pinchback. It preceded, I think, the matter of Mr. Sykes and of Mr. SPENCER.

Mr. CONKLING. By "the matter" do you mean the election?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I mean the question that arose, the discussion in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. It did not precede Pinchback's election?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; because he was elected for the long term at the same time that these two contestants were elected for the short term. The Sykes report was made, I am informed by our always correct Chief Clerk, on the 20th of April, 1874. This must have been earlier. It brings us to this point, that before the contest of Mr. Pinchback and before the Sykes contest, the proper committee of this body on a case that in its essential principles appears to have stood on the same grounds, that is, a dispute as to the political character or being of the body that purported to elect, recommended, and for aught that appears unanimously, that the idea of paying a man who was not a Senator as if he had been per se was vicious, and that what ought to be done was particular justice on the particular circumstances of each case, depending upon the degree of doubt and the good faith of the claimant, I suppose, and all that.

This report having been made before the Pinchback and before the Sykes contest, the question with me is whether that was not a kind of public caveat which should have informed Sykes and Pinchback both that their contest if it resulted unfavorably would not necessarily be followed on principles of good faith by the Senate with the same payment that they would have received if they had performed duty as Senators, but would be followed by giving to each of them, if their contest was in good faith, what the particular circumstances of the case required. This report from this same committee upon these two cases that embraced both sides of the political question rather convinces me that we are perhaps taking too fast a step by voting to pay either Sykes or Pinchback any such amount as is here proposed.

Mr. CONKLING. That report was not acted on.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; it was not acted upon. I only say the most that could be made of it was that it was a kind of public notice that the Senate, at least, held in reserve the question whether we should be bound to pay compenstion as such to a person who was not admitted.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am glad that the Senator from Vermont has brought this report to the attention of the Senate. It goes exactly on the line of action I have been advocating all day, and I believe justice to the parties interested and to the country particularly requires that these parties should have their reasonable expenses paid and no more. I move to refer the resolution and the amendments to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions to ascertain what would be a reasonable allowance for the actual expenses of these several contestants, and to report as they may deem proper.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina moves a recommittal of the resolution to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not know, and have no right to say, that there is a way of killing a thing without attacking it; but I have seen such things done. Now, if there is a disposition in the Senate to vote down the resolution, there ought to be nerve enough in the Senators to vote against it squarely. The resolution in favor of Mr. Pinchback ought not to be made to carry through every doubtful claim or question that there is before the Senate.

I think the motion of the Senator from North Carolina is not the proper motion. If he desires to refer this report in reference to Mr. Ray and Mr. McMillen back to the committee to ascertain what their expenses were, let him make that motion; but why refer the whole thing? The Senate has not said that it was only going to pay expenses. The motion of the Senator from Vermont, when he made it, qualifying the resolution so that hereafter in all future cases contestants should be paid for their time as the Senate might judge to be right, exempted this particular claim from that amendment, and it was so understood by the Senate on both sides of the chamber. Now there seems to be a disposition to pile all on so as to defeat this resolution. I will not vote for the resolution if that be done, although I think Mr. Pinchback is entitled to his pay as much as I am to mine. He acted in good faith, and under all the circumstances—though I am not going to make a speech in reference to his case; I have done that several times on the floor of the Senate—I think he was entitled to his seat. Because I think he was entitled to his seat I am ready to vote to give him his pay, and for no other reason. These other gentlemen stand on very different grounds, no matter what the report is. All the Senators here know that these claimants, Mr. Ray and Mr. McMillen, stand on different grounds from Mr. Pinchback.

Mr. WEST. I ask the Senator if he will be good enough to explain the difference in the ground?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope he will not do it to-night; it is too late.

Mr. LOGAN. I do not propose to stand here and explain for the benefit of the Senator from Louisiana or anybody else the difference. I state it for myself to my own satisfaction that the cases do stand on different grounds. I could give the reasons for that opinion if I felt disposed to do so. I am not disposed to go into an argument in reference to it. The arguments that have been made heretofore show the grounds very distinctly, that they stand here very differently; at least so far as I am concerned and so far as my own reasoning goes, I am satisfied that a very different state of things exists as to each. But I am not disposed to go into that. I gave my reasons to the Senate at the time I voted to seat Mr. Pinchback. I held that by the recognition of the Legislature by the different departments of the Government and by the recognition of the supreme court of Louisiana the Kellogg government was the lawful government in all its departments. That was the ground on which I based my argument.

Mr. WEST. The same right attaches to Mr. Ray.

Mr. LOGAN. I think not. They are very different cases. If the Senator from Louisiana wants to defeat the proposition to pay Mr. Pinchback and does not want him to get his pay, he is taking exactly the right course to defeat it. If the Senator from Vermont feels the same way and does not like to vote square against it or for it, this is the right way to defeat it. If it is to be defeated, I would rather see it defeated in a square fight. I do not believe in putting riders here to give gentlemen an opportunity who want, I think, to vote against it to vote against it. I do not want to vote against it, but I will vote against it if all these riders are added.

Mr. MITCHELL. So will I.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, during the course of the remarks of the Senator from Illinois, which I presume were addressed to the Senate with a view of influencing their action, he took occasion to say that there were entirely different grounds attaching to these two claimants, and I asked him for an explanation of that assertion; but it appears that he did not intend to make that assertion to influence the Senate. It was only an expression of his own satisfaction with his own judgment, and therefore it should not weigh with the Senate.

But the assertion that Mr. Pinchback's claim has been put in subsequent to the notice that was served upon him by the report which has been read, and that that should operate as a caveat, is scarcely correct. Mr. Pinchback commenced his claim for a seat in this Senate on the 4th of March, 1873. This caveat, as it is called, serving a notice upon all claimants that the principle was a vicious one to exact or expect pay for time not served, was not made until the 22d of June, 1874, fifteen months after the commencement of the prosecution of the claim, and it was the expression of the opinion of a committee, but met no favor at the hands of the Senate. So it in no degree invalidates this claim that I can see.

Furthermore, I scarcely think the Senator is correct in saying that I desired to load down this resolution so that it could not be passed.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say the Senator desired to do it.

Mr. WEST. Well, the Senator's judgment is that my course tends that way.

Mr. LOGAN. I had a right to say that.

Mr. WEST. Certainly; but let the Senator understand me. I wish to be understood as advocating in no personal sense whatever the claims of claimants to seats in this body from the State of Louisiana; and I cannot make fish of one and flesh of another; and if any claim has precedence at all, it is the claim of those Senators that came here anterior to Mr. Pinchback and who had the same ground for making it that he had. Their cases had been submitted to the committee, and the committee determined that they had the right to be paid, but suggested a different method of payment, a method that has been rejected in this very case by a vote of the Senate already. The rule is to be applied hereafter, and if you wish to do justice to all the claimants in Louisiana, take them all at once, and, as Benjamin Franklin said, say grace over the whole barrel of pork and be done with it.

Mr. MITCHELL. This report was not made at this Congress, whatever it amounts to; but it was made at another Congress. The claims of Messrs. Ray and McMillen have not been before this Congress, have not been considered by any committee of this Congress; and it seems to me there is no propriety in offering their cases as an amendment to the pending resolution, and I hope it will be voted down.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to say to my good friend from Illinois, who seems to impute to me a disposition to dodge this question, that I do not know that on this particular question, from the beginning to the end, I can be fairly accused of any disposition to dodge it. I know that I am generally as desirous as he is, or anybody else, of getting out of the way when a vote is to be taken; but on this particular matter, the matter of the right of Pinchback——

Mr. LOGAN. If the Senator wants to know exactly what I meant, I will state it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If the Senator will let me finish the sentence, he may see whether he wants to explain or not. I was proceeding to say that on this particular subject, whatever all our faults may be with others, I did have the impression that my attitude was pretty well understood. In fact I have received several blessings from all sides of the Chamber for it. That I can bear; but I do not think the Senator is quite justified in what seemed to be his hint that in suggesting the report of this committee I was desirous of evading the question.

Mr. LOGAN. Not at all. I did not say the Senator evades the question. I said that the Senator from Louisiana was taking the right step to defeat the resolution.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You said "Vermont."

Mr. LOGAN. Hold on. The Senator from Vermont I coupled with the Senator from Louisiana, and I will explain to the Senator what I did mean. I did suppose that the Senator from Vermont was not in favor of this resolution, for the reason that he certainly was not in favor of Mr. Pinchback taking his seat. I said that I based my vote on this resolution in favor of it upon the ground that I believed Mr. Pinchback was entitled to it, for the reason that I thought he was entitled to his seat. Believing that, I was for the resolution. The Senator from Vermont, believing that he was not, would naturally not be for the resolution. Therefore I did suppose that he would be glad to see riders put upon it, because a more convenient way of killing it than fighting it squarely. I did mean that; nothing more, nothing less. I did not mean it in an offensive sense.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no.

Mr. LOGAN. But I meant it in a sense very frequently used here.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to assure my friend that in this particular instance he is altogether mistaken again. I have not been disposed to put any riders on the resolution for the purpose of killing it or embarrassing it. I did propose an amendment, which was agreed to unanimously, that hereafter the rule should be so and so; and when I proposed that amendment I was determined to vote in favor of the resolution because I thought it followed what the Senate had hitherto done. Now when the Senator from Louisiana, after debate, brings forward here a former report of this same committee arising out of this same election that elected Mr. Pinchback and the men who were elected for the short term when he was elected for the long one, in which they say they believe the former practice is vicious, and they recommend upon their responsibility another one conformable to justice in each particular case, I do admit with equal frankness that it makes a good deal of impression on my mind, and it making that impression on my mind I am not prepared at this moment to vote in the way of paying Mr. Pinchback or Mr. Sykes or anybody else, after this old report of this committee, the full compensation of a Senator. I do not know but that when it is further considered I may go back to the original determination that I had when this debate began, supposing that we were absolutely bound by the precedents to vote for it; but after this report, made as it appears unanimously, from a committee of the Senate upon the subject, and the report not acted upon—not therefore condemned but lying as a thousand other things do here that do not get taken up—I think it may be still a good time without doing injustice to any of these gentlemen to reconsider the whole subject and see whether fairly and justly we may not apply to all these cases alike the rule which the committee reported in that case.

Mr. McMILLAN. Will the Senator from Vermont allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Certainly.

Mr. McMILLAN. Does he think it would be fair to regard this report as a public caveat, as it is termed, to Pinchback when the present Senate were not aware of the existence of that report until brought to their notice to-day?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do, because I think we are bound to apply caveats to the people of the United States when we are not bound to apply them to Senators. Each individual who is making a claim here is pretty apt, if he is looking to his own interests at all, to look at what the Senate has done in similar cases and what committees have reported. Each Senator sitting as a judge and desiring to do right is supposed to presume that when a case arises the committee that has it in charge will bring forward everything that bears upon it, and therefore he need not be presumed to have personal knowledge of all that will guide his discretion when the occasion arises. But in respect of a claimant, if it turns out that he does not come from any Legislature, or that he has got his election by unfair means, or for any other reason he is disqualified, as in the case of Thomas from Maryland as I remember, I do not think he has a right to presume absolutely that, sink or swim, in or out, he is all this time to get the pay of a Senator. I think he has the right to presume that he may appeal to the justice of the Senate to see that he has fair play consistently with justice to the tax-payers. That is all I mean; and therefore while, as I said when I offered the amendment providing for the future, I had intended to vote in favor of this resolution, I am now disposed to vote in favor of sending it back to the committee that they may reconsider the whole subject.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, if the Senator wants to vote against this resolution, he has a right to do it as a matter of course, and I shall not be surprised. Some hour or two ago the Senator said that he would vote for this resolution because the precedents were uniformly that way.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I was inclined to do it, I said.

Mr. MORTON. He then offered an amendment that in cases hereafter arising the rule should be different. Subsequently the Senator discovered that the chairman of the Committee on Privileges and Elections, Mr. Carpenter, some four years ago before Pinchback's case had ever arisen and before his term had begun, had made a certain report in regard to McMillen and Ray, a report which was never acted on.

Mr. WEST. The Senator is incorrect; the report was not made until fifteen months after Pinchback had commenced making his claim.

Mr. MORTON. I thought the report was made in the month of February, 1873.

Mr. WEST. No; the 22d of June, 1874; here it is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The 1873 report was on the political condition of the State, and had nothing to do with the question of pay.

Mr. LOGAN. What committee made this report in favor of Ray and McMillen?

Mr. MORTON. I do not know. It was not made by me and never acted on by the Senate. It lay here without any attention being paid to it; it was never called up; and now this mere report of a committee, which was never acted upon by the Senate, never adopted, the Senator from Vermont chooses to consider such a precedent and caveat as justifies him in changing his views entirely and voting to send the whole matter back to the committee. If my friend wants to vote against this report he has a perfect right to do so, and need not rest the act upon any excuse of that kind. The idea is that because this report has been discovered in regard to these two cases, a report never acted upon, it constituted a precedent which would justify the Senator in violating what the Senator himself said an hour ago had been the uniform action of the Senate in all times!

Mr. LOGAN. I would suggest to the Senator from Indiana that it is usual for reports of that character to come from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. This is from another committee.

Mr. MORTON. I discover now that this report comes from the Committee on Contingent Expenses, to which the case never went, where it had no business. How Mr. Carpenter, who was chairman of that committee, a committee consisting of three persons, came to make any report on this question I do not know.

Mr. WEST. Here it is. I introduced a resolution requiring the Senate to pay these men, and that resolution was submitted to the Committee on Contingent Expenses.

Mr. MORTON. A place where it had no right to go, and where it did not belong any more than to the Committee on the Judiciary, or the Committee on the Revision of the Laws. How it got there I do not know. Here is a report that was never acted upon, and very properly, but it is such a precedent as justifies the Senator from Vermont in changing his views on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I have to be like other people and change my views occasionally. I think the Senator from Indiana is the last man who should lecture me on the subject of changing views. I think if we read his political history and mine, or rather our legal histories, it will be found that he, like a wise and true man, has changed his views every time he had occasion to do it, about five times to my once. But that is because he lives probably in a wider section of country where there is greater scope for it.

Now, Mr. President, I do not feel in the least hurt at the insinuation of my honorable friend from Indiana, because we all go according to the light we have, and I have no doubt that he judges me exactly as he would think it fair for me to judge him; and that being the case nobody can find fault with it. I assume from what he says that if he did not wish to meet a question fair and square, he would contrive, as he insinuates I do, some means of dodging it and getting around it, because I cannot suppose he would apply a rule to me that he would not apply to himself. It would be contrary to the fourteenth amendment, to begin with, of which we are both in favor.

Now, to come back to the subject, my friend says this is no ground for recommitting this matter. Sir, the Committee on Contingent Expenses were charged by the Senate and did not volunteer to investigate this subject when McMillen and Ray presented their claims for compensation, agreeing out, one of them, of an election by exactly the same body of men that elected Mr. Pinchback. My friend from Louisiana or somebody introduced a proposition to pay them. The Senate ordered that the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, and out of funds over which they had the auditing and control the payment must be made, to inquire into it. They did inquire into it, and reported what had not been brought to my notice before, and that was that they had considered this subject and took the responsibility of reporting to the Senate that claims of this character founded upon the idea that a man was to be paid as a Senator when it turned out that he had no claim to be a Senator were vicious, and as a provision in cases of that kind they reported that the man who contested in good faith should be paid his reasonable and necessary expenses in the contest, to be ascertained in a careful and prudent way. We all agreed in adopting unanimously the amendment I had the honor to offer, that that principle is founded in justice and reason. The only question is whether it ought to have a retroactive operation, as is denied by the Senator from Indiana. Now, I submit that it was worthy of consideration inasmuch as this report publicly made was on the files of the Senate and had been applied to two citizens of Louisiana already in not giving them what is now claimed to be a matter of course, the pay of a Senator—it is fair to consider whether it ought not to apply to all of them as well as to two. That is all there is of the question.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator changed his mind here in about twenty or thirty minutes under very peculiar circumstances, and the reason which he assigned was rather unsatisfactory, in fact was rather insignificant, to be honest about it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is, in your judgment.

Mr. MORTON. And when I referred to the matter the Senator thought it necessary to allude to my political history and to say that I had changed my mind in my political life about five times where he did so once. Well, it is always important in a matter of that kind for a man to be right. If I were to be technical, I should take issue with him on the fact; I should say that what he said was not true and that he could not begin to prove it. But that would not be a very important matter at this time.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator took the ground here very broadly—and I confess a little to my surprise, because I expected from the beginning of this controversy that he would somehow contrive to come out in the opposition—that the precedents had been uniform and he did not feel at liberty to violate them but that the rule should be changed as to all cases arising hereafter, and he offered an amendment to that effect. After that he discovered a report made by the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate, which was never adopted by the Senate, never acted on, could form no precedent or rule of action whatever, of which perhaps Pinchback never heard in his life, and insisted that it was a caveat to Pinchback of which he ought to take notice which justified him in referring and reconsidering the whole thing. The Senator has come out precisely at the hole where I expected he would, from the very beginning of this controversy.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That shows you are a good prophet!

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Mr. President, it is very clear that the adoption on the part of the Senate of the resolution presented by my colleague may hereafter prevent what certainly must be admitted to be a very great evil, the extravagant payment on the part of the Senate of those who contest seats in this body. But it seems to me that it is out of our usual course to consider anything that has not been presented by the Committee on Privileges and Elections. Therefore I shall vote against including all cases that have not been considered and reported on by the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and to begin with the case of Mr. Pinchback, a colored man, and make that an exception to the universal record of our precedents, for one I am averse to. I shall therefore vote for the appropriation to be made according to the precedents heretofore established in relation to Mr. Pinchback, although I have never considered that he was properly elected a member of this body, and I shall vote against any amendments that do not come from the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. WEST. I really was somewhat at fault in supposing that this report that I read from had been submitted from the Committee on Privileges and Elections. My mistake arose from the fact that Mr. Carpenter was a member of both committees, and I did not have the caption of the report before me. In order to take this question out of the way of the Senate at the present moment, I move the reference of the amendment that I have offered to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and that takes it out of this case.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator withdraws the amendment and refers the report.

Mr. WEST. I withdraw the amendment and ask that it be referred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You cannot refer an amendment; you must introduce a resolution.

Mr. MORTON. That can be done afterward.

Mr. WEST. I withdraw the amendment and will offer it immediately afterward.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina has moved to refer the whole question to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, with instructions. The question is on that motion.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 14, noes 24.

Mr. WEST. I withdraw my amendment now, and ask permission of the Senate, when this vote is taken, to offer the proposition, and refer it to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. MORTON. There will be no objection to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, and the question is on the resolution as amended.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That P. B. S. Pinchback, late contestant for a seat in the Senate from the State of Louisiana, and Francis W. Sykes, late a contestant for a seat in the Senate as a Senator from the State of Alabama, be each allowed an amount equal to the pay and mileage of a Senator from the beginning of the term for which they were respectively contestants up to the period of the determination of the respective contests by the Senate.

Resolved, That in cases of disputed claims to seats in the Senate hereafter arising, no other or greater allowance shall be made to a defeated claimant than in such case shall seem to the Senate just.

Resolved, That in no case shall any pay be allowed to a Senator to begin earlier than the date of his election or appointment.

Mr. MITCHELL. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Does that resolution provide for paying this man out of the contingent fund?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is it to be paid out of, I would ask the Senator having it in charge? How is this money to be paid? Is this a joint resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is not; it is a Senate resolution.

Mr. CONKLING. Then it means the contingent fund, of course.

Mr. CRAGIN. Senators are not paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, as the Senator knows.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But out of the appropriation for the pay of Senators. There is no appropriation for the pay of Senators out of which this money can be paid. The resolution will be perfectly inoperative as it now stands.

Mr. MITCHELL. It will be paid out of the contingent fund, of course.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution which has been read. The yeas and nays have been called for.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. EATON. I will not detain the Senate long——

Mr. GORDON. Will my friend yield to a motion to adjourn?

Mr. EATON. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. GORDON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I ask the Senator to withdraw that to allow me to make a motion.

Mr. GORDON. Certainly.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I move that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock, so as to anticipate the court one hour. I have particular reasons why I think that should be done.

Mr. CONKLING. At what hour does the impeachment trial begin by the order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Twelve o'clock.

Mr. CONKLING. The Senator will break up committee meetings to-morrow. That may be a minor matter, but it is very inconvenient to have them broken up if it can be avoided.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I would not make the motion if I thought it could well be avoided.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not feel at liberty to object; but I want to say that one committee, which has been without a quorum for weeks, is to meet to-morrow morning, and the meeting is called and some effort has been made to have it attended, and on matters of some urgency.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I think an important report should be made to-morrow, and I do not see how it can be unless the Senate meets at the time named.

Mr. CONKLING. I do not venture to object; I only state the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that when the Senate adjourn to-day, it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I offer an amendment to the pending resolution in the following words——

Mr. GORDON. I thought I had the floor. I yielded to the Senator from Maine only for a specific purpose.

Mr. MITCHELL. I have the floor.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia yielded the floor. There is but one way of yielding.

Mr. MITCHELL. I should like to offer this amendment, and have it acted upon: I move to insert the words "to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate" at the proper place in the resolution. I will yield now to the Senator from Georgia, and at the same time I hope his motion will be voted down.

Mr. GORDON, (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) I renew the motion to adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; ayes 11, noes not counted.

Mr. ALCORN. I wish to say that I do not like the language of the resolution upon which we are called to vote. The resolution, as amended by the honorable Senator from Vermont, states that hereafter in making compensation the Senate will allow a compensation that shall be considered just. That implies that the compensation now being made is not just. I merely state, not to govern the action of the Senate but to put myself right, that I should like the proposition better if it stated that hereafter in making compensation it should be based upon a reasonable allowance for the expenses incurred, and not let the implication go forward by this resolution that we are now making a compensation that is not just.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, this discussion has taken somewhat a wide range. The honorable Senator from Indiana on Monday in his argument intimated, and I think used the language, that if this resolution did not pass it was because the claimant under the resolution was a colored man. Now, Mr. President, I will not use the language which he used toward the honorable Senator from Vermont when he said that an assertion of that honorable Senator was not true; but I will say, in my judgment he is utterly and entirely mistaken in an opinion of that kind.

Now, Mr. President, what has the color of this man got to do with Pinchback's claim? First, was he elected a Senator of the United States by a legislature competent to elect him—by the Legislature of the State of Louisiana? The Senate of the United States have said, as I understand from the honorable Senator from Louisiana, that two white men who were voted for by the same Legislature for the short term were rejected by the Senate. Rejected because they were white? Is that the argument of the honorable Senator from Indiana? That Ray and McMillen were rejected because they were white? They were rejected, doubtless, by the Senate of the United States for a different reason. I have no doubt that the Senate supposed the body that elected those men was not the legal legislature of Louisiana.

The honorable Senator from Indiana traveled out of the record a long way off when he ventured to say here on this floor and to the people of this country that there was to be a great election in November and that that election was to be sought to be carried by fraud and violence. If the honorable Senator from Indiana intended to say that the party to which I have the honor to belong intend to carry the presidential election by fraud or violence, or both, he asserts what in my judgment he cannot prove. If he means that he and his party intend to carry the next presidential election by fraud or violence, he knows more about it than I do, and I will not undertake to question his information.

All that, I confess, has very little to do with the resolution before the Senate. Ought the claimant in this case to be paid the sum of $20,000 or $25,000? My honorable friend from New York, though with great compunction, will vote for this resolution because similar resolutions have been voted for in the past, and such men as Douglas and Borland and Badger and Cooper and Everett have voted for a resolution of that character. I might say that such men as Atherton and Bayard and Bright and Chase and HAMLIN, now a member of this Senate, and Houston and Pearce and Rusk and Stuart and Thompson and Wright voted against this principle.

Another thing, Mr. President: the cases are utterly dissimilar; they are not on all-fours at all; they do not travel together at all; and I undertake to say that there is not one case in the history of the Senate like this which has ever been passed. Look at what was done prior to the war. What has occurred since the great disturbance I do not care to speak about, for men came here any way, all sorts of legislation was enacted, and I do not care to talk about that; but I say that previous to 1860 there is no instance like unto this. The cases then were where two gentlemen came up, both claiming seats, both claiming to have been elected by the same body, and that body a legal Legislature. For instance, I take the case cited by the honorable Senator from New York, which was voted on in 1853. Mr. Yulee and Mr. Mallory were the contestants. Yulee received all the votes that were cast upon one ballot except blanks. In other words, he received twenty-nine votes, and there were twenty-nine blanks against him, and one other vote cast for somebody else. He had no case. He had no business here. He ought not to have been paid; for there was a statute law of Florida that no man should be elected to the United States Senate that did not have a majority of all the votes present, like our Constitution in a particular clause of it. In other words, if there had been eighty men present, forty of them voting in Florida for Mr. Yulee as Senator and forty withholding their votes, there would have been no election, and therefore the blanks were like the presence of men who did not vote at all. The Senate very properly decided that in that case he had no show of an election, and gave the seat to Mr. Mallory.

That was the contest; I have the record of it. I will not tire the Senate with reading it. Those opposing the payment, and it was but a couple of thousand dollars anyhow, did so upon the ground that Mr. Yulee knew that he was not elected; that he had no business to come here; that he, an astute, able lawyer, knew what the law of the State of Florida was, and therefore he ought not to have appeared here and contested the case with Mr. Mallory; and upon that ground nineteen Senators voted that they would not pay him a dollar. Twenty-two voted to pay him, and therefore a little majority of three men establishes what my friend from New York thinks is a precedent in this case. Now, then, take the large minority and they establish a precedent in this case against the claim. What is it? It is that this man, the claimant in this case, knew that he had no right to a seat in this body. He knew himself that a man who had been elected by the same body for the short term had not been permitted to take a seat here, and therefore he knew that he had no claim. Did he suppose that the fact of his being black would give him any control over the Senate of the United States? for it is upon this ground that I base my position.

Besides, this very claimant, Pinchback, after presenting his claim in this body for a seat, presented himself for admission to a seat in the House of Representatives. At identically the same time that he was claiming a seat here on the floor of the Senate he was claiming a seat on the floor of the House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. President, did not that man know that he had no right or claim to a seat on this floor? In my judgment he did. He came here and prosecuted a claim which he knew was an invalid one. We are asked to-day to take twenty-odd thousand dollars out of a depleted Treasury and make it a present to this man. Sir, I am opposed to it upon this ground: that there has never been a vote in the United States Senate prior to the war to pay the claimant of a contested seat except a small amount, and then where it was a contest between two men. I am opposed to it on another ground. That man came here three or four years ago; he presented his two claims, one for a seat here on this floor, one for a seat in the House of Representatives. He lost that, and by the action of the majority of this Senate he lost the other.

Why was not the vote taken sooner? I beg to ask the honorable Senator from Indiana or the honorable Senator from Louisiana, or anybody else that has this matter in charge, why was not a vote taken three years ago upon this question? Why was the vote evaded and delayed? The report of the committee was made years ago; my friend from Georgia [Mr. NORWOOD] suggests, in 1873. A report was made to this body in 1873 that that man was not entitled to a seat on this floor, because the body that pretended to elect him was not the legal Legislature of the State of Louisiana. Sir, I do not say too much when I say that every member of the committee making that report belonged to the same political party to which this claimant was attached. They declined to admit him, declined to give him a seat, pronounced against the validity of the Legislature that elected him, and the very Senators who said in their hearts that the report of the committee was true now come here and propose to pay him $20,000 or $25,000. I think there are not less than three and perhaps more than three Senators who are now members of this body who were members of the committee that made that report; and as I gather from what has been said here, every one of those honorable Senators will vote to pay this money to a man who never had the ghost of a chance to a seat in the Senate of the United States. If they had kept it along for three years longer it would have been $40,000 instead of $20,000.

I say, then, Mr. President, by no principle is this man entitled to the pay of a Senator. No reason has been given yet except that in the past we have done such things. I say that in the past we have have never done so in any one instance. And so well satisfied is body of the viciousness of any such rule as this that it has attached to this very resolution an amendment that hereafter no such wrong as this shall ever again occur.

Mr. MITCHELL. I hate to interrupt the Senator, because I want to get home; but I should like to know why he says that we have never done so before?

Mr. EATON. Because you never have. That is the reason.

Mr. MITCHELL. That is the reason?

Mr. EATON. Yes.

Mr. MITCHELL. All right. Does the Senator mean to say that the Senate of the United States has never before paid a contestant on the same rule reported by the committee in this case?

Mr. EATON. If my honorable friend had done me the honor and himself the displeasure of listening to what I have been saying, he would have known exactly what my position is. I said that there never has been a case of this character. There has never been an instance except when there were two men who were contesting for a seat, that I have been able to find. If the honorable gentleman will find me one, then I will say I am mistaken. I take the case of Yulee, which was cited by my honorable friend from New York. Two men came here, Yulee and Mallory. They were heard. Yulee had no case, and the committee reported against him, and gave Mallory the seat. By a majority of three votes only, the vote standing 19 to 22, the Senate paid Yulee a thousand or two thousand dollars for his expenses; paid it, I say, against reason. They ought not to have paid a dollar of that money. They did it; but it does not operate upon my mind for one moment as a precedent. I do not regard it as of any value whatever.

I will illustrate. I will suppose that my honorable friend from Oregon is a candidate for the United States Senate next year, or, rather, I had better take his colleague, who may be a candidate. I will suppose that there is a law in the State of Oregon by which if a candidate for the United States Senate does not receive a majority of all the votes present he cannot be the man elected. I will then suppose that there are eighty-one members of the Legislature of Oregon present and only forty votes are cast for my friend, the rest being blanks, and he, an astute lawyer, comes here and claims a seat under that state of affairs. He ought not to have his per diem and his $1,600 mileage, and I would not vote him $1 of it, because as a lawyer he would have no business here. That was the exact case from Florida; but a majority of three gentlemen in the Senate voted—not party-wise, I am happy to say, for there were leading democrats and leading whigs voting this way and that way upon the matter—to allow compensation to Mr. Yulee. But that is no precedent and cannot be cited as one for this case.

Here is a man who was not a contestant; he had no contestant; he came here alone, brought his credentials elected by a legislature that this Senate through its committee had said was not a legislature, and I assert that there is no precedent to be found that can establish this case; and I beg my honorable friend from Indiana to understand that I say it because I believe it, not because this man is not of his color or mine. I go further and say that I said to a very honorable gentleman who received an election since the election of Pinchback that in my judgment he was not entitled to a seat on this floor. He was white and a democrat. So that I take this ground because I believe I am right, not because the man is black or yellow. That has nothing to do with the case. I may be all wrong, but if so I was wrong then in giving the same advice to a white man that I now follow up in my course with regard to this man.

I say, then, under no circumstances does this man bring himself within any rule that has ever obtained in the Senate of the United States. If there had been a rule as vicious as I think this is, I would not be bound by it. The time to stop doing wrong is to stop, not wait until next year to stop; and therefore I say if there were twenty precedents I would disregard them all and take the ground that I believe to be right. Other gentlemen believe differently, and therefore they take opposite grounds. But I say again there is not one precedent to be found. A precedent is being made, and the very moment that you make it the honorable Senator from Vermont makes you say you will never do so again. I say the Senate of the United States belittles itself when it passes the resolution just as it now is. Pay this $20,000 and we will never do it again! This one time, never hereafter!

Mr. President, the Senate of the United States will act wisely in rejecting this claim; they will act in the light of reason and judgment, and will not run athwart of any rule or precedent. If there be any, I should like to see it; I have not yet seen it; not that I would adopt it; not that I would follow it; but it might be an excuse if any were needed for others.

I will not detain the Senate any longer. I simply desired to give the reasons for my vote on this question.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Oregon to insert words providing that the money shall be paid out of the contingent fund.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 23, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. MERRIMON. I am paired on questions like this with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON,] but my pair is under the direction of the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. MORTON.] I believe it my duty at his request to vote in order to make a quorum.

Mr. EATON. I am paired also; but I suppose I have a right to vote on this matter here. I am paired on the main question.

Mr. McDONALD. I am present and will vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The vote now stands 23 in the affirmative and 14 in the negative. The ayes have it, and the question is on the resolution, as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SAULSBURY, (when Mr. BAYARD's name was called.) My colleague [Mr. BAYARD] is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. CAMERON.]

Mr. EATON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. BOUTWELL.] He would vote for the resolution if he were here, and I should vote against it.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, (when his name was called.) I am paired with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. DORSEY.] If he were here he would vote "yea," and I should vote "nay."

Mr. KEY, (when his name was called.) On all political questions I am paired with the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. OGLESBY.] If he were here he would vote for this resolution, and I should vote against it. I reserve my right to vote if it is necessary to make a quorum.

Mr. PATTERSON, (when his name was called.) On this question I am paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. WALLACE.] If present he would vote for the resolution, and I should vote against it.

The roll-call was concluded.

Mr. KEY. I vote to make a quorum.

Mr. MERRIMON. In pursuance of my understanding with the Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. CLAYTON,] I believe it is my duty to vote now. His friend the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] does not insist upon the pair in this case, and I think I ought to vote. I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 27, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Cragin, Dawes, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Sargent, Sherman, Spencer, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—27.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Davis, Gordon, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Merrimon, Norwood, Saulsbury, and Withers—11.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Caperton, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cooper, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kernan, Maxey, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, Wallace, and Whyte—35.

So the resolution was passed.

PAY OF M'MILLEN AND RAY.

Mr. WEST submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the claims of William L. McMillen and John Ray, contestants for the seat vacated by the resignation of William P. Kellogg, a Senator from Louisiana, for pay and mileage as Senators for the unexpired term named, be referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

The resolution was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. DAVIS. I should like to have printed the resolution relating to the finishing of the Washington Monument. I believe it passed; but it is a short resolution, and I wanted it printed for public use.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from West Virginia. The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and fifty-five minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 5, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Monday last was read and approved.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PRATT. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment to report a bill from the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LORD. I yield to the gentleman for that purpose.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSISSIPPI AT ROCK ISLAND.

Mr. PRATT. I am directed by the Committee of Claims to report a bill for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Levesy of the firm of Harvey & Levesy, of Wisconsin, and to ask that it may be put upon its passage.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, after which objections to its present consideration, if any, will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the claim of James W. Harvey and James Levesy, for alleged labor done and materials furnished under their contract with the United States for the building of the masonry work for the piers and abutments of the bridge across the Mississippi River from Rock Island to Davenport, Iowa, bearing date June 1, 1869, be, and the same is hereby, referred to the Court of Claims for hearing and adjudication, and to that end jurisdiction is hereby conferred on said court to proceed in the adjustment of the accounts between said claimants and the United States as a court of equity jurisdiction, and may, if according to the rules and principles of equity jurisprudence, in its judicial discretion, reform said contract and render such judgment as justice and right between the claimants and the said Government may require.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 3849) was received and read a first and second time.

Mr. PRATT. I will state very briefly that in 1869 these parties, Harvey and Levesy, entered into a contract with the Government——

Mr. JONES, of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker, is this bill to be discussed? If so, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is too late now to object to the consideration of this bill. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRATT] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. PRATT. I was about to state that in 1869 these parties, Harvey and Levesy, entered into a contract with the Government to build piers and abutments for a new rail and wagon bridge to connect the cities of Rock Island, in Illinois, and Davenport, in Iowa. Under the contract they performed a large amount of work.

I have only this one statement to make, that the claim in this case is of such a nature that it cannot well be determined in the Committee of Claims, and this bill refers it to the Court of Claims and confers on that court ample jurisdiction to hear and determine the whole case.

Mr. HOAR. I desire to ask the gentleman a question about this bill. In ordinary cases has the Court of Claims the power to allow claims against the United States according to its sense of what may be the equities of the case?

Mr. PRATT. It has not.

Mr. HOAR. Why is this case made an exception in that particular?

Mr. PRATT. For this reason, Mr. Speaker, that this claim is in many respects an equitable claim. There was a misunderstanding, for instance, on the part of the contractors in regard to the contract; a very serious misunderstanding. It may be necessary for the court, in order to do full justice, to reform the contract. It is very evident to the Committee of Claims that the case can only be fully adjudicated in a court having equitable jurisdiction; and for the purposes of this case authority is given to the court to hear and determine the case in accordance with the principles of equity.

Mr. HOAR. I do not desire to interpose an objection to what I understand to be the unanimous report of the Committee of Claims, which is a faithful and careful committee; but it is establishing a very important precedent to pass a special law authorizing any court whatever to reform contracts made between the United States and private persons, or to deal according to its sense of the equities between the parties who are claimants and the Government. If these petitioners have this right, every citizen of the United States should have the same right to come into the Court of Claims and have his contract reformed on an equitable consideration by the court. If the committee are prepared to take that responsibility, I certainly have not examined the subject enough to be prepared to take the other side of the question.

Mr. PRATT. The Committee of Claims have not considered the propriety of reporting any general bill for any such purpose. But they do find that in this case the claimants have rights, that they have a claim, that they have been very unjustly dealt with, and that their claim can only be reached and justice done them in a court having equity jurisdiction.

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. PRATT. Yes, sir.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have always understood that a case presenting equitable claims can be determined by Congress; and if the committee is satisfied that this is an equitable claim, why do they not get the House to decide upon it, instead of giving this dangerous jurisdiction to the Court of Claims?

Mr. PRATT. For this reason, that the trial of the case would involve the taking of a large amount of testimony and very heavy expenses. It is a case which the Committee of Claims could not try within any reasonable time. I hope the House will pass the bill. I call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill may be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. SMITH, of Pennsylvania. I ask for the reading of the report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that there is no report accompanying the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. What committee reports this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is reported by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PRATT] from the Committee of Claims. The gentleman from Iowa obtained unanimous consent to report the bill for present action.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. PRATT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAVING OF PENNSYLVANIA AVENUE.

Mr. STEVENSON submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill No. 3411, entitled "An act authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue," after full and free conference, recommend that the Senate recede from its substitute for the House bill, and that the House bill be amended as follows:

In line 9, section 1, after the word "avenue," insert "and all intersections of streets, avenues, and alleys crossing the same."

In line 6, section 2, page 2, strike out after the word "practicable" down to and including "work" in line 8.

In line 10, insert, after the word "proposals," "with full specifications."

In line 11, strike out after the word "avenue," down to and including "thereof," in line 18.

In line 26, page 3, strike out "five" and insert "three."

In line 28, section 2, page 3, insert, after "term," "which said per cent. shall be invested in the bonds of the United States, and the interest thereon paid to said contractors."

In line 8, section 3, strike out "shall not be required to use any other material," and insert "having conformed to the grade established by the commissioners may use."

In line 10, insert, after the word "tracks," "as the commissioners shall direct."

In line 22, strike out "derived from taxation."

In line 27, strike out all after the word "shall," in line 27, and all of line 28, and insert "also be paid out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but the money so paid shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States by the District of Columbia, derived from taxation."

In line 10, section 4, insert, after the word "pavement," "together with the proportion due from the District of Columbia."

In line 6, section 5, insert after the word "dollars" "and thirty cents." After the word "yard," in line 7, section 5, page 5, insert "Provided, Said pavement shall be fully completed and ready for use December 1, 1876."

In line 3, section 7, insert after the word "it" "may be necessary for them so to do to perfect the whole system."

In line 2, section 8, strike out the words "under the direction of said paving commission."

In line 4, insert after the word "laid" "without delay to the contractor."

In line 13, insert after "commissioners" the words "of the District of Columbia."

Managers on the part of the House.

S. W. DORSEY,
GEORGE E. SPENCER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would be very glad if the gentleman having charge of this matter would explain the effect of two propositions contained in this report of the committee of conference. One is in regard to the intersections of streets with Pennsylvania avenue. The report provides that in line 9, section 1, after the word "avenue," there shall be inserted the words "and all intersections of streets, avenues, and alleys crossing the same." Then, again, the report provides for striking out of line 27 all after the word "shall," and that all of line 28 shall be stricken out, and that there shall be inserted "also be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but the money so paid shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States by the District of Columbia, derived from taxation." I would like to know the effect of these two propositions.

Mr. STEVENSON. The gentleman from Vermont [Mr. HENDEE] will explain.

Mr. HENDEE. I understand that the first proposition has reference only to the triangular spaces on the Avenue where the Avenue is crossed diagonally by streets. I suppose the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] is well aware of the fact that the lettered streets, A, B, C, &c., cross the Avenue so as to make small triangular spaces; and this provision is for the purpose of providing that the streets enclosing these triangular spaces shall be paved the same as Pennsylvania avenue, so that the entire pavement in front of the buildings abutting on the Avenue and these triangular spaces shall be of the same kind. And it provides that parties owning property upon the streets coming into the Avenue in that way shall pay their proportion of the expenses of this repavement; and that the United States Government and government of the District of Columbia shall pay their share of these expenses in the same proportion as they do for paving the Avenue proper.

The purpose of the other provision is simply this: The tax bill which we have passed at this session of Congress will not bring any revenue into the District treasury before the 1st day of December next. This bill, if it shall become a law, provides that this repavement of Pennsylvania avenue shall be completed by that day. Payments must be made for this repavement before there will be any funds in the District treasury derived from the tax bill we have passed. This provision is simply that the Government of the United States shall loan the money necessary for these payments, and that the money arising from taxation under the tax bill we have passed shall be used to re-imburse the United States fully for the amount so advanced. That amount will be about $125,000.

Mr. HOLMAN. Would it not be much safer for the United States to allow the District government to borrow the money from other sources?

Mr. HENDEE. My friend has maintained all through this session that this District government has no credit, and therefore it would be useless for it to undertake to borrow of anybody outside of the Government of the United States.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then would it not be safer for a corporation in that condition to postpone this improvement until it has the necessary resources?

Mr. HENDEE. I think not.

Mr. HOLMAN. All other cities in the United States do that; I do not think that Washington City should be made an exception to the general rule. Besides, in cities all over the country where the people themselves pay the expenses of such improvement, there are many streets used for commercial and business purposes on which the laboring classes drive their wagons, carts, and drays; and such streets are in infinitely worse condition than is Pennsylvania avenue at this time. I think that most cities would postpone the pavement of a street like that until they had sufficient revenue to pay the expenses.

Mr. HENDEE. I think that any city in the United States that had an intelligent authority at its head would have paved this avenue six months ago.

Mr. HOLMAN. They would have done it perhaps if they had had the money.

Mr. HENDEE. I think it is a waste of property, of money, and of time for the Government to allow Pennsylvania avenue to remain longer in its present condition, and I hope the report will be agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I call the previous question upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the report was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STEVENSON. I ask unanimous consent that the bill as amended by the committee of conference, be printed in full in the RECORD.

No objection was made, and it was so ordered.

The bill, as amended, is as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, directed to detail General H. G. Wright and General O. A. Gillmore, of the Engineer Corps of the Army, who, with Edward Clark, of Washington, District of Columbia, shall form a commission, whose duty shall be to select and determine the best kind of pavement to be used in paving Pennsylvania avenue, and all intersections of streets, avenues, and alleys crossing the same, including the triangular spaces directly connecting with the Pennsylvania-avenue pavement, abutting on parts of squares numbered 254, 256, 323, 348, and 408, but not including the sidewalks; and to have said thoroughfare paved therewith from the northwest gate of the Capitol grounds to and including the crossing of Fifteenth street west, with such a pavement as they, or a majority of the said commission may agree upon.

SEC. 2. That within ten days after the passage of this act, or as soon thereafter as may be, the commission named herein shall meet and organize by the election of a president and secretary from among their number, and shall proceed to perform the duties herein imposed upon them; and as soon as practicable they shall give notice for one week, in a daily paper published in each of the cities of Washington, Philadelphia, and New York, for proposals, with full specifications, for paving said avenue: Provided, That said pavement shall be of the best material, laid in the most substantial manner, and without unnecessary delay; and that a good and sufficient bond to the United States, with sureties, to be approved by the commission, shall be exacted, guaranteeing that the terms of any contract or contracts shall be strictly and faithfully observed, and that the contractor shall keep the said pavement in good repair for the term of three years; and said commission shall retain 10 per cent. of the cost of the work as an additional security and a guarantee fund to keep the same in repair for the said term, which said percentage shall be invested in the bonds of the United States and the interest thereon paid to said contractors.

SEC. 3. That the cost of laying down said pavement shall be paid for in the following proportions and manner: The Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company shall bear all of the expense for that portion of the work lying between the exterior rails of the tracks of the road, and for a distance of two feet from and exterior to the track on each side thereof, and of keeping the same in repair; but the said railroad company, having conformed to the grade established by the commissioners, may use cobble-stone or Belgian rock in paving their tracks or the space between their tracks, as the commissioners may direct. The United States shall pay the cost of paving the spaces between its property and the part of the Avenue to be paid for by the said railroad company, and one-half of the cost of paving the intersection of the streets and avenues, less that to be paid by the railroad company, and the other half shall be paid out of the revenues of the District of Columbia derived from taxation; and the residue of the cost of such paving shall be paid as follows: One-third by the owners of private property lying and abutting on said Pennsylvania avenue, in proportion to their frontage thereon, as hereinafter provided; one-third by the United States; and one-third out of the general revenue of the District of Columbia; and the amount required to pay the part of said cost assumed by the United States shall be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and the amount required to pay the part of said cost charged to the District of Columbia shall also be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but the money so paid shall be re-imbursed to the Treasury of the United States by the District of Columbia from moneys derived from taxation, upon the warrants or orders of said commission duly audited in the Treasury Department: Provided, That the property-owners of such parts of squares 254, 256, 323, 348, and 408, as are abutting upon said pavement, shall be assessed at the same rate per front foot as the owners on Pennsylvania avenue: And provided further, That the space between Seventh and Eighth streets, opposite the locality now occupied by the Washington Market Company, shall be paid by the District of Columbia, unless the suit now pending as to the ownership of said ground shall be decided against the said District, when the same shall be refunded, with legal interest, by the Washington Market Company to said District.

SEC. 4. That assessments shall be made by the commissioners of the District of Columbia upon the owners of said private property on said avenue and spaces and upon said railroad company, respectively, provided for in section 3 of this act and the sums so found collected by the collector of the District of Columbia and paid into the Treasury of the United States, where it shall be held as a special fund for the specific purpose herein named; and such fund, together with such sum as shall be found to be due and payable from the United States for its proportion of the cost of said pavement, together with the proportion due from the District of Columbia, shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury, on the warrant or order of the commission, or a majority thereof, herein authorized, in such amounts and at such times as they may deem safe and proper in view of the progress of the work.

SEC. 5. That the cost of laying down said pavement, exclusive of the work charged to and paid for by the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, but including the removal of the present pavement, grading the avenue, and all other work and materials necessary to fully complete said pavement for use, shall not exceed the sum of $4.30 per square yard; Provided, Said pavement shall be fully completed and ready for use December 1, 1876.

SEC. 6. That if the Washington and Georgetown Railroad Company, or any private citizen or other corporation or person, shall neglect or refuse to pay the amount assessed for the paving herein authorized, (within thirty days after the notification of such assessment shall have been published in one or more papers printed in the District of Columbia,) in front of or adjoining their property, when the work so fronting or adjoining their property shall have been completed to the satisfaction of the commission provided for in this act, and assessed by the District of Columbia commissioners, the said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall issue certificates of indebtedness against the property, which certificates shall bear interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum until paid, and which, until they are paid, shall remain and be a lien upon the property on or against which they are issued. And if the said certificates are not paid within one year, the said commissioners of the District of Columbia shall, upon the application of the holder thereof, proceed to sell the property against which they are issued, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay said tax; such sales to be first duly advertised, daily, for one week, in some newspaper published in the city of Washington, and to be made at public auction to the highest bidder; and a deed given by the said commissioners of the District of Columbia in pursuance hereof shall be deemed and held to be a good and perfect title to any property bought at such sale hereby authorized: Provided, That the owner of said real estate shall have the right to redeem the property sold by paying the amount of purchase money and 10 per cent., with costs, on the amount of the said purchase within one year from the date of the sale.

SEC. 7. That the said paving commission shall not repave that portion of Pennsylvania avenue between Ninth and Tenth streets, on the north side of the railroad-track, unless it may be necessary for them so to do to perfect the whole system and is necessary to make an even and regular grade. Where street railroads cross Pennsylvania avenue, the pavement between their tracks shall conform to the kind of pavement used on the said avenue; and the companies owning these intersecting railroads shall pay for paving the same in the same manner and proportion as is required by section 3 of the Georgetown and Washington Railroad Company.

SEC. 8. That it shall be the duty of the commissioners of the District of Columbia to see that all water and gas mains, service-pipes, and sewer-connections are laid, without delay to the contractor, before the pavement authorized by this act is put down; and it shall be the duty of the board of water commissioners and of the Washington Gas-Light Company, under the direction of the said paving commissioners, to take up, lay, and replace all gas-pipes, water-mains, and connections on said Pennsylvania avenue, at such time and places as said paving commission may direct; and the old wood paving blocks, which are required to be removed under this act, shall be delivered to the said commissioners of the District of Columbia for such use or disposition as they may see fit to make.

SEC 9. That the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not heretofore appropriated, and a like amount is directed to be paid by the District of Columbia commissioners to the said paving commission to defray the necessary expenses of said commission.

MAILING OBSCENE BOOKS, ETC.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the bill, (H. R. No. 2575) with the Senate amendment thereto, be taken from the Speaker's table for action at this time.

There being no objection, the bill (H. R. No. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, providing the penalty for mailing obscene books, and other matters therein contained, and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails, with the Senate amendment, was taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was to insert in line 1, after the words "picture paper," the word "writing." There is no necessity for discussion, and I move that the Senate amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I rise for the purpose of calling for the regular order.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman yield to me to offer a resolution of inquiry?

Mr. LORD. I will do so, upon the condition that if it gives rise to discussion the gentleman will withdraw it.

INVESTMENT OF INDIAN TRUST FUNDS.

Mr. SEELYE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was read, considered, and adopted:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Interior be requested to inform this House what portions, if any, of the Indian trust funds have been invested in securities other than stocks of the United States since the passage of an act approved September 11, 1841, to repeal a part of the sixth section of the act entitled "An act for the support of the Military Academy of the United States for the year 1838, and for other purposes," passed July 7, 1838; when and by whom such investment was made; and that he give a detailed description of such securities, with a statement of their approximate value, in what amount and for how long default, if any, has been made in the payment of interest.

Mr. SEELYE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LORD. I will yield to two or three gentlemen to introduce bills for reference only.

CŒUR D'ALÈNE INDIANS.

Mr. FENN, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3850) to provide for negotiations with the Cœur d'Alène Indians, in the Territories of Idaho and Washington, and making appropriations for their use and benefit; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

REVISION OF PATENT LAWS.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on Patents, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3851) revising the patent laws; which was read a first and second time, recommitted to the Committee on Patents, and ordered to be printed.

JOHN R. WILLIAMS.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3852) granting a pension to John R. Williams, a soldier of the war of 1812; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

SUNDRY CIVIL BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; and move that they be printed and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. I now call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award, upon which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Mr. Speaker, it would occupy more time than the business before this House would justify me in taking to do full justice to the subject now under consideration. The most that I can do is to make a brief summary of the points upon which, in my opinion, the consideration of this question should rest by way of supplement to the arguments already made.

Great Britain inconsiderately and, as our Government maintains, improperly granted belligerent rights to the Confederate States. This point being gained, the States in rebellion fitted out vessels of war to prey upon and destroy American commerce. These vessels were encouraged by the British government. Others were built and fitted out in British ports. The United States claimed that these proceedings were unwarranted, and insisted that England was responsible to her as a nation, not to individuals, for any damage that consequently had been done to any of her citizens. This claim England denied, denied that she was in fault, and denied that she could be held to respond in damages to our Government. Thus an issue was formed between the two nations. The treaty of Washington was thereupon entered into between these two parties, as nations, by which it was stipulated that a tribunal should be created for the decision of the question. This tribunal met at Geneva. The United States appeared before it, not as a representative of others, not as an agent, not as an attorney for anybody, but she appeared as a party plaintiff in her own right and in her national capacity, and filed her declaration, consisting of the various counts upon which she claimed her case was founded. To some of these counts Great Britain demurred, and our Government agreed that the demurrer to these counts might be pro forma sustained, in order that the principles of international law of such vast advantage to our Government and for which Great Britain by her demurrer contended might be forever settled, well knowing that, although settled against her in this particular instance, the decision would prove of inestimable advantage to her in the future. The rejected counts embraced the three following classes of claims:

First. The losses arising in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag.

Second. The enhanced payment of insurance or war premiums which our merchants were compelled to pay during the war.

Third. The prolongation of the war, by which a large sum was added to its cost and to the suppression of the rebellion.

These claims Great Britain contended no neutral nation should be compelled to pay. Our Government took Great Britain at her word, agreed to withdraw these three classes of claims, and accept in lieu thereof and as a consideration for such withdrawal the recognition for all time to come of the principles for which Great Britain contended. (See volume 2, page 526, of papers relating to Geneva award.)

As an evidence of the truth of this proposition I beg leave to quote from the correspondence between this Government and its representatives in England and before the Geneva tribunal. In a letter from Secretary Fish to the American minister he writes:

No. 18.] Mr. Fish to Mr. Schenck.

* * * In this correspondence I have gone as far as prudence would allow in intimating that we neither desired nor expected any pecuniary award, and that we should be content with an award that a state is not liable in pecuniary damages for the indirect results of a failure to observe its neutral obligations. It is not the interest of a country situate as are the United States, with their large extent of sea-coast, a small navy, and smaller internal police, to have it established that a nation is liable in damages, &c. * * * This Government expects to be in the future, as it has been in the past, a neutral much more of the time than a belligerent."—Papers of Geneva award, &c., volume 2, page 476.

In a telegram from Mr. Fish to the American minister and Mr. Davis, Mr. Fish says:

No. 114.] Mr. Fish to General Schenck and Mr. Davis.

* * * The President directs me to say that he accepts the declaration of the tribunal as its judgment upon a question of public law, which he felt that the interests of both governments required should be decided. * * * This is the attainment of an end which this Government had in view in the putting forth of those claims. We had no desire for a pecuniary reward, but desired an expression by the tribunal as to the liability of a neutral for claims of that character.—Papers, &c., volume 2, page 578.

There are other assertions of important neutral right, but these are among the most important. They seem all to be available in a possible future to the United States. * * * The United States have had occasion to look practically on both sides of the question, and therefore sometimes to assert neutral duties, while more generally asserting neutral rights and the policy of peace, to such an extent and under such circumstances as to have rendered the United States the champion of neutral rights.

HAMILTON FISH.

—Papers, &c., volume 4, pages 548, 549.

From these quotations, Mr. Speaker, it is manifest that this Government agreed that the claims for indirect damages involved in the three excluded classes should be withdrawn for the purpose of obtaining the advantage of the international rule which would be thereby established. But it is further manifest that our Government withdrew them simply as between herself as one nation and Great Britain as another. And it is equally plain that she, at the same time she withdrew them pro forma as between herself and Great Britain, reserved to herself the right, when she should come to indemnify her citizens out of the fund to be derived from Great Britain, to exercise her own discretion as to the disposal of the money awarded, and to give it if she chose even to the excluded classes; for in the letter of Secretary Fish to Messrs. Cushing, Evarts, and Waite he says:

Mr. Fish to Mr. Cushing, and same to Mr. Evarts and Mr. Waite.

SIR: The President having appointed you one of the counsel of the United States in the matter submitted to the tribunal of arbitration to meet at Geneva,

* * * it becomes necessary to give you briefly the President's instructions on the subject of your duties. * * *

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two Governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. * * * It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the argument of counsel.—Papers, &c., volume 2, page 414.

In accordance with these instructions our counsel said to the tribunal:

From these arrangements of the treaty it is apparent: * * Second. That these claims are all preferred by the United States as a nation against Great Britain as a nation, and are to be so computed and paid, whether awarded as "a sum in gross" under the seventh article of the treaty, or awarded for assessment of amounts under the tenth article.

The tribunal acted without objection upon this statement, (see note 7,) and awarded a sum in gross in satisfaction of all the claims—as far removed as possible from deciding whom the United States should indemnify from the award.

There were two modes, Mr. Speaker, provided by article 10 of the treaty for the payment of the damages to be awarded to the United States. One was to pay a sum in gross, and thus necessarily leave the distribution of the award to our Government in its discretion. The other was to appoint a board of assessors to ascertain and determine what claims are valid and what amount or amounts shall be paid by Great Britain to the United States on account of the liability arising from such failure, as to each vessel, according to the extent of such liability as decided by the arbitrators.

The Geneva tribunal therefore had the right either to award a sum in gross, and thus leave its distribution or disposal entirely to the discretion of the United States, or simply to decide whether or not Great Britain was in the wrong. If the latter decision alone was made, the tribunal was to make no award in money whatever, but the President, the Queen of Great Britain, and the Italian minister at Washington were to appoint three assessors, who should sit either in Washington, New York, or Boston, to decide upon an examination of each claim how much should be paid, not to the individual, but to the Government of the United States. (Article 10, treaty.)

The United States instructed its representatives before that tribunal to obtain the award in gross if possible, rather than the appointment of assessors, for the very reason that she wished to prevent any quasi distribution of this fund by any body other than herself. For this reason she told her representatives, "You will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded." In accordance with this desire and this request the tribunal did not resort to the appointment of assessors, but made its award in gross, leaving this Government entirely free as to the disposal of the money.

It does therefore appear to me that there can be no question as to the right of this Government to distribute this award as it pleases. But this is no new question. This identical position was taken by our Government before the award was made, after the award was made, and finally by the solemn declaration of Congress in its act of June 23, 1874, by which the court of Alabama claims was created and is now in existence. In sections 11 and 12 of that act it is provided what classes of claims shall be paid, to wit, all damages directly resulting from the cruisers Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, and all insurance companies who have lost on the sum total of their war risks. In the event that the class of cases thus provided for shall not absorb the whole award, the act further provides that "the balance shall remain a fund from which Congress may hereafter authorize the payment of other claims thereon." Congress has therefore already made its decision, and it is this latter provision of its law which renders necessary the bill which we are now considering, and because the money awarded has not been absorbed by the class of cases already provided for in that act.

The question therefore now before us is, What shall we do with the balance of this fund? The answer is, it must be distributed to the most meritorious of the sufferers by the confederate cruisers. The Government must resolve itself into a court of equity and look conscientiously into the question as to who are the most meritorious of these sufsufferers. The Judiciary Committee has considered this question. The subcommittee to whom this bill was referred has given this important matter grave and serious consideration. Their conclusions form the majority report which I am now considering and advocating. The bill which the majority of the committee has reported provides that the first class to be paid out of this remaining fund shall be the claims directly resulting from damage done by the confederate exculpated cruisers, and for which no compensation has been thus far provided by Congress. The bill secondly provides for actual losses in premiums paid for war risks, and thirdly secondary losses or sums actually paid by insurance companies on property insured by such companies.

In opposition to these views we have two other reports from members of the Judiciary Committee. One is in favor of paying the insurance companies first. The other (presented by Judge LAWRENCE) is opposed to paying out any more of the fund at all and favors covering the whole balance, consisting of about $12,000,000, into the Treasury of the United States. To the latter of these two propositions I could never assent. While I admit the Government has a right as between herself and England to do as she pleases with the money, yet I insist that this Government ought to ascertain who have been the greatest sufferers by the confederate cruisers and as far as possible compensate them for their actual losses. Unless we do this, rather than keep this money I should insist that every dollar of it be paid back to England.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. If the whole people are the greatest losers, then do they not have the strongest claim upon this fund? Therefore, let it be covered into the Treasury for their benefit.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The gentleman says the whole people were the greatest losers?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir; and if the losses have fallen on the whole people, as they have, why should not the whole people get the benefit of this fund?

Mr. CAULFIELD. That is the argument the gentleman presents. The gentleman's report, as I understand it, agrees with us completely up to that point. He agrees that this money was given to this Government to distribute as to her might seem best. But while the whole people may have been, and certainly were, sufferers by this war, still there have been individuals who have suffered more individually in their particular cases than the whole people have suffered in the aggregate. In other words, these individuals have suffered their share in the general loss and suffered personally in addition. Therefore, we are in favor of paying those who can show their losses in dollars and cents what they have actually lost. And when you come to ask what this whole people has lost, I ask who can make the computations?

Now as to the claims of the insurance companies. I must say I should be exceedingly glad if I could conscientiously give this money to them in the very first instance. It would result greatly to the advantage of my constituents and of my own city of Chicago, who have lost so heavily by the disastrous fire which laid that great city in ashes. Many of the companies now claiming this fund were insurers of property in Chicago and became bankrupt by that fire. Could these companies be allowed to absorb this fund they would be enabled to partially pay their losses to my constituents and my city. But they ask that no injustice shall be done to others for their advantage. I can see no equitable view under which the insurance companies are entitled primarily to this fund as a matter of right.

These companies claim that they were the real plaintiffs before the Geneva tribunal and that the United States represented them as an attorney represents a client. As I have before maintained, this Government represented herself and nobody else. She claimed to have been damnified by Great Britain by the destruction of large amounts of property, and presented the losses of her citizens as evidence of her claim. She represented no more the insurance companies than the war-premium men; no more those who lost by the inculpated cruisers than the exculpated cruisers. She was there in her own person demanding reparation for wrongs done to her as a nation, vindicating her own honor and self-respect and showing her determination to maintain them at all hazards. The insurance companies further claim that the United States recovered this money for them and that she holds it, therefore, as a trust fund. This view is utterly groundless. In the first place, the insurance companies had no claim against Great Britain. An attorney or agent for the collection of a claim must show that his principal has some claim against the person from whom he is seeking to recover. But these sufferers of all descriptions had no claim against Great Britain, and therefore could have no attorney. Secondly, they had no claim against the United States, and therefore have no legal claim upon the money recovered. There has, however, been a legal adjudication of this very question, from which I quote. The court of Alabama claims, in Williams vs. The United States, say:

Let not the proper attitude of the claimant to the fund for distribution be misunderstood. Whatever his loss may have been, he had not the power to obtain compensation from Great Britain by his own act. Her army and navy would have proved uncomfortable obstacles in his way to her treasury. Just here the Government of the United States took up his case, and by the exercise of its powers as a sovereign, after years of patient labor, by the highest skill in diplomacy, without the loss of blood or treasure, obtained the whole amount due for the depredations complained of, thus achieving a triumph which may, in the progress of civilization, take a higher rank than the profoundest achievements in arms. How the amount of the award obtained at Geneva was made up, what precise species of losses it was intended to cover, or even how the interest was computed, is not known, and a careful study of the opinions of the several arbitrators has shown us that it was not intended to be known outside of the tribunal itself. The Government of the United States accepted the sum awarded in full settlement of all the claims comprehended in the terms of the treaty, and soon afterward Congress passed the act providing for its distribution among the claimants, which is to be our chief guide in the actual work of distribution. It is clear that the Government had the right to prescribe the terms on which claimants should present their claims. They were not strong enough to compel payment of the money by Great Britain, and when this Government obtained it the claimants had no legal rights to it, except that which this Government, by its own acts, chose to accord. They must, therefore, take their respective shares of it, subject to all the conditions which the Government has thought fit to appoint, or not take them at all.

And in the more recent decision of Rhind, executor, vs. The United States, they say:

If the right of the petitioner to a part of the fund received from Great Britain were a right of property legally vested in him, it is clear from the cases which have been cited that a pardon would restore it, and that any denial of the right by Congress would be unavailing to defeat it. Has he such a right? He had a right of property in the ship which the Alabama destroyed, and he lost it without any act on the part of the Government of the United States which could give him redress against it. The Government of the United States was not obliged to claim from Great Britain payment of the loss, but acted in that regard according to its sovereign pleasure. It did not succeed in obtaining payment of the whole of the claim presented, and the most careful investigation of the proceedings at Geneva has failed to show what claims were included in the award and what excluded therefrom. The award was made in favor of the Government, and not in favor of the claimants. The Government thus vindicated the national honor, but it did not assume to pay any particular class of claimants nor any particular claim. Having obtained the money by its own act and at its own cost, it had the right to prescribe the terms on which the distribution should be made. It certainly had the power to exclude certain claimants and to include others less meritorious. In the act now before us, claimants are excluded who believe themselves justly entitled to a part of the fund, but they have no power to assert their right to it. Under the powers committed to us, we have in some instances rejected altogether claims presented at Geneva, and in many more instances we have largely reduced such claims in amount.

It is claimed very earnestly on the part of the insurance companies that they are entitled to this fund by the doctrine of subrogation. This position cannot be maintained. Subrogation means being substituted to the rights of another in any given thing either by the voluntary act of the owner or by the act of law. It is evident from what we have seen that no owner of property destroyed by these confederate cruisers had any claim or was the owner of any right against England. What, then, was there to which the insurer could be subrogated? Certainly nothing. But they say:

True, there was nothing at the time of the loss, but since the award by the Geneva tribunal there is something which is the subject of subrogation.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes, sir.

Mr. HILL. If none of these losers acquired any right against either Great Britain or the United States for any of their losses, upon what principle of law or equity is it that you are paying this fund to anybody at all? If it was recovered in the name of the United States and in right of the United States, how is it that anybody has a right to claim the fund from the United States?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Before I answer your question I want to understand your position. Do you deny that this money was recovered in the name of the United States and by the United States as a nation?

Mr. HILL. I will say to my friend that I have no position in the matter. I am listening very earnestly for information that will enable me to arrive at a conclusion. But I will say to him this: I understand there is a difference between the right of a citizen as against the Government and the power of a citizen as against the Government. I do understand that the citizens who sustained these losses had no power to sue either Great Britain or the United States. But I do not understand that because they had no power to sue for these losses therefore they had no right. I insist they may have had a right where they had no power, and which it was the duty, the moral duty, of the Government to regard.

Now, my view of it is, if the gentleman will pardon me, that the citizens of the United States who sustained losses by the acts of certain cruisers, to wit, the Alabama, the Florida, and the Shenandoah after she left Melbourne, have certain rights against the government of Great Britain because Great Britain had no right to authorize the destruction of their vessels; that is, she was guilty of negligence in those particulars, and therefore the liability accrued. It is true the United States recovered that liability in their name.

Mr. CAULFIELD. To whom does the right accrue, the individual or the nation?

Mr. HILL. I say the right accrues to the individual according to my idea, because the United States did not own the property destroyed. If the United States did not own the property destroyed, how did the United States get any rights because of the destruction of that property? I insist that the right belongs to the person, the owner of the property destroyed, if the liability arises from the destruction of the property——

Mr. GARFIELD. You are perfectly right.

Mr. HILL. And this money is recovered by the United States for the benefit of the real owner.

Mr. CAULFIELD. As an agent?

Mr. HILL. Yes, sir. And it is the moral obligation of the United States as a government to recover that property for the benefit of the citizen, as part of the protection which the Government owes to the citizen.

Now I go back to the question. If you say the citizen has no right against the Government of the United States and the Government has no right whatever in the property destroyed, how is it that the Government or the citizen can recover? If the Government recovers, it recovers because of a right of property in the citizen, and if so, it must recover for the benefit of the citizen who had the right of property.

Mr. CAULFIELD. If the gentleman from Georgia will now take his seat I will answer his speech.

Mr. HILL. I have not been making a speech. In reply to my question the gentleman asked me another question, and asked me to answer it, and I attempted to do so.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I shall answer the gentleman in the first place by the language of the decision of the court which I first read. Is the gentleman prepared to go behind that decision, or to deny that that decision is law? That decision is that no individual had any right either as against Great Britain or as against the United States. I plant myself upon the law, and that is my answer to the gentleman.

Mr. GARFIELD. What decision is that? I was out when the gentleman read it.

Mr. CAULFIELD. There are two decisions of the court of Alabama claims. One is in the case of Williams vs. The United States; the other is the case of Cadwallader D. C. Rhind, executor, vs. The United States.

Mr. HILL. If I understand the gentleman he uses the word "right" as synonymous with power. No citizen has the right or the power to sue the Government. But does that destroy the right of a citizen in his own property?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I had not gotten through with my reply to the gentleman. I answer that that is the law, and that is answer enough to anybody. The gentleman wants to know the difference between the right and the power of the citizen in cases like this. Does the gentleman contend that in anything that occurred between Great Britain and this country any citizen of this country acquired a right against Great Britain? He admits that he does not. And he admits that no citizen acquired a right against this Government. That is admitted.

Now, why is it that the Government of the United States claims she had the right to recover damages for the destruction of any property in which she herself had no individual right? How is the wealth of a nation made up? I ask the gentleman is it not made up by the individual wealth of every citizen of the nation? And whenever a citizen is damnified in his property or his estate by a foreign government, the Government is pro tanto damnified, and the Government steps forward and recovers a portion of the wealth which has been taken away from her by the damage which has been done to a single individual, and if one individual has been a loser to the extent of $100,000, and a hundred more individuals have been losers to the extent of a million dollars, I ask if the aggregate wealth of the country had not been diminished to that extent?

Mr. HILL. I concede the right of the Government to recover; but the question is, for whose benefit does she recover? For her own benefit and as her own right and property, or for the benefit of her citizens and as their right and property?

Mr. CAULFIELD. She has the right, the absolute right as we maintain (if you contend for nothing but right) in this case and the power to cover this money into the Treasury, and Great Britain and nobody could say one word in contravention of it. But she must at the same time as a nation have a conscience, and that conscience tells her that this money ought as a matter of equity to be distributed among those who have been actual sufferers and losers.

Mr. GARFIELD. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Certainly.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman, as I understand him, says that the Government has no other wealth than the wealth of the citizens?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I did not say "no other."

Mr. GARFIELD. Well, that is not material.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I said the individual wealth of each and all of the citizens aggregated together makes up the wealth and power of the Government. Do you deny that?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all. I am simply running back to get a jump.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Do not run too far back for your jump.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman then says that the losses accruing to these individual citizens by the action of Great Britain were taken up by our Government and recovered, and that the Government was under no obligation, no legal obligation, to turn over this property to the citizens from whom it was taken; only a kind of equitable conscientious obligation. How does he get over that clause of the Constitution that does not allow the Government to take the private property or use the private property of any citizen without just compensation?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Why, my dear sir, in the first place you beg the question.

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes, sir; you beg the question. The very question you ask implies that this award is the property of the citizen. It was not the property of the citizen that was recovered by this award, and how can you go back of the question and ask me if this clause of the Constitution conflicts with my view when it says that no private citizen's property shall be taken without compensation? The private property of the citizen is not taken in this case by the Government of the United States.

Mr. GARFIELD. If the United States gets an agent to do the taking and then holds out its lap and catches the splinters, it is absolved, according to the gentleman's view, from its obligation to the private citizen—that is, if it gets a third party to do the taking.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Does the gentleman contend that England was the agent of the United States in destroying these vessels?

Mr. GARFIELD. Not at all.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Then where is your argument?

Mr. GARFIELD. But England was responsible for their destruction.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I am afraid the gentleman has not fully studied the question.

Now if the gentleman will allow me, I will go on.

Mr. HILL. I wish to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I really do not know how I am going to vote. I addressed the question to him which I did because I wanted information; and I would like him, if it would not be interrupting him, to answer me another question. The gentleman said a little while ago that this award of the tribunal at Geneva included all the claims that were filed; those that were rejected as well as the others.

Mr. CAULFIELD. I did not mean to say "excluded." I will explain that upon this idea: If you present a dozen claims against me, for instance, and there are three or four of those claims that I am not willing to recognize or that I know nothing about, then, when I am settling with you I take a receipt from you covering all claims to date, as well those which I have admitted as those which I did not admit, in order that you should have hereafter no further claim or excuse for claim against me, and that I may show your receipt as a bar against any further claim or action against me.

Mr. HILL. Here is the point——

Mr. CAULFIELD. Therefore, while they may not have been included in the award, they are settled by the award beyond all further question.

Mr. HILL. Here is the point: If I present to you a dozen claims which I hold against you, and you insist that half of those claims you are not liable for, then after you have insisted and I have agreed that you are not liable for those claims both of us agree that those claims shall be excluded from consideration, and afterward you pay me an amount in full for the remaining six claims for which I say you are liable and for which you admit you are liable, or the court adjudges you are liable, how is it that afterward, in the distribution of the gross sum, you can come in and say that the six claims we both agreed should be excluded should participate in that distribution?

Mr. CAULFIELD. The way to settle that is simply to go to the treaty and the award.

Mr. HILL. That is what I want.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Article 7 of the treaty provides:

The said tribunal shall first determine as to each vessel separately, whether Great Britain has by any act or omission failed to fulfill any of the duties set forth in the foregoing three rules, or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent with such rules, and shall certify such fact as to each of said vessels.

Now comes the point:

In case the tribunal find that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, it may, if it think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it.

Mr. HILL. This is what I mean——

Mr. CAULFIELD. Wait a moment; I am not through yet. In case the tribunal finds that Great Britain has failed in any particular case then she shall pay a sum in gross in satisfaction of all the claims referred to it, whether they are excluded or not. Now these claims were all referred, but some were withdrawn. Still the sum paid is intended to be in full satisfaction of every claim that was referred. Now let us read the award, and you will find that it comports exactly with the treaty. This is the language of the award:

The tribunal, making use of the authority conferred upon it by article 7 of the treaty, by a majority of four voices to one, awards to the United States the sum of $15,500,000 in gold as an indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty.

Mr. HILL. The only point is this, and it is the turning point with my vote in this case, and I think with the votes of several others.

Mr. CAULFIELD. Well, we will see if we can settle it for you.

Mr. HILL. "All cases referred to the tribunal for consideration."

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes.

Mr. HILL. How does that include the cases expressly agreed to be excluded from consideration?

Mr. CAULFIELD. These cases were not really excluded from consideration; for how could they have been excluded unless they were considered? They must have been first considered before they were excluded, and if considered at all they were "referred" to the tribunal for consideration, and had to be "referred" before they could be excluded. It does seem to me that that ought to satisfy the gentleman.

Mr. HILL. It does not quite, I am sorry to say. As I understand the pleadings they excluded certain cases from consideration.

Mr. CAULFIELD. They were merely excluded pro forma, as between the two nations.

Mr. HILL. No; it was made before the answer of Great Britain was put in.

Mr. CAULFIELD. It was made at a preliminary meeting of the tribunal, when all the claims were put in and referred to the tribunal.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. CAULFIELD. I am getting mighty tired answering questions, for I want to get through, as my time is drawing to a close.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Were not the decision and the award for the benefit of the actual losers?

Mr. CAULFIELD. Yes; the award says that it was for the benefit of the actual losers. Then it points out certain vessels which committed these ravages upon the high seas, and those vessels are what are called inculpated cuisers; the others are called exculpated cruisers.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Are not the claims of many of the insurance companies who are coming here in the hands of speculators who purchased them for a mere song?

Mr. CAULFIELD. That question I am not able to answer. It may be so, but I cannot assert it.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I am satisfied in my own mind that many of these claims are held by parties who did not pay ten cents on the dollar for them, who are mere speculators.

Mr. CAULFIELD. The position that the insurance companies are entitled to this money by way of subrogation, as I have said before, is equally fallacious. Neither the insurance companies nor any other claimant can point out a single individual loss that has been calculated in that award. After the rendition of the Geneva award certain citizens of Great Britain claimed that, as American citizens had been indemnified, they too should be compensated for similer losses by Great Britain. But the British government rejected their claims. (London Times, May 24, 1873; see Foreign Relations of the United States, 1873, part 1, page 368.) Mr. Gladstone, then prime minister, said in the British Parliament:

It appears to be implied that the government submitted the claims of certain persons not subjects of Her Majesty to arbitration. This is altogether a mistake.

No claims of individuals have been submitted to arbitration in relation to the Alabama.

What was submitted to arbitration was entirely a question between the two governments.—London Times, May 27, 1873, page 377.

No claimant has acquired any legal right to any portion of that award. There is no more now to be subrogated to than there was before that award was made. Furthermore, the insurance companies did not engage in these marine risks with any idea of compensation or subrogation. They went in to lose or win, never anticipating or dreaming of such a thing as the Geneva award. It was as unexpected to them as the happening of any unexpected event in the dark future is to us at present.

However the doctrine of subrogation may apply in ordinary cases, it has no application here. There is no fund to which the doctrine can apply. That fund was recovered by the United States in her own right, averring at the time that—

The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case.

This Government would not allow the rights and claims of insurers to be passed upon by the tribunal but insisted that she would reserve that right to herself, not to be exercised until the termination of the case. Then of course it could not be acted upon at all by the tribunal. The case is terminated; she has exercised that right, and by the act of June 23, 1874, decided pro hac vice against the claims of all insurance companies who had not lost on the sum total of their war risks. To such as had thus lost she allowed compensation for all actual losses caused by all the cruisers, both "exculpated and inculpated."

But after the payment of these and all other losses provided for by that act there is a large fund left. This Government is now again exercising "its right to decide as to the claims and rights of insurers."

We are again called upon to say, "What shall we do with it?" We must do whatever appears most just and proper to be done. We must pay actual losers who have not yet been paid. But the great majority of the insurance companies are not actual losers. The actual losers among the insurance companies were provided for under the last or present law. They came forward and their claims as filed in the whole amounted to only $48,000; they only proved $12,000. These insurance companies admit they are not actual losers by not having gone forward and filed their claim under the present law. They come now to us and say "We are not actual losers by the war; we could not come in under the present act; we made money out of the war; but we did not make as much as we might have made if those cruisers had not destroyed some of the vessels and property we insured." The fact is, the insurance companies made millions of dollars by the existence of these cruisers. These cruisers were encouraged to ply their avocation upon the high seas by the precipitate action of Great Britain in recognizing the belligerent rights of the confederacy. But for the recognition of those rights our commerce would have been safe, these cruisers would not have sprung into existence, and the insurance companies would have had no means of making money by their large war premiums; so that England instead of damaging has put millions of dollars into the coffers of the insurance companies. And yet one company will come forward with its claim of a loss of $10,000 in a particular instance when on the whole it has made $200,000 by these very cruisers. This award was not intended to cover such a loss.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. HILL. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended, as he has been interrupted so much.

There was no objection.

Mr. CAULFIELD. This Government never made a claim for any such losses. She made no claim for those who had made money by the war. She could not say as a nation that she had been injured by damages which Great Britain had done to her insurance companies, because Great Britain could have replied, "So far from doing those companies any damage I have filled their coffers with money which they have made out of their war premiums, and which they would not have made had we not accorded belligerent rights to the confederacy. Besides, supposing these companies had not made a dollar, still in equity they would not be entitled to any portion of this fund. They went into the business of war risks voluntarily, with their eyes wide open, never dreaming of any compensation for losses except such as they would make by their increased premiums. There was no reason why they should lose any money if every American bottom was swept from the ocean. Every American bottom might have been swept from the ocean and the insurance companies never have lost a cent. If they had not insured there was no danger of their losing. They went into the business, then, as a pure speculation, expecting to lose in some instances, and charging high premiums so as to make up for their losses in particular cases. Every loss which each company made in any particular case was anticipated and charged in the heavy premiums which the company exacted. So that they have been paid and overpaid for all losses they have sustained and made millions besides.

However, the rule of law is that claimants must not recover upon the weakness of the claims of their opponent, but upon the strength of their own. We have sufficiently shown the weakness of the claims of insurance companies. Let us now see if the strength of the owners of vessels destroyed on the high seas by the cruisers exculpated by the Geneva tribunal and the war-premium men is sufficiently great in itself to merit compensation at the hands of this Congress. In the first place, the claims of vessel-owners who suffered losses by the exculpated cruisers are said to have been excluded by the Geneva tribunal. They were excluded upon mere technical grounds in a preliminary investigation as between the two nations, and the United States consented to their exclusion for the purpose of obtaining the benefit and advantage of the international rule established by their exclusion; but the United States reserved to herself the private right to remunerate them, if she saw fit; for, she said, if you award me a sum in gross I am not to be restricted as to mode of distributing that fund. Furthermore, the award was made in gross "to the United States a sum of $15,500,000 in gold as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformable to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty. These losses were provided for by article 7 and were accordingly presented, and, while their exclusion debarred them of consideration by that tribunal, it does not debar them from the consideration of this Government.

But ought they to be considered by this Government? So far as the United States is concerned they stand upon the same equitable footing as the vessels and goods destroyed by the inculpated cruisers, Alabama, Florida, and Shenandoah, because one of the reasons for excluding the exculpated cruisers given by Great Britain would be no excuse for this Government. That reason was that the United States furnished no proof, gave no notice to Great Britain of the character of these vessels, and furnished no proof that Great Britain had any knowledge of their intentions and mission. But this would be no reason in the mouth of our Government. Besides the cause which called into existence the exculpated cruisers and the inculpated cruisers is the one and the same, to wit: The granting of belligerent rights to the Confederate States. It is for damage resulting from the granting of those rights that we made our claim on Great Britain and for which we recovered $15,500,000 from her. Therefore the losses by exculpated and inculpated cruisers stand upon the same footing so far as this Government is concerned. Then as to the war premiums. They too were in a similar manner excluded by the Geneva tribunal, but they were in a similar manner reserved for consideration by our Government. Their claims too are meritorious in themselves for the reason that they are actual losers, because in order to obtain credit for the purchase of goods abroad they were compelled to pay insurance in addition to the ordinary marine insurance, and in the same manner exporters were obliged to incur the same additional expense, because of the presence of these cruisers upon the high seas.

Again, these war-premium men could not recover these large premiums back by covering them into the prices they charged for their imported fabrics, for the reason that so many American vessels sailed under neutral flags, and so many goods were brought to our shores by British and other foreign vessels, that the competition alone kept down the prices of goods imported by those who paid the war premiums. These claimants, therefore, are actual losers to the amount of the premiums paid by them, minus the amounts they have received from dividends or otherwise. These two classes of cases, therefore, we deem actual losers and meritorious claimants for compensation out of this fund.

It is, however, supposed that these two classes will not absorb the entire sum yet at our disposal. If there be any residue, as we think there will be, we then provide, after the payment of these primary losses or claimants are satisfied, that the insurance companies or secondary claimants may present their claims and obtain a pro rata satisfaction of their claims. We believe that the final distribution of this fund pro rata among the insurance companies is more just than the covering of it into the Treasury of the United States or returning it to Great Britain. Thus a perplexing question is avoided. As we have reserved to ourselves the right to dispose of this fund as our own discretion may dictate, we do not feel that we would leave ourselves entirely free from unfavorable criticism if we should retain any of this money for our own benefit, no matter how clear and unquestionable our right to do so might appear.

I believe the report of the majority of the committee, which embraces the views I have advocated, makes the most just and equitable distribution of the fund, and I hope it will be adopted by this House.

Mr. LORD. I now withdraw the motion to recommit, and call the previous question on the pending bill, amendments, and substitute.

Mr. TUCKER. I ask the gentleman to allow me to offer a substitute for the bill before the House.

Mr. LORD. I cannot do it. I am under instructions from the Committee on the Judiciary not to allow any new matter to be introduced, any proposition that has not been debated. I know the proposition of the gentleman, and the committee are unanimously against it.

Mr. TUCKER. Will the gentleman from New York give me two minutes to state what my substitute is?

Mr. LORD. I do not know how far I would waive any right by so doing. I do not desire to waive any right, and I propose to call the previous question on the bill and substitute and on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would inquire of the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] whether he will allow me to offer some amendments to the original bill? I have offered a substitute, but, should that be voted down, I desire to offer certain amendments to the original bill. Those amendments have been incorporated in the record, when I made some remarks on the bill, and are understood by the gentleman from New York. I hope he will allow them to be offered.

Mr. LORD. I cannot do that, for it would protract this matter indefinitely. I think the subject is now fairly before the House, under the bill introduced by Mr. KNOTT to repeal section 12, under the bill to pay the money into the Treasury, and under the amendments of Mr. JENKS. Beyond that the Committee on the Judiciary have instructed me not to go. I therefore call the previous question.

Mr. JENKS. I desire to offer my amendments. I read them as a part of my remarks, but did not offer them in form to the bill.

Mr. LORD. I supposed they were all offered. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. JENKS accordingly offered the following amendments to the original bill:

In section 1, line 9, strike out "three" and insert "two;"
In section 2, strike out all after "cruisers" in line 9;
In section 3, strike all after "allowed" in line 5;
In section 5, strike out "and judgments of the second class shall be paid before judgments of the third class are paid;" and
In section 5, strike out all after "unappropriated sum" in line 12.

Mr. LORD. I now call the previous question on the bill, the pending amendments, and the substitute.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman allow me now to submit a motion to recommit the bill and amendments, so that that motion may be pending when the previous question is ordered?

Mr. LORD. What is the object of the gentleman?

Mr. SPRINGER. My object is to recommit the bill to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LORD. I must object to any motion of that character.

Mr. SPRINGER. Then I suppose the only way in which that motion can be brought in is to vote down the call for the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is the only way in which it can be done now.

The previous question was then seconded.

The question being taken upon ordering the main question, upon a division there were—ayes 66, noes 23.

Mr. SPRINGER. No quorum has voted, and I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LORD and Mr. SPRINGER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported there were—ayes 87, noes 24.

No further count being demanded, the main question was ordered.

Mr. LORD. I now yield fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. At the request of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] I will yield to him for three minutes.

Mr. TUCKER. I have not time to make a speech upon this question, and I shall only explain the amendment which I desire to offer and the reason for it. I think, after the discussion that has been had on this question for three or four weeks past, this House will feel that it is not prepared to decide a judicial question. And the purpose of my amendment is that the whole subject in controversy shall, by a proper proceeding, be placed before the court for the Alabama claims with the right of appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States, to be decided according to the law and justice of the case.

My friend from Illinois [Mr. CAULFIELD] this morning, in sustaining the majority report, maintains, as I understand, this anomalous proposition: that with an award which upon its very face and in its terms declares the parties who are entitled to compensation and those who are not entitled, the majority report proposes to pay it to those who were injured by cruisers who were not inculpated. This is a most extraordinary proposition.

For what was this award made? Gentlemen say that the nation has recovered this award. Are we to be told that the nation has recovered upon behalf of a citizen that has suffered, and then will not pay the citizen who so suffered damage? But gentlemen say that this Government is not a trustee. Are we to be told the first day after the Centennial that all governments are not trustees for the people? And will the Government of the United States that brought this suit against Great Britain, claiming damages for injuries done to particular citizens, now turn around and say that they will not pay those citizens, and say to Great Britain that we virtually made a false statement, that we will pay but those who the arbitrators decided were not entitled to anything, and will not pay to those that the arbitrators decided were alone entitled to anything? That is the proposition of the majority.

The minority report says that we are to pay all the insurers, and the majority report says that in certain cases the insurers are to be paid. But if neither the insurers nor those other parties are entitled to it, if the nation recovered this award for itself and itself alone, and it is a question of mere option whether we will give it to anybody else, then I say turn it over into the Treasury, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] proposes. If it do not belong of right and justice to any private party, put it in the Treasury where the people of the country may get the benefit of it. The Government has no right to give away as a matter of grace what does not belong to the Government as a matter of right.

Mr. TUCKER. I desire just one moment more to say that I will offer that amendment if I can get it in. If I cannot got it in, I will vote against the majority report, and for the minority report. And if I cannot get the minority report, I will vote for the bill of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.] But I think it ought to be put before the courts that they may decide who is entitled to this fund.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate had passed a concurrent resolution assuming in the name of the people of the United States and directing the completion of the Washington monument in the city of Washington; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

The message further announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3411) authorizing the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys under the Geneva award.

Mr. HALE. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] is not before the House, and therefore there may be no technical need of answering its points. But as the gentleman has presented his plan so clearly, I think it worth the while to say this, and it covers the whole subject-matter: This is not from beginning to end a matter of law. It had its rise in a violation of law that could in no degree be remedied by any court under the sun. Certain American citizens suffered by depredations at the hands of a nation, Great Britain. There was from the beginning no power in any court by any principle of law, however well established in the courts between man and man, that would recompense the distressed, the suffering, the losing citizen. And much of the confusion and opposition to the bill of the majority of the committee reported by the gentleman from New York [Mr. LORD] has arisen because good lawyers have allowed themselves to be led away into a narrow channel of reasoning as if this was a thing in its inception between A and B in a county court, a State court, or the Supreme Court, whereas it is nothing of the kind.

There are certain things, Mr. Speaker, that Congress can do better than any court in the redress of the grievance of the citizen; and where the act upon which that grievance rests is the act of a foreign power, and where the machinery which had to be set at work to bring that foreign power to a situation and condition where it would do right had to be set in motion by Congress for the protection of its citizens, the outcome of that negotiation is to-day in our hands just as much as the rights of the suffering citizens were in our hands when we provided for the tribunal that should settle the amount which Great Britain should pay.

This plan is not a new thing, though new in this House. This matter has been fought over before in previous Congresses, when it was urged with force that the whole subject should be sent to the courts with the alluring clause that their adjustment should be upon principles of "equity." And the objection to that was then and is now that even if you put in a clause requiring "equity," you submit it to the courts which to-day are running in just as clearly and decisively fixed channels by decisions upon questions of equity as they are by decisions upon question of law.

My friend before me, [Mr. HILL,] who is a good lawyer, knows that the term "equity," as used in the courts has as clearly defined limitations in the courts and is controlled as much by binding authority as is a question of "law;" and the word has ceased to have the signification which it had three hundred years ago, when it simply meant the "arbitration of good men."

Mr. HILL. Equity follows the law.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; equity follows the law. So I dismiss this consideration.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is an act of some temerity to say anything on this question, which has been here occupying our time for days and days. It has been elaborately and most ably discussed; and there is not a new thing that I can present upon this subject-matter either upon the law of the case or the considerations of common justice. I only, in the little time that I have, want to present before this House the condition of certain classes of citizens, some of whom I am free to say I represent here, and so have as a Representative a warm interest in the question.

When the war broke out our mercantile marine was secure upon the seas. It was to a great degree prosperous. The Confederate-British armed cruisers went out upon all waters of the globe, and at once the ships of my constituents fell at a discount as clearly as if ten added years had been put upon their hulls, spars, and rigging.

No man's house was ever invaded and property taken therefrom, no man ever had a limb severed from his body and thereby losing a part of his efficiency, no man ever suffered by theft more swiftly, more materially, more determinedly than did the owners of American ships. It was the act of Great Britain, as has been settled by the tribunal. The fact that we have fifteen million and a half in the Treasury by the admission of Great Britain and the adjudication of the tribunal settles that point. My constituents, the constituents of every gentleman here who own vessels, were injured by the acts of Great Britain.

Now, sir, these men who owned vessels found as a result of the action of these cruisers upon the high seas that they were obliged to double, to treble, to quadruple the insurance rates in order to afford some protection to them and their property, and they believed from the beginning that their wrongs would be redressed; they believed that they would in due course of time be recompensed, and that Congress as the representatives of the people would see that this was done. And so it comes about that everywhere the owner of an American ship preserved the proofs and vouchers of his losses during the years when he was being made poor by the depredations of the cruiser or the exactions to which he was forced to submit by insurance companies. But while the ship-owner was being reduced to penury there were looming up in Boston, New York, and in other large cities companies which were fattening upon his losses.

Now if any gentleman has any doubt as to whom the recompense should come let him begin at the top of the scale and he will find that he will strike hard-pan when he gets down to the war-premium men. The owners of the ships that were burned and destroyed have been paid by the last Congress. The insurance companies took their money from the war-premium men and filled their coffers to repletion, and grew rich and fat, but the owners of the ships which were brought into competition with the ships of England, Denmark, Germany, and other countries, found their freights reduced by this competition and that they had nobody to charge the added expense of their war premiums to, and they were crushed out, and so it came about that a part of the owners of our vessels, obeying the law of self-protection, put their vessels in British hands, under the flag of Great Britain, for security; but another and the larger class whom I represent maintained themselves under our flag, paying heavy premiums all the time, and never being able to charge it upon freight; and so I say again that when you strike the war-premium man you have struck hard-pan.

The class in this bill known as war-premium men present almost as strong claim on our sympathy and our votes as do the wounded soldiers of the war.

Now, sir, these war-premium men would have been paid long ago but for human greed; the insurance companies, like all large corporations, were never satisfied, and as my colleague said the other day, they clamored for more, and if they got more they would have clamored for yet more. They came to this Congress at the beginning of this session. They had been before the Forty-second Congress and were ignominiously kicked from its doors; but what gentleman ever knew the modest claim of such combinations of men frowned down or set at rest by being once rebuffed? They came to the Forty-third Congress and again were kicked out, but still they are here again fighting for their claims and resorting to every imaginable device to prevent the war-premium men from getting their money.

The plan of the gentleman from Virginia is in the interest of these companies, in that it delays the suffering losers and helps to at least tire them out.

Now, I do not believe that this Congress, having at its control this fund, dealt with originally, as Mr. Fish's letter of instruction shows, for the benefit of the losers and not for the men who were fattened by their losses, is going back upon the acts of former Congresses; and I say again that but for the persistent fight made by these companies here and elsewhere the war-premium men who lost by the drain upon them, and who have been reduced to poverty, and the next meritorious class, the owners of vessels destroyed by the inculpated cruisers, would have been relieved and their claims paid long ago. And this gives me an opportunity to call the attention of the House to the fact that in all the legislation for the last ten years the interests of the American ship-builders have been constantly given the go-by. The Pacific States have had their railroads built, and these railroads have been subsidized. The Mississippi is being dredged for the benefit of the population bordering on that great river. Pennsylvania has had her coal and iron protected and Massachusetts and Connecticut have had protection for their spools of cotton, their needles, their gimblet screws, but the American ship-builder has always been turned out of Congress without remedy for his impoverished condition. He has never been able to get even a corner in railroad bills or tariff bills.

Mr. LORD. I now yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. GARFIELD.]

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] one question. It is, whether the second class mentioned in the pending bill will be provided for if the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is adopted?

Mr. HALE. I cannot tell.

Mr. GARFIELD. It is too late in this debate to make any argument on this great question. But I have desired to state very briefly the general grounds on which my mind has finally come to rest in the consideration of this subject. I have felt a very deep anxiety about this bill: first, for the credit of the United States, for the national name; second, (and I only say second, not in importance, perhaps, but in order of statement,) that exact justice shall be done to all parties concerned. The conclusions to which I have come can be stated in very few words.

It seems to me that very few grander phenomena have ever been witnessed in the affairs of nations than the settling of so great difficulties as we were involved in with Great Britain on the basis of friendly, judicial arbitration. It was substantially the setting up of a high court, a court probably higher than any other the world has known, to consider and adjudge a great international dispute and to make a final settlement. The two governments established the high tribunal, and filed the case and the counter-case, the argument and their reply. When all was in, both governments pledged the sanctity of their national faith to abide by the result. The award was given by the Geneva tribunal in very specific language in every respect save one. The pecuniary part of the award was on a gross sum, not distributed item by item to the several parties on whose account it was granted. But the tribunal did what was the next most definite thing. They stated in the solemn and precise words of the judgment itself every vessel for whose depredations the Government of Great Britain was liable, and they stated also specifically the names of all the vessels which the United States had claimed, but their judgment did not find that Great Britain was liable.

They discriminated so far as to state that one vessel, for example the Shenandoah before she departed from the harbor of Melbourne, did nothing for which Great Britain was liable, but that after the departure from Melbourne all the damage she inflicted upon American commerce was justly to be charged against Great Britain. So specific and careful were they in all the items of the award that they gave the grounds affirmatively and negatively on which the award was made.

And here I pause to notice an argument which has frequently been urged in this debate: that the tribunal awarded "to the United States a sum of $15,500,000 in gold as indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal," and therefore the amount of the indemnity may be applied to any of the alleged claims. It is a most singular use of words to say that this clause authorizes payment for claims which the award itself rejects as not valid. The argument proceeds upon a narrow and indefensible use of the word award, as though the money alone was the award. The language of the official judgment of the tribunal is decisive of this question. After reciting the authority by which they acted and the proceedings of the high contracting parties, by their agents and attorneys, the tribunal say:

> Having fully taken into their consideration the treaty, and also the cases, counter-cases, documents, evidence, and arguments, and likewise all other communications made to them by the two parties during the progress of their sittings, and having impartially and carefully examined the same, have arrived at the decision embodied in the present award.

Then follow the decision and award, which consist of, first, conclusions of law, in which the legal ground of the responsibility of Great Britain is stated; second, conclusions of fact, in which it is stated for what cruisers and for what time Great Britain was responsible; and, third, the amount of indemnity to be paid. This triple statement is the judgment, and nothing but the most violent construction can separate its elements and call any one of them judgment of the tribunal.

Now, in my opinion, we are bound by the whole judgment, and every sentiment of national honor should lead us to follow the award in its letter and its spirit. We have no right to inquire into the wisdom or unwisdom of the judgment. No doubt there were citizens who suffered as great and as grievous losses from the depredations of the exculpated cruisers as from any which the tribunal included in the list of inculpated cruisers, but this is a question, not making an award, but of executing a judgment, and from that duty we should not be diverted by any considerations but the language and command of the judgment itself.

Now, what is the award? The claims filed by the United States were of two kinds, national claims and claims of private citizens. In regard to the claims known as national claims, the tribunal of arbitration announced:

> That after the most careful perusal of all that has been urged on the part of the Government of the United States in respect of these claims, they have arrived, individually and collectively, at the conclusion that these claims do not constitute, upon the principles of international law applicable to such cases, good foundation for an award of compensation, or computation of damages between nations, and should upon such principles be wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal in making its award, even if there was no disagreement between the two governments as to the competency of the tribunal to decide thereon.

After this solemn decision how can it be affirmed that any part of the indemnity belongs to the nation as the payment of national damages? They were "wholly excluded from the consideration of the tribunal on making its award." So they must be from our consideration in distributing the indemnity.

In order to learn precisely what was excluded by the above judgment I read from the order of the President of the United States to the agent the following, which was read to the tribunal and made a part of its proceedings:

> The declaration made by the tribunal, individually and collectively, respecting the claims presented by the United States for the award of the tribunal, for, first, the losses in the transfer of the American commercial marine to the British flag; second, the enhanced payments of insurance; and, third, the prolongation of the war and the addition of a large sum to the cost of the war and the suppression of the rebellion, is accepted by the President of the United States as determinative of their judgment upon the important question of public law involved. The agent of the United States is authorized to say that, consequently, the above-mentioned claims will not be further insisted upon before the tribunal by the United States, and may be excluded from all consideration in any award that may be made.

This specific statement by our Government would be conclusive and binding upon us, even if the judgment of the tribunal were not. There remained still two grounds of controversy; first, the direct losses growing out of the destruction of the vessels by the cruisers which the tribunal should adjudge "inculpated;" and, second, the expenses incurred by the United States in the pursuit of these cruisers.

In reference to this second class the judgment of the tribunal is in the following language:

> Whereas, so far as relates to the particulars of the indemnity claimed by the United States, the costs of pursuit of the confederate cruisers are not, in the judgment of the tribunal, properly distinguishable from the general expenses of the war carried on by the United States; the tribunal is therefore of opinion, by a majority of three voices to two, that there is no ground for awarding to the United States any sum by way of indemnity under this head.

Thus was excluded the only remaining form of national claims; and we have the authority of the tribunal for declaring that no part of the $15,500,000 was allowed for any form of national claims.

There then remained only the losses to American citizens by the depredations of the inculpated cruisers within the time during which the tribunal found that Great Britain was responsible. Now, with such limitations fixed by the tribunal and acknowledged by the United States, an estimate was made of the amount of damages to private citizens; and the award was made in a gross sum, for two reasons: first, that the United States might have it immediately to distribute to the people who were entitled to it; and, second, that England should not be required to dribble it out in small payments, but might discharge herself of all further obligation by a single payment. After this we arrive at the final result of fifteen and a half millions of gold paid into our hands under the award for specific damages described in the judgment of the tribunal.

In view of the facts I have stated, it seems to me that we cannot, without the greatest national dishonor, use one dollar of this money for any other purposes than those declared in the award itself. When we have distributed the indemnity in strict accordance with the finding of the tribunal, if there be left a surplus of a million or five million, national honor demands that we return that surplus to Great Britain. I should consider it a proud honor for the American Congress to vote to send it back to Great Britain, and to say to her: "When we examined more carefully the items of losses, we found they were not so great as we had supposed. The difference is yours, not ours, and we return it."

Let us not put our nation in the shameful position of driving a sharp bargain to get a large sum on behalf of our citizens, and then put the difference into our Treasury, or vote it away to parties for whom it was not paid.

I shall vote against the bill of the majority, against the bill of my colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and in favor of the bill of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. LORD. I now yield for fifteen minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.]

Mr. SEELYE. I should not presume to speak upon this bill if the members of the legal profession who have discussed it were agreed in their conclusions. But when I find gentlemen whose learning and candor and clearness of thought compel the admiration of all who know them reaching directly contrary results and maintaining those results persistently and on both sides with great plausibility, I am compelled to investigate for myself. And even then I should contend myself simply with voting, if the gentleman who has charge of this bill, and who has already moved the previous question upon it, [Mr. LORD,] had not asked me to occupy a part of the closing hour.

It seems to me the whole question is this: Here is a certain amount of money in our hands and we do not know what to do with it. Congress has to determine what disposition shall be made of it. The first inquiry is, how did we get the money and what was it given to us for? That can be determined so clearly that there can be no mistake in regard to it. In the language of the arbitration itself the award was:

> To the United States a sum of $15,500,000, in gold, as the indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformable to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty.—Papers relating to the Treaty of Washington, volume 4, page 53.

That seems to be perfectly clear. It is given for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty. Now that article says this:

ARTICLE VII.

* * * * * * *

The said tribunal shall first determine as to each vessel separately whether Great Britain has, by any act or omission, failed to fulfill any of the duties set forth in the foregoing three rules, or recognized by the principles of international law not inconsistent with such rules, and shall certify such fact as to each of the said vessels. In case the tribunal find that Great Britain has failed to fulfill any duty or duties as aforesaid, it may, if it think proper, proceed to award a sum in gross to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for all the claims referred to it; and in such case the gross sum so awarded shall be paid in coin by the government of Great Britain to the Government of the United States, at Washington, within twelve months after the date of the award.

It is to be observed, as Mr. Cushing himself, in his remarks on the treaty of Washington, has said, that—

The arbitrators do not say for the satisfaction of certain specific claims among those referred to the consideration of the tribunal, but, "all the claims" so referred conformably to the provisions of the treaty. (Cushing's Treaty of Washington, page 165.)

They do not say "in satisfaction of certain claims upon which the tribunal may or may not have pronounced an opinion," but the language is "all the claims referred." Referred by whom? Of course by the two high contracting parties, Great Britain and the United States. Now, what were those claims? The answer to that is perfectly clear, and comes from the first article of the treaty of Washington, which declares as follows:

Whereas differences have arisen between the Government of the United States and the government of Her Britannic Majesty, and still exist, growing out of the acts committed by the several vessels, which have given rise to the claims generically known as the "Alabama claims;" now in order to remove and adjust all complaints and claims on the part of the United States, and to provide for the speedy settlement of such claims, * * * the high contracting parties agree that all the said claims growing out of the acts committed by the aforesaid vessels * * * shall be referred to a tribunal of arbitration.—Treaty of Washington, Article 1.

These claims were all referred and they were all paid, as expressly stated, by this award, by the fifteen and a half millions paid in gross to the United States. The question now comes up, in what method shall the United States proceed in the distribution of this award? I take it that the only answer that can be made to that question is, just that method which the United States may deem to be wise and equitable, and only that. The United States is not responsible to Great Britain nor to the tribunal at Geneva for the procedure she may here take. She is only responsible to the tribunal of history, that august tribunal before which all the nations are inexorably judged.

The tribunal of Geneva did not volunteer to offer any suggestion as to the way in which the United States should proceed in her distribution of the fund. That tribunal would have stultified itself if it had done any such thing. The United States neither asked nor accepted any direction as to how she should proceed in this distribution, and would have contradicted her whole procedure had she done so. The proof of this is perfectly clear from the direction which the Secretary of State gave to the counsel at Geneva, Mr. Cushing, Mr. Evarts, and Mr. Waite, in these words:

SIR: The President having appointed you one of the counsel of the United States in the matter submitted to the tribunal of arbitration, to meet in Geneva, * * * it becomes necessary to give you briefly the President's instructions on the subject of your duties. * * *

The President desires to have the subject discussed as one between the two governments, and he directs me to urge upon you strongly to secure, if possible, the award of a sum in gross. In the discussion of this question, and in the treatment of the entire case, you will be careful not to commit the Government as to the disposition of what may be awarded. * * * It is possible that there may be duplicate claims for some of the property alleged to have been captured or destroyed, as in the cases of insurers and insured. The Government wishes to hold itself free to decide as to the rights and claims of insurers upon the termination of the case. If the value of the property captured or destroyed be recovered in the name of the Government, the distribution of the amount recovered will be made by this Government without committal as to the mode of distribution. It is expected that all such committal be avoided in the argument of counsel. * * *

HAMILTON FISH.

—Papers, &c., volume 2, page 414.

We are therefore wholly untrammeled in the distribution of this award by anything which either Great Britain or the tribunal of Geneva has directed or to which the Government of the United States has agreed. We are to be guided in this matter simply by universal principles of wisdom and justice. What are those principles as bearing upon the case? Evidently the parties who have actually suffered losses and who have had no compensating advantages are the parties first entitled to be recognized in the distribution of this award; that is, the parties whose ships have actually been destroyed, which ships were not insured and the owners of which had no compensating advantages in trade. These are the losers to be first considered.

Then it would seem obvious that the parties who paid an enhanced rate of insurance, but who may in their ordinary mercantile transactions have had some compensating advantages, should be the second to be considered. Only in the third place, if at all, could the insurers properly claim any addition from this fund to their already enormous profits.

For these reasons I hold that equity and justice and wisdom demand the acceptance of the majority report.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LORD. I desire to take a few minutes myself.

Mr. SEELYE. Allow me one word more.

Mr. LORD. Certainly; five minutes or ten minutes more, if the gentleman desires.

Mr. SEELYE. I have a quotation from a much wiser person than myself, a most competent authority on this question, and bearing out the conclusions which I have affirmed; I beg leave to quote a single passage from Cushing's work on the treaty of Washington, from page 164, where he says:

But the history of the treaty and of the arbitration shows that the United States recover, not for the benefit of the American Government, as such, but of such individual citizens of the United States as shall appear to have suffered loss by the acts or neglects of the British government. It is, however, not a special trust legally affected to any particular claims or claimants, but a general fund to be administered by the United States in good faith, in conformity with their own conceptions of justice and equity, within the range of the award. If, according to any theory of distribution adopted by the United States, the sum awarded prove inadequate, we have no claim on Great Britain to supply the deficiency; on the other hand, if the award should prove to be in excess, we are not accountable to Great Britain for any balance. On this point precedents exist in the diplomatic history of Great Britain herself. The tribunal does not afford us any rules of limitation affecting the distribution of the award, unless in the declaration that "prospective earnings," "double claims" for the same losses, and "claims for gross freights," so far as they exceed net freight, cannot properly be made the subject of compensation; that is to say, as against Great Britain.

Nor does the tribunal define affirmatively what claims should be satisfied otherwise than in the comprehensive terms of the award, which declares that the sum awarded is the "indemnity to be paid by Great Britain to the United States for the satisfaction of all the claims referred to the consideration of the tribunal, conformably to the provisions contained in article 7 of the aforesaid treaty." (Cushing's Treaty of Washington, page 164.)

Mr. GARFIELD. I desire to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] a question. Does the satisfaction of "all claims" mean the satisfaction of rejected claims among the "all claims?"

Mr. SEELYE. I so understand it.

Mr. GARFIELD. I mean does it cover the payment of a claim which the tribunal had rejected?

Mr. SEELYE. The same treaty arranged that in case a board of assessors should be appointed to assess these claims there should be certain rules followed and certain claims rejected. But such a board was not appointed, and in the final award, as I understand it, there was no question about rejected claims. The tribunal took a different method, affirming that a sum in gross should be paid, a fact very significant in reference to the gentleman's inquiry. This sum in gross must have included and have been intended to cover some of the very claims which the gentleman speaks of as having been rejected by the tribunal, since this sum manifestly exceeds the amount of the claims which it is admitted on all hands were not rejected. It was a sum in gross supposed to cover all the claims, and must have covered more than the claims for losses by inculpated cruisers, because it is out of all proportion to those losses.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will the gentleman allow me a word there? These claims were satisfied just in the sense that a claim is satisfied which is sued upon, where the claimant is defeated and fails to recover from satisfactory cause; and there can be no further prosecution of the claim. They are not paid because they are not entitled to be paid.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendments, bills of the House of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

The bill (H. R. No. 2684) to amend sections 246 to 251 of the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, and for other purposes;

The bill (H. R. No. 1808) for the relief of Daniel Wormer, of Albany, New York; and

The bill (H. R. No. 1558) to remove the legal and political disabilities of Robert Ransom, of Virginia.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 852) for the relief of Elisha E. Rice;

A bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communications between America and Asia;

A bill (S. No. 944) for the relief of Gilderoy M. Hardy; and

A bill (S. No. 973) for the relief of Elizabeth Carson.

GENEVA AWARD.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys under the Geneva award.

Mr. LORD. Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to lay before the House the precise questions in regard to which we are to vote, I want to call attention to the heresy just announced by the distinguished gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] and which is based upon a clause of the treaty which has not been sufficiently considered. Enough has been said in regard to all the other parts of the treaty, and I will not repeat what has been said. But I wish the Congress to understand the full range of the treaty of Washington. The clause referred to is in these words:

ARTICLE XI.

The high contracting parties engage to consider the result of the proceedings of the tribunal of arbitration, and of the board of assessors, should such board be appointed, as a full, perfect, and final settlement of all the claims hereinbefore referred to.

Now, if it stopped there, the logic of my friend might have some force; the line of argument on which he seeks to put this claim might have some bearing. But what else does this article of the treaty say?

And further engage—

And to this I call the particular attention of members—

that every such claim, whether the same may or may not have been presented to the notice of, made, preferred, or laid before, the tribunal or board, shall, from and after the conclusion of the proceedings of the tribunal or board, be considered and treated as finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible.

Therefore the gentleman is altogether wrong in his assumption that the claim must in every instance be laid before the tribunal, because the treaty provides that those claims must be satisfied whether they have been presented to the tribunal or not.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The word is "settled."

Mr. LORD. "Finally settled, barred, and thenceforth inadmissible."

Now, I ask is it credible that it was the intention of those who framed this treaty of Washington to frame a treaty which satisfied every claim growing out of the Alabama claims for every possible wrong done by the confederate cruisers on the high seas, whether presented or not, and then to wholly ignore such claims? I ask is it conceivable that within the range of such a treaty the United States should present itself at the Geneva tribunal simply and only as the agent or attorney of certain corporations, utterly disregarding the fact of merit or demerit, satisfying all the claims, however meritorious or however weak, and going to the Geneva tribunal simply and only as the agent or attorney of insurers? I say any gentleman who will take the pains to think upon it will see beyond all question that when this treaty was framed—the Clarendon-Johnson treaty having been rejected as a bundle of private claims—it was framed on the theory that only national claims should be presented; that if individuals had lost fifteen and a half millions, the nation had also lost that amount of taxable property and should recover it as a nation; and when it agreed with Great Britain that every claim growing out of the depredations of the Alabama cruisers should be forever satisfied, is it within reason and common sense to suppose that this treaty made this august nation merely the agent of certain corporations? I say that such a theory is at war with all the fundamental facts that belong to the treaty and with the directions of the Government of the United States which have just been read, that this Government should not be in any manner committed as to the mode of distribution. On the contrary, this Government reserved to itself the sovereign right and absolute power to dispense this fund according to justice and the merits of the particular claims, whether of insurers or other parties, according to its sovereign will, guided only by its sense of justice.

Now I have already occupied the time of the House long enough in this line of argument. I only desired to bring before the House in answer to the position of my shrewd and experienced friend from Ohio the truth of the case, and to show that it made no possible difference not only whether the claim was rejected or not, but no difference whether it was presented or not.

By this treaty it was provided that all the Alabama claims should be forever satisfied. And can it be that this great Government was so unjust to its citizens—so absolutely unjust to some of you perhaps who may have the most meritorious of claims—as to satisfy their and your claims absolutely without reserving to itself the power of doing you any kind of justice because bound hand and foot in the toils of the insurers?

Now, I want for a few moments to call the attention of the House to the questions really before this tribunal, for the Congress is now sitting as the most august of tribunals for the purpose of doing justice in this matter. What, then, are the questions presented by these different reports? In the first place, there is a question presented by the insurance companies through the minority report submitted by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.] They claim they are entitled to the whole of this fund, by or under the doctrine of subrogation. Now, I have heretofore sufficiently argued this point; and it has been sufficiently argued by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. JENKS] and the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] Mr. WARREN of Massachusetts, and others. I am not going over that again. It is sufficient to say here that the insurance companies, according to the undisputed testimony before the committee and according to undisputed assertion before this House, by virtue of those cruisers being on the ocean have made millions of dollars. Now let us bring these claims right down to their direct merits. Suppose that when the treaty of Washington was being negotiated it appeared that nobody on earth had been injured by the depredations of these cruisers; that the southern confederacy had paid all of the loss; and suppose that the insurance companies had paid out only $6,000,000 by way of insurance, when they had received $12,000,000 for war premiums, would anybody on the face of the earth dream of disturbing international relations on that account? Is it not one of the idlest thoughts that could be presented to the human imagination to say that persons could go to Geneva saying that they had made $6,000,000 by the presence of these cruisers on the ocean and yet demand that the two nations should go into council to see what should be paid to them? Is it not one of the most absurd positions imaginable that these insurers would have had a right independent of all other persons and all other losses to go there and demand payment notwithstanding that they had, instead of losing, made millions of dollars?

Now what does the majority report propose to do? But, before coming to that, let me say that all there is of the minority report presented by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] is that these millions of dollars which are left are to be taken and paid over to corporations, when it is confessed all around that those corporations have not lost. If they have lost by reason of these cruisers, they can now recover.

Then, what is the second minority report? I come now to the astute report of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] who always rides a high horse, sometimes a good horse, but not always. In this matter he thought, very likely—if I may use a common though mistaken sentiment in reference to legislative proceedings—that it would "take with the people" to pay this large sum of money into the Treasury irrespective of the merits of the particular claimants. If this is the gentleman's view, I have a short answer to make to him. It is true that if Great Britain had to pay what the whole people of the United States suffered by reason of its action, that government to-day would have to pay many times the amount of the award. If compelled to pay what the people of the United States suffered by reason of the recognition of belligerent rights in the Southern States, and in consequence of other proceedings on the part of Great Britain, it would be a sad day for the latter. But these unprovided-for burdens have been borne by all our citizens alike, and what the gentleman forgets is that those persons who met with actual losses by reason of such action have suffered so much more than other citizens with whom they have borne the common burdens. If, therefore, they were compelled in order to keep the flag which covered their vessels afloat on the ocean to pay out war premiums, they should be protected. If an individual paid out $30,000 for war premiums and only received $10,000, there is an absolute loss to him of $20,000 by virtue of his keeping his vessel on the sea. In that case he would have lost $20,000 more than his next-door neighbor of equal property who paid no war premiums.

He would have lost in such case $20,000, and therefore, in view of justice and equity, he ought to be paid that sum out of a fund provided to pay losses before any general distribution.

Mr. LAWRENCE. But the gentleman does not remember that the bill reported by the committee proposed to pay the war-premium men, whether they sustained a loss upon their aggregate business or not. This is the necessary effect of the language employed in the bill.

Mr. LORD. That is not so. We provide that unless the claimant has lost he is not entitled to be paid. I say to the gentleman that if the bill is not precisely as I have stated the committee will admit an amendment at any time.

My venerable friend from the Onondaga district [Mr. LEAVENWORTH] says that we are going to violate some law. Not at all. This clamor about violating law and doing injustice thereby is a mere begging of the question. The treaty of Washington was designed, among other things, to recover the value of the vessels destroyed by the rebel cruisers. We have got fifteen and a half million dollars in the Treasury. I ask the House to remember, therefore, that without reference to the claims of insurance companies or war-premium men this amount is made up of the value of the vessels destroyed.

Prima facie the owner of the vessel is entitled; if he has been paid by the insurer the insurer is entitled; if the insurer has been paid by the war-premium claimants the latter are entitled. Thus by a succession clearer, if not so grand as the apostolic, we trace the money to its source and pay the actual loser. Therefore we claim that, as this fund is in the hands of the United States, it should be paid, according to the principles so clearly established in this debate, to the actual sufferers.

Now allow me to occupy the attention of the House for a moment longer. I will not take the residue of the hour to which I am entitled.

My eloquent friend from Virginia assumes that there is no opinion of any court sustaining the majority report. He wants a new tribunal created, or other powers conferred on the present court with appellate jurisdiction. This proposition, in substance, was largely rejected by the last Congress and has no advocate in the Committee on the Judiciary. It would greatly and unnecessarily burden the Supreme Court, now three years behind on its calendar, and therefore would do great injury to other suitors. By the treaty of Washington it is for the Congress to direct the mode of distribution of the Geneva award and the court already organized has been most faithful, and doubtless will be, in such distribution.

My learned friend from Virginia has said that we had occupied four weeks in the discussion of this measure. Really six or seven hours would cover the whole debate thereon, and yet as the weather is oppressive and the subject exhausted I only propose to occupy a few minutes more in calling attention more fully to a decision of the court of commissioners of Alabama claims.

By the act of the Forty-third Congress, (Statutes at Large, page 249,) it is made the duty of the court to examine claims admissible under the act, "to decide upon the amount and validity of such claims in conformity with the provisions thereinafter contained, and according to the principles of law and the merits of the several cases."

In Williams vs. The United States the court say:

The Government of the United States accepted the sum awarded in full settlement of all the claims comprehended in the terms of the treaty, and soon afterward Congress passed the act providing for its distribution among the claimants, which is to be our chief guide in the actual work of distribution. It is clear to us that the Government had the right to prescribe the terms on which claimants, should present their claims. They were not strong enough to compel payment of the money by Great Britain, and when this Government obtained it the claimants had no legal right to it except that which the Government by its own acts chose to accord. They must therefore take their respective shares of it, subject to all the conditions which the Government has thought fit to appoint, or not take them at all.

Raynor, justice, in Hubbell vs. The United States, page 3, says:

Nothing can be found in those proceedings to limit or control good faith on the part of our Government in making such allowance to claimants before us as in their judgment and discretion Congress might think proper. In fact, the very able committee to whom the British board of trade referred the investigation of the points at issue say in their report:

"The proper compensation for the losses occasioned by the cruisers is the question we have to examine, but with the mode of distributing that among the various claimants the American Government alone is concerned."

And the position taken by the board of trade of Great Britain is thus indorsed by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims.

In the recent case of Rhind vs. The United States, in which the point was distinctly before it, the court say:

The award was made in favor of the Government, and not in favor of the claimants. The Government thus vindicated the national honor, but it did not assume to pay any particular class of claimants nor any particular claim. Having obtained the money by its own act and at its own cost, it had the right to prescribe the terms on which the distribution should be made.

The distinguished counsel of the United States, William M. Evarts, Caleb Cushing, and Morrison R. Waite, now Chief Justice, stated—see volume 3, page 16, of the papers relating to the treaty of Washington—

That these claims were all preferred by the United States as a nation against Great Britain as a nation.

I wish to correct the reading of a decision, (West vs. United States, No. 91,) which was partly read before the House by the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. PIERCE,] and previously by the gentleman from Kentucky. I ask attention to this decision, which fully sustains the positions of the majority report.

Before the part quoted by the gentleman referred to, the court laid down in emphatic terms the power of the Congress over the award; and yet said that Congress would not go beyond the conclusions of the award as to the inculpated cruisers.

My friend from Massachusetts [Mr. PIERCE] said, basing his opinion on such decision, that to distribute this fund in any way contrary to the treaty, Great Britain might complain. Great Britain has nothing to do with the distribution of the fund. It was the nation that presented the claim; but had he read the whole decision he would have found that the learned judge, in assuming that Congress ought not, as to our own citizens, to go behind the decision of the tribunal, forgot the terms of the very act creating the court of which he is a distinguished member.

In that act it is distinctly provided in favor of insurers that they may recover all their losses by war risks "during the late rebellion." Therefore, whether the cruiser was decided to be an inculpated or exculpated vessel, whether the loss was on the high seas or by the mosquito fleet flying around the inland waters, no matter how the losses from the war risks were occasioned, they were entitled to recover them. Therefore the act itself in the very regard criticised by the learned judge disproves what he says the Congress would not do. The case, No. 91 which I will proceed to read fully sustains these positions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LORD. I now call for a vote on the bill and amendments.

The first question was upon the amendment reported from the Committee on the Judiciary, to add to section 1 the following:

Such claims to be filed with the clerk of said court within six months from the passage of this act; and said court is hereby continued until July 22, A. D. 1877.

Mr. LORD. I desire to say in regard to this amendment that I supposed it was part of the original bill, it having been unanimously adopted by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next question was upon the following amendment reported from the committee, to insert after the word "attacked," in line 3, section 2, the words "or taken."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next question was upon the amendments offered by Mr. JENKS, as follows:

In section 1, line 9, strike out "three" and insert "two."
In section 2, line 9, strike out all after the word "cruisers."
In section 3 strike out all after "allowed," in line 5.
In section 5 strike out the words "and judgments of the second class shall be paid before judgments of the third class are paid."
In section 5 strike out all after "unappropriated sum," in line 12.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe all the merely formal amendments have been disposed of. As the other questions will probably occupy some time in voting, I rise now to submit a conference report, which I believe is privileged.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The report of a committee of conference is so highly privileged that it may interrupt proceedings at this time.

Mr. LORD. I would inquire how long it would probably take to dispose of the report.

Mr. HOLMAN. About a half an hour.

POST-OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HOLMAN submitted a report; which was read by the Clerk, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. And the President of the United States is hereby authorized to appoint a commission of three skilled and competent persons, who shall examine into the subject of transportation of the mails by railroad companies and report to Congress at the commencement of its next session such rules and regulations for such transportation and rates of compensation therefor as shall in their opinion be just and expedient and enable the Department to fulfill the required and necessary service for the public; and to defray the expense of said commission the sum of $10,000 is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 23, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting "$1,225,000;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments numbered 35 and 36, and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the following:

"That section 11 of the act approved June 23, 1874, be, and is hereby, repealed, and that the following be enacted in lieu thereof:

"SEC. 5. That the postmasters shall be divided into four classes, as follows: The first class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are $3,000, or more than $3,000; the second class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $3,000, but not less than $2,000; the third class shall embrace all those whose annual salaries are less than $2,000, but not less than $1,000; the fourth class shall embrace all postmasters whose annual compensation, exclusive of their commissions on the money-order business of their offices, amounts to less than $1,000.

"SEC. 6. That postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, and shall hold their offices for four years, unless sooner removed or suspended according to law; and postmasters of the fourth class shall be appointed, and may be removed, by the Postmaster-General, by whom all appointments and removals shall be notified to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department.

"SEC. 7. That the respective compensations of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be annual salaries, assigned in even hundreds of dollars, and payable in quarterly payments, to be ascertained and fixed by the Postmaster-General, from their respective quarterly returns to the Auditor for the Post-Office Department, or copies or duplicates thereof, for four quarters immediately preceding the adjustment or re-adjustment, by adding to an amount of the box-rents of the office received or estimated not exceeding $1,350 when the boxes are supplied and owned by the postmaster, and two-thirds of the box-rents, and not to exceed $1,000 when the boxes are not supplied and owned by the postmaster, commissions on all other postal revenues of the office to an amount not exceeding $1,350, at the following rates, namely: on the first $100 per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $300 per quarter, 50 per cent.; on all over $300 and not over $700 per quarter, 40 per cent.; and 30 per cent. on all revenues exceeding $700 per quarter, but the aggregate of the said commissions not to exceed $1,350; and at all offices where the total revenues exceed, respectively, $4,000 per annum, there shall be added to the compensation hereinbefore provided from box-rents and commissions a percentage of the gross revenues at the following rates, namely: 1 per cent. on all sums over $4,000 and not exceeding $10,000; 9-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $10,000 and not exceeding $20,000; 8-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $320,000 and not exceeding $640,000; 6-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $640,000 and not exceeding $80,000; 5-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $80,000 and not exceeding $160,000; 4-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $160,000 and not exceeding $320,000; 3-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $320,000 and not exceeding $640,000; 2-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums over $640,000 and not exceeding $1,280,000; and in order to ascertain the amount of the postal receipts of each office, the Postmaster-General may require postmasters to furnish duplicates of their quarterly returns to the Auditor at such times and for such periods as he may deem necessary in each case: Provided, That at offices where the letter-carrier system is now, or may hereafter be, established, the box-rents, in fixing the compensation of the respective postmasters at such offices, shall be estimated at not less than $1,000 per annum; but at all such offices where the compensation is now $4,000 they shall be estimated at an amount which, with the commissions and percentages hereby allowed, will make the salaries of the postmasters thereat not less than $3,000.

"SEC. 8. That the compensation of postmasters of the fourth class shall be the box-rents collected at their offices, and commissions on other postal revenues of their offices at the following rate, namely: On the first $100 or less per quarter, 60 per cent.; on all over $100 and not over $300 per quarter, 50 per cent.; and all over $300 per quarter, 40 per cent.; the same to be ascertained and allowed by the Auditor in the settlement of the quarterly accounts of such postmasters: Provided, That when the aggregate annual compensation, exclusive of commissions on money-order business, of any postmaster of this class shall amount to $1,000, the Auditor shall report such fact to the Postmaster-General in order that such postmaster may be assigned to his proper class and his salary fixed as heretofore provided.

"SEC. 9. That the salaries of postmasters of the first, second, and third classes shall be re-adjusted by the Postmaster-General once in two years, and in special cases, on the application of the postmaster, as much oftener as the Postmaster-General may deem expedient.

"SEC. 10. That the Postmaster-General shall make all orders assigning or changing the salaries of postmasters in writing, and record them in his journal, and notify the change to the Auditor; and any change made in such salaries shall not take effect until the first day of the quarter next following such order: Provided, That in cases of not less than 50 per cent increase or decrease in the business of any post-office, the Postmaster-General may adjust the salary of the postmaster at such office to take effect from the first day of the quarter or period the returns for which form the basis of re-adjustment.

"SEC. 11. That the Postmaster-General may designate offices at the intersection of mail-routes as distributing or separating offices; and where any such office is of the third or fourth class, he may make a reasonable allowance to the postmaster for the necessary cost of clerical services arising from such duties, and the provisions of this act relating to and fixing the compensation or salaries of postmasters shall take effect on the 1st day of October next.

"SEC. 12. No salary of any postmaster under this act shall exceed the sum of $4,000 per annum except in the city of New York, which salary shall remain as now fixed by law; and no salary of any postmaster where the appointment is now presidential shall be reduced by the compensation herein established until the next re-adjustment, below the sum of $1,000 per annum."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment numbered 46 and agree to the same with an amendment substituting the following:

"SEC. 14. That transient newspapers and magazines, regular publications designed primarily for advertising purposes or for free circulation, or for circulation at nominal rates, and all printed matter of the third class, except unsealed circulars, shall be admitted to, and be transmitted in, the mails at the rate of one cent for every two ounces, or fractional part thereof, and one cent for each two additional ounces, or fractional part thereof, and the sender of any article of the third class of mail matter may write his or her name or address therein, or on the outside thereof, with the word 'from' above or preceding the same; or may write briefly or print on any package the number and names of the articles inclosed. Publishers of newspapers and periodicals may print on the wrappers of newspapers or magazines sent from the office of publication to regular subscribers the time to which subscription therefor has been paid; and addresses upon postal cards and unsealed circulars may be either written, printed, or affixed thereto at the option of the sender."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the numerical correction of sections be made to correspond with the changes in the bill herein made.

Managers on the part of the House.

J. R. WEST,
H. HAMLIN,
S. B. MAXEY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The question was upon agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will state the substance of this conference report.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will try to do so very briefly. This conference report was agreed upon last Monday; but by reason of the temporary absence on account of sickness of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CLARK,] a member of the committee of conference, the report was not signed by him in the first instance, although he was present during the conference and participated in the deliberations of the conferees until a conclusion was reached. Since then the gentleman from Missouri has signed the report. I make this explanation in order to show why that gentleman's name does not appear in the report as published by order of the Senate in the RECORD of yesterday. The gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] was present, as I have said, during the time and at the conclusion of the conference, and agreed to the report, which he has now signed.

There are a number of amendments of the Senate from the disagreement to which the House has receded, which are merely formal. The number of amendments in actual controversy between the two Houses is comparatively small, some of them involving principles beyond the mere matter of appropriation, and others merely involving appropriations only. The questions between the two Houses as to appropriations involved a difference of $3,057,741, being the additional appropriations made by the Senate in its amendments. There were mutual concessions made as to most of these matters of appropriation. The Senate made concessions to the amount of $2,230,249; the House to the amount of $826,592. These mutual concessions were upon matters of difference between the two Houses of these classes: the publication of route maps; salaries of postmasters, postal railway clerks; compensation of letter-carriers; rent, light, and fuel of post-offices; advertising; miscellaneous, and many other items of a similar character, on which mutual concessions were made. In these mutual concessions the House conferees found it necessary in reaching a conclusion to yield to the striking out of several provisions in regard to special agents and the like which they were anxious to retain.

The three leading questions upon which the two Houses and their respective conferees differed were as to the compensation to be paid to postmasters, the rate of compensation to railroad companies for the transportation of mails, and as to the postage on third-class mail matter. These were the leading points of difference which resulted in the disagreement of the first conference and which in the main challenged the attention of the conferees upon the second conference.

The present law fixes the salaries and compensation of postmasters by a certain percentage on the gross revenues of the Office up to $2,000 and the rents of post-office boxes up to $2,000 more, making the maximum salary under existing law $4,000 per annum except in the case of the postmaster at New York City, whose salary was fixed last session at $8,000. The bill as it passed the House fixed the maximum sum to be received by way of commissions at $1,200, and box rents up to $1,200 more, and allowed commissions ranging from 1 per cent. down to $\frac{1}{10}$ of 1 per cent. on the gross revenues of each office exceeding $4,000; making the maximum salary of postmasters $4,000, except that of the postmaster of New York City.

The agreement of the conference committee fixes the maximum commissions at $1,350, the Senate insisting upon $1,500 as suggested by the Postmaster-General, and the House on $1,200. The difference between those two amounts was settled upon as the maximum of the commissions except as to the excess of revenue over $4,000, so that by the bill, if amended as proposed by the conferees, the compensation of postmasters would be determined first by commissions at given rates upon the revenue of each office at 60, 50, 40, and 30 per cent. on specific sums up to $1,350, and box rents up to $1,350, except where the boxes are furnished by the Government, and then up to $1,000 only. But the maximum is still fixed at $4,000; the smaller commissions of 1 per cent. down to 1-10 of 1 per cent. on sums exceeding $4,000 being the additions to the maximums which I have mentioned, being 1 per cent. on all sums over $4,000 and not exceeding $10,000 down to 1-10 of 1 per cent. on all sums exceeding $1,280,000.

Under this scale of salaries the postmasters of Boston, Philadelphia, and a few other of the great cities would receive $4,000, but the greater number of the four-thousand-dollar salaries would be greatly reduced, these larger postal salaries being now greatly above the average salaries paid by the Government, and greatly above the salaries paid by the several States in positions of equally important official trust.

As to the transportation of the mails, inland transportation, the House appropriated for star routes and steamboat routes the sum of $6,737,851. That sum has not been disturbed, and something over $8,800,000 to the railroads, dividing the appropriation for the first time in the interest of the smaller service. But the two Houses and their conferees differed as to the amount to be paid to the railroad companies for transporting the mails. The Senate proposed to pay a sum in gross as heretofore; and proposed by its amendment to the House bill the aggregate amount $17,500,000 for inland mail transportation. But finally it was agreed that the amount to be appropriated for star routes and steamboat lines should remain as fixed by the House, a separate and distinct appropriation. Indeed, this sum having been fixed by the House and as a separate item concurred in by the Senate conferees, it did not seem to be open to further adjustment, although all gentlemen who have examined the subject must see that in its anxiety to promote the interest of the star routes as against the railroads the sum fixed by the House was too high. It is larger than the public service will require; but that was a subject not properly under the control of the conference committee. It was fixed by the House on the one hand and agreed to by the conferees on the part of the Senate. It is for that particular branch of the postal service an increase of appropriation of about $600,000 over the expenditures of last fiscal year.

The estimate of the Department for railroad transportation of the mails was $10,500,000. The Senate conferees ultimately proposed to fix the sum at $10,000,000. The House proposed that instead of the provisions which the Senate had struck out from the House bill regulating the cost of transportation of the mails by rail by the amount of postal-car space furnished, and rate of speed, which was a very radical change in the mode of compensation and seemed to require more careful inquiry, there should be a reduction of 10 per cent. on the amount allowed to the railroad companies for transportation of mails as adjusted by weight under the act of March 3, 1873. Whether the reduction of 10 per cent. from the compensation to the railroads should be made or not was a very serious question of difference between the two bodies. The Senate ultimately acceded to the views of the House; and that provision is incorporated in this report, reducing the rates of compensation of railroad corporations 10 per cent. upon the rates now fixed by law.

On the 3d of March, 1873, when the present rates of compensation were fixed, the country was in a comparatively prosperous condition. Now financial embarrassments depress every branch of industry, labor unemployed, men asking for work to save their families from actual suffering, yet asking in vain. All values connected with our industries have shrunk enormously since the present rates were fixed. In the mail relettingon star steamboat mail-routes, since that act of March 3, 1873, was passed, the contracts have been at heavily reduced rates, greatly exceeding 10 per cent. reduction. Every property interest in the country has shrunk to a greater extent than 10 per cent. since March, 1873. The railroad companies pay now to their hands for their labor at least 30 per cent. less than then, and for their iron and all materials connected with their roads 30 or 40 per cent. less than they did when these rates were fixed. The volume of money has been heavily reduced; the shrinkage of all values except of invested capital has far exceeded 10 per cent.; and the conferees on the part of the House thought that a 10 per cent. reduction upon the rates of compensation fixed by the act of 1873 was a moderate reduction, a very moderate reduction, especially when it is borne in mind that the rates fixed by the act of March 3, 1873, were too high even for that period. They were in fact extortionate. Congress yielded to the demand of these great corporations simply because they demanded more. The Government should pay them fair and reasonable rates and nothing more, and after this 10 per cent. reduction in my judgment the Government will be paying exorbitant rates. The Senate conferees agreed to this reduction. The reduction thus incorporated in this report amounts to a very considerable sum. It makes a difference of $1,662,149 upon the amount of the estimate for transportation of the mails for the present fiscal year.

The Senate struck out the provision adopted by the House that land-grant railroad companies should receive 20 per cent. less than the rates fixed by law. By the agreement of the conferees that provision has been restored; so that while the other railroad companies of the country will receive 10 per cent. less than their former rates, the land-grant companies will receive 30 per cent. less than the former rates. Yet it is believed that the railroad companies in this particular branch of the public service will receive a better compensation under this reduced rate than perhaps any other interest connected with the public service, and greatly more than the contractors on the other mail-routes with due regard to the service rendered; that the reduction is slight in comparison with the general reduction of prices throughout the country. And it is believed that by the appointment of this commission, to which the House conferees have acceded, as proposed by the Senate—a commission of three persons to be appointed by the President of the United States to report upon this subject to Congress at the next session—a much heavier reduction will be found justifiable.

I call the attention of the House especially to another fact in this connection. The bill as it passed the House provided in regard to transportation that the maximum rate to be paid to any one company should not exceed $500 per mile per annum. That limitation was put upon the bill on the motion of the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.] The conferees were not able to agree upon a limitation. If $500 could have been agreed upon as the limitation, it would perhaps have been reasonable enough; but to put it higher, as would have been inevitable if an agreement was reached, was to expose the Post-Office Department to the pressure these great corporations are able to wield to reach that maximum. It would have fixed an object to aim at, a maximum to be reached, which would have provoked a constant struggle. Hence it was the judgment of the conferees on the part of the House that inasmuch as no lower rate than $700 per mile per annum could be attained it was better that the limitation should be entirely omitted, leaving the subject under the control of the Postmaster-General subject to the general limitations imposed.

The bill appropriates in the aggregate, if this report is adopted, for the transportation of the mails $15,837,851. That embraces the star routes and the steamboat lines at $6,737,851, and the railroad routes at $9,100,000, against the estimates of the Department of a little more than $17,500,000, and $17,500,000 as proposed by the Senate amendments—a reduction upon the item of transportation of the mails of $1,662,149.

On the subject of the rates of postage on third-class matter, the House desired to restore the rates that existed prior to the last act by which the rate on that class of mail matter was very greatly increased. The former rate, as will be remembered, on merchandise, up to the rate of four pounds, on transient newspapers and periodicals, books, &c., was one-half a cent per ounce, one cent for every two ounces or fraction thereof. By the amendment made in the last Congress this rate was doubled. The House proposed to restore the old rate, and the Senate preferred to retain in the main the present rate. Out of this difference of opinion grew the compromise which is now submitted, under which all printed matter of the third class, except circulars unsealed, is restored to the old rate. In other words, all transient newspapers, magazines, books, all printed matter, with the exception of circulars unsealed, will be restored to the former rate of one cent for every two ounces, while merchandise and unsealed circulars will remain at the present rate. This was not what the House wished, but it was found to be the only practicable solution of the difference between the two Houses.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to ask how a newspaper advertising a business would be classed? For instance, in the city of Springfield, Ohio, in my district, the establishments which manufacture agricultural implements publish a newspaper to advertise their products. Such publications are not newspapers in the ordinary sense, but they are newspapers for that purpose. How will they be classed?

Mr. HOLMAN. They will be classed as third-class matter, and are covered by this provision:

> Regular publications designed for advertising purposes or for free circulation or for circulation at nominal rates.

That covers the class of matter referred to by the gentleman from Ohio. Such publications will be classed as third-class printed matter, and will pay a postage of one cent for each two ounces.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The old rate.

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; the old rate.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Does this report adopt the rate established last year for seeds, cuttings, &c.?

Mr. HOLMAN. That was not involved in this proposition, I believe. Is there not a separate provision on that subject? It has not been the subject of discussion in the conference committee. If seeds, cuttings, and bulbs were third-class matter and subject to the rates of third-class matter under the law of last session, they will still be subject to the same rates. The House conferees have found it necessary to concede that point upon this principle urged, that the postal facilities furnished by this Government are designed for the diffusion of intelligence; whatever may be properly classed as merchandise, unless it be connected directly with the diffusion of intelligence, such as books, ought not, as was thought by the Senate, to be permitted to go through the mails at a losing rate to the Government. Therefore all that the House conferees have been able to accomplish is to provide that all printed matter, except unsealed circulars intended to promote some special business, should be restored to the old rates, while all merchandise has been left subject to the rate now fixed by law.

One word further. The steady and excessive growth in the expenditure of this Department justified a special effort to effect some retrenchment.

While a Department so intimately connected with the social, domestic, and business life of the country should not lack for means to keep it in full vigor and to enlarge its efficiency, yet it is subject to the same frailties that result in excessive and unjustifiable expenditure in other departments of Government. The expenditure of vast sums of money extinguishes the sentiment of frugality, and the people may well expect Congress to secure on the one hand vigor and efficiency in this important Department and severe economy on the other, and will indulge the hope that such result will be secured under the Department as now organized, with proper limitations prescribed by law. To show the growth of expenditure in this Department, in comparison with its revenue, I present the following statement:

Statement of revenues and expenditures of the Post-Office Department for the years 1873, 1874, and 1875, and expenditures for the years 1873, 1874, and 1875, and appropriations for 1876 and 1877.

RECEIPTS.

Revenues for 1873	$22,996,741 57
Revenues for 1874	26,477,071 82
Revenues for 1875	26,791,360 59

EXPENDITURES.

Expenditures for 1873	29,065,710 52
Expenditures for 1874	32,126,414 58
Expenditures for 1875	33,611,309 45
Appropriations for the year 1876	37,524,361 00
Estimates for the year 1877	37,939,805 99
Appropriations made by the pending bill for the year 1877	34,575,701 00

From this statement it appears that while the increase of revenues in 1875 over 1874 was but $314,288.77, the expenditures of 1875 over 1874 were $1,484,894.87.

The appropriations made by the pending bill are less than the appropriations of the year that expired on the 30th day of last month by the sum of $2,948,660, and $3,364,104.99 less than the estimates of the Post-Office Department.

I submit the following statement of deficiencies in this Department:

The appropriations for deficiencies for the year 1876, just expired	$8,338,705 00
Estimated deficiency for the year 1877	9,281,602 19
Deficiencies for 1877 appropriated by this bill	5,667,498 00

So that the sum appropriated by the pending bill for deficiencies for 1877 are $2,671,217 less than the appropriations for deficiencies of 1876 and $3,614,114.19 less than the estimates. And yet this reduction is much less than the country might reasonably expect to be made. Here, as everywhere else, while the country demands efficiency it also demands economy.

While it must be admitted that as to the reduction of the expenditures in this branch of the service the results of this conference do not reach what I think the country had the right to expect, while it will be apparent from a carefnl study of our postal system that a further reduction of nearly $2,000,000 could have been effected and yet have left the system as extensive and efficient as it is now, yet I believe I but express the judgment of the conference committee on the part of the House when I say that the conclusions reached are such as the House perhaps under the circumstances should accept. The concessions made as to the amounts are not unreasonable, I think, on either side. The concessions made as to the principles involved in the compensation of postmasters and of railroad companies are less than the House believed should be made and less than the public service would seem to require, for severe economy alone can secure efficiency and vigor in a Department, but it may reasonably be hoped that the facts furnished by a commission such as the conference report provides for will afford data upon which a very large decrease can be made at the next session of Congress.

As to the salaries of postmasters, they are very materially reduced. I suppose the aggregate reduction is about $600,000. Still, I think there is no class of public officers better paid than the postmasters, especially of the first and second classes, even with the proposed reduction.

The report provides that where the salary of a postmaster of a free-delivery office is now $4,000 it shall not be reduced below $3,000. This is a concession which the House committee thought it necessary and proper to make. Even this is a reduction of 25 per cent. This restriction only applies, however, until a re-adjustment of salaries shall take place. For myself I do not hesitate to say that a much greater reduction of these salaries might be made without injury to the public service and to its material benefit. These salaries will still greatly exceed salaries in similar employments in private business. Where the salary exceeds $1,800 it ought to be materially reduced, in justice to the oppressed industries which must bear the burden.

Mr. WHITE. I would like to ask the gentleman upon what principle of justice it is that postmasters performing onerous duties receive only from $20 to $25 up to $300 a year? On what principle do the committee agree to pay such small salaries for such services?

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. This bill does not affect these smaller salaries at all. Salaries under $1,000 are rather benefited than injuriously affected by the provisions of the bill, or they are but slightly affected if at all. Those officers whose salaries reach $1,800 are most materially affected by the reduction. In such cases the reduction is quite material.

Mr. WHITE. As I understand the committee has not interfered at all with these smaller salaries; but it strikes me they ought to have interfered; they ought to have seen that those men ought to be better paid.

Mr. HOLMAN. Does the gentleman mean to say that we should have raised their salaries?

Mr. WHITE. Yes, sir; their salaries should have been raised.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, we have not raised any salaries.

Mr. WHITE. There is another question I want to ask the gentleman. I understand him to say that $600,000 has been added to the star service over what was expended last year. Does not the gentleman think that the growth and progress of the country demand even a larger increase, and does he begrudge that amount?

Mr. HOLMAN. I think that while this star service ought to be moderately increased, it will not and cannot be increased in the interest of fair and reasonable economy so as to require the expenditure of any considerable portion of that $600,000. On the contrary, I think I am safe in saying that when this fiscal year shall have concluded, however liberal the Post-Office Department may be in the establishment of new routes, a very considerable portion of the sum appropriated for star routes and steamboat service will be unexpended. Of this I feel confident, if there is any reasonable degree of economy in the management of the Post-Office Department, and I have every reason to believe there will be——

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Do I understand the gentleman to say that the postage upon seeds, scions, bulbs, &c., remains as it has been under the Hamlin amendment?

Mr. HOLMAN. Yes, sir; if they are merchandise the postage upon them remains just the same as under the present law. The House preferred the restoration of the former rate.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Did not both Houses agree this session to restore the rates upon those articles to what they had been?

Mr. HOLMAN. Both Houses did not.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. I thought the Senate agreed to that.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House did. That is one point in controversy between the two Houses.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Did not the Senate agree to that?

Mr. HOLMAN. No, sir. The Senate adhered to the law as it stands; the House demanded the repeal of that law and the restoration of the old rates. The difference has been arranged in this way: All printed matter except circulars unsealed are to go at the old rates; and all other third-class matter continues at the rates established by the act of March 3, 1875.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana whether there has been any change in regard to free transportation of newspapers in the counties where they are published?

Mr. HOLMAN. That matter is not affected by the provision touching third-class matter.

Mr. CONGER. Then there is no change in the law in that respect?

Mr. HOLMAN. There is no change in the law at all except as respects third-class matter. My friend will remember that newspapers circulated in their respective counties were not affected at all by this provision in regard to third-class matter.

Mr. CONGER. Then they are still left free in the counties of their publication?

Mr. HOLMAN. They are, so far as this provision is concerned. The provision in regard to third-class matter did not embrace the circulation of newspapers in the several counties.

Mr. CONGER. The inquiry I wish distinctly answered is whether that law authorizing the free transportation of newspapers within the county in which they are published has been changed.

Mr. HOLMAN. That subject has not been up at all; it has never been before the House or the Senate in connection with this bill. The question has been as to the rates to be paid for transportation of third-class matter.

Mr. CONGER. I am not sure that I understand the gentleman.

Mr. HOLMAN. Nothing pertaining to postal rates was before the conference committee except the rates of third-class matter.

Mr. CONGER. Well, may I inquire whether in the bill there is any change as to these newspapers?

Mr. HOLMAN. There was nothing in the bill upon that subject and nothing in the Senate amendments; so of course there could be nothing in the conference report.

Mr. CONGER. The gentleman did not answer very directly, which is a little unusual with him.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very generally direct in my answers; certainly I always intend to be.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by saying simply that though, as I mentioned, this bill does not accomplish so much in the line of retrenchment as was hoped for by the House, yet it does accomplish, as we sincerely hope, the important result of checking the enormous and ever-growing deficiencies in the Post-Office Department. The check which we have sought to put upon these sources of heavy expenditure will, it is believed, demonstrate in the course of another session that very large reductions may still be made on the basis of the appropriations for the present year.

So, sir, the first bill that will be passed by Congress in the new century (for I trust and have every reason to hope this bill will pass the House of Representatives and receive the approval of the President of the United States) will be a bill in which there has been at least an earnest and sincere effort to retrench the expenditures of a great Department of Government and to that extent restore frugality and purity to the administration of its affairs. It is believed that in both these directions, in securing retrenchment in the expenditures of Government so far as this Department is concerned and in restoring purity in its administration, the one the natural sequence of the other, important results have been accomplished; for what can be unimportant that contributes in any degree to the integrity and purity of government?

I call the previous question.

Mr. CONGER. I desire to ask the gentleman two questions, if he will permit me. First, I wish to know whether in deciding that all printed matter shall be called third-class matter, newspapers circulating within the counties of their publication are not included, and whether by the terms of this report the law which gives them free circulation within their respective counties is not virtually repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. My friend must see that this refers only to the third-class matter as defined by law. The law defines first-class matter, second-class matter, and third-class matter. Now this simply affects third-class matter as defined by established law; nothing more, nothing less.

Mr. CONGER. If it should prove that this class of newspapers are by this legislation made to pay postage, I shall hold the gentleman responsible for misleading this House.

Mr. HOLMAN. And I should hold everybody to an accountability for that. I agree with my friend that if such a thing should occur it would be a very great mistake, for there has been no such intention.

Mr. CONGER. The next question I wish to ask the gentleman is whether he desires it to appear in the first bill of the "new century" that the retrenchment of which he boasts so much will restrict the postal facilities of the American people?

Mr. HOLMAN. Not to the tithe of a hair. On the contrary I do not hesitate to say that were these appropriations reduced nearly $3,000,000 the service would be as efficient and extensive as it is now, and I trust the Postmaster-General will himself demonstrate the fact.

I yield to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. STONE] for five minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the gentleman from Missouri commences I would like to put a question to the gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] in a moment.

Mr. FOSTER. My question will take but a moment.

Mr. STONE. Mr. Speaker, I have listened very attentively, as I always do, to the very interesting statement of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. HOLMAN,] and more especially to that part of it which relates to the amount that the Senate committee and the House committee receded from their amendments, aggregating, as he states, $826,592. That looks elegant on paper; but if gentlemen in this House will take up the bill as passed by the House and sent to the Senate, and then take up the conference report which the gentleman from Indiana asks the House to adopt, they will find that these figures are not correct. I undertake to say, without fear of successful contradiction, that the amount of appropriation made by this House in the bill as sent to the Senate was $33,739,109, and that it comes back from this conference committee aggregating $34,585,701; that the deficiency provided for in the bill passed by the House and sent to the Senate amounted to $4,230,906; that it comes back signed by this conference committee aggregating $5,667,498; and that the increase over the bill passed by this House amounts to $2,283,184, and not $826,592, as stated by the gentleman from Indiana.

I do not think, Mr. Speaker, that this conference report has carried out the resolution of a very respectable convention of the people that assembled lately in the city on the west bank of the Mississippi River, which I in part have the honor to represent. I send up to be read by the Clerk as part of my remarks one of the resolutions adopted by that convention.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this convention, representing the democratic party of the States, do cordially indorse the action of the present House of Representatives [applause] in reducing and curtailing the expenses of the Federal Government; in cutting down onerous salaries, extravagant appropriations, and in abolishing useless offices and places not required by the public necessities, and we shall trust to the firmness of the democratic members of the House that no committee of conference and no misinterpretation of rules will be allowed to defeat these wholesome measures of economy demanded by the country.

Mr. HOLMAN. A single word in reply to the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. STONE.] I do not think that I understood that gentleman. I stated that this bill, as amended by the Senate and as agreed to by the conference committee, appropriated $34,575,701. Do I understand the gentleman to say that that is not correct?

Mr. STONE. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMAN. That, then, is correct. I said also that the deficiency appropriated by this bill was $5,667,498.

Mr. STONE. That is correct.

Mr. HOLMAN. That, too, is correct; and that is all there is about it. The other figures are all well understood.

Mr. STONE. But the gentleman failed to state to the House that the amount of increase upon the bill, as passed by the House and sent to the Senate, was $2,283,184, and not $826,592, as will be found when the items of the bill as it passed the House and the items named in the conference committee's report are taken into consideration.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I do not understand the gentleman, for when he admits my two main propositions there is an end of the matter. He has sufficient knowledge of figures to see that when he admits my two main propositions the result is inevitable.

Mr. STONE. I would like to propound a question.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman will excuse me. I have stated that the matters in controversy between the two Houses amounted in the aggregate to $3,057,241; that of this sum the House conceded, and I think properly, $826,592, and the Senate conceded $2,236,649, making in the aggregate $3,057,241. I have stated also that the increase of the bill over the appropriations as it passed the House and went to the Senate is $826,592.

When the gentleman called my attention to the fact that the deficiency was increased, I supposed that a word of explanation would be sufficient. That explanation was based upon the fact, of which I presumed the House was aware, that the Committee on Appropriations estimated upon facts furnished by the Post-Office Department the revenues would exceed by $600,000 the estimates of last November. This simply reduced the deficiency that much. The estimates for the present fiscal year were made up last November, and amounted to something over $26,000,000. But the Post-Office Department furnished us with a statement of the increase of the revenues of the Office during a part of the last fiscal year, as compared with the preceding fiscal year; and upon this statement we estimated that the revenues would be $600,000 more than the estimate originally furnished by the Post-Office Department. But the Senate conferees declined to take that into account; so that the increased estimates had to be abandoned; and deducting simply the estimates of the Post-Office Department makes the deficiency larger than the House made it, to the extent that the amount of the estimates of the Department had been increased. That was all there was about it.

Mr. STONE. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's hour has expired and he has demanded the previous question.

Several members called for the regular order.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will not the gentleman from Indiana yield to me for a few moments?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have it not in my power.

The previous question was seconded, there being ayes 127, noes not counted.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I want to know whether the Speaker did not put the vote upon the previous question when the gentleman from Indiana had not called it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Indiana had called it.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Not at all. I believe the gentleman disclaims having called it.

Mr. HOLMAN. My hour had expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman called the previous question fifteen or twenty minutes ago. The Chair will inform the gentleman from Illinois that otherwise he certainly would not have submitted the question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Then the gentleman, after talking over his hour by unanimous consent, cuts off everybody else.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is not the fault of the Chair. This is no parliamentary question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I think the gentleman ought to have let this side of the House have at least ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should have been very glad to do so if within my power.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order.

The main question was ordered; and under the operation thereof the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. HOLMAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. I now call for a vote upon the Geneva award bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is upon the adoption of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] for the bill as reported by the majority of the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Let the substitute which is first to be voted on be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The substitute of the gentleman from Ohio will be read. The Chair will explain that the amendments to the original bill having been adopted, the question recurs upon the amendments offered in the nature of substitutes for the original bill. The first of these is a substitute of the gentleman from Kentucky, to which the gentleman from Ohio has offered an amendment in the nature of a substitute, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

That all bonds of the United States in which the money awarded to the United States by the tribunal of arbitration at Geneva has been invested, after paying all charges thereon and judgments as determined by the court of commissioners of Alabama claims under existing law, shall be canceled by the Secretary of State and the Secretary of the Treasury; and all money, if any, arising from said award or from bonds in which it has been invested shall be covered into the Treasury.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute, there were—ayes 47, noes 87.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. BLACKBURN called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being—ayes 47, noes 91.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the Chair state the proposition?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now before the House is on substituting the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for that of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT,] both propositions being offered in the form of substitutes. If the substitute of the gentleman from Ohio be adopted, the question will then be whether the House will substitute that for the bill reported by the committee. If this substitute be rejected, then the question will be whether the proposition of the gentleman from Kentucky shall be substituted for the bill of the committee.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 59, nays 110, not voting 120; as follows:

So the substitute was not agreed to.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. BOONE. My colleague from Kentucky, Mr. BROWN, is absent by leave of the House.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I desire to state that I am paired with the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE; who if present would vote "no," while I would vote "ay."

Mr. STRAIT. I desire to state that Mr. DE BOLT, of Missouri, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. HENDEE. My colleague, Mr. DENISON, is absent on account of sickness.

Mr. VAN VORHES. My colleague from Ohio, Mr. VANCE, is absent by leave of the House.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is next on the amendment in the nature of a substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. KNOTT.]

Mr. LANE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken on the motion to adjourn, there were ayes 102, noes not counted.

So the motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Pending the announcement of the vote,

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 702) for changing the name of the steam-propeller Senator Mike Norton to America;

An act (H. R. No. 2676) for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3839) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase supplies for the Indian Bureau in open market;

An act (S. No. 435) to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes of the United States providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MORGAN for three days;

To Mr. MCCRARY till the end of the session;

To Mr. FULLER indefinitely; and

To Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, an extension of six days.

The result of the vote on the motion to adjourn was then announced; and accordingly (at five o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITION.

The following petition was presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. PACKER: The petition of 292 citizens of Shamokin and Coal Townships, Northumberland, County, Pennsylvania, for the repeal of the resumption act; that no tax be laid on tea and coffee, and for the substitution of legal-tender for national-bank notes, to the Committee of Ways and Means.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, July 6, 1876.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 1909) for the relief of John W. Chickering; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2524) for the relief of certain soldiers of the Eighth Cavalry, Missouri State Militia.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of Mrs. Clarissa A. Chamberlin, of Worcester County, Massachusetts, praying for the extension of letters-patent for an improvement in shovels, granted to her former husband, Hiram Kimball, on the 6th of January, 1852; which was referred to the Committee on Patents.

Mr. BOOTH presented a memorial of clergymen of the several religious denominations of the city of San Francisco, California, remonstrating against the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3187) to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented a petition of citizens of California, praying for the immediate passage of a law making the nation's currency, commonly known as greenbacks, a legal tender for duties on imports; which was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CONKLING presented the memorial of the commissioners of immigration of the State of New York, calling the attention of Congress to the condition of the immigration laws resulting from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring the State laws on that subject unconstitutional and void, and in favor of speedy legislation in regard thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred a very large number of memorials and petitions praying for a repeal of the law by which stamped envelopes, newspaper-wrappers, and postal cards are manufactured by the Government, have directed me to report them back and ask to be discharged from their further consideration. There was a provision incorporated in the post-office appropriation bill for the purpose of meeting what the committee thought proper in this case, to wit, to add to the price of these envelopes the actual cost to the Government in transmitting them to the various points where they are sold. I therefore move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. The same committee, to whom were referred a very large number of petitions, praying for the repeal of the law establishing rates of postage upon what is called third-class matter, have also directed me to report the same back and move to be discharged from their further consideration for the same reason that provision is made in the same bill for this matter.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. The same committee, who were directed by a resolution of the Senate of December 8, 1875, introduced by my colleague, [Mr. MORRILL,] to inquire into and ascertain the best mode of making the Post-Office Department self-sustaining, have considered that resolution and have done something in that direction, not near so much, however, as they would have been very glad to do and as I think they would have done if they had had more of the support of the Senate. I therefore move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. There were also referred to the same committee sundry memorials, remonstrating against any change in the law in relation to the free-delivery system. There has been no change of the law, and I move that the committee be discharged from their further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I am also directed by the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 789) for the relief of R. P. Sorrels, to report it back, and to state that on conferring with the Post-Office Department there has been no evidence furnished from that Department or from any other source to show that the service was performed. I therefore move that the committee be discharged from its further consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. I also report back, from the same committee, the memorial of citizens of Minnesota, remonstrating against the passage of a bill authorizing the Green Bay and Minnesota Railroad Company to construct a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River at Winona. There have been no papers before the committee asking for such a bridge. I am inclined to think, however, that a bill has been reported by some other committee. I move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. The case of William H. Stephens, postmaster at Bellville, New Jersey, in relation to stamps stolen from his office, came before the committee in the shape of affidavits. On conferring with the Postmaster-General it was found that there was no evidence in the Department nor has any been furnished to the committee showing that the applicant comes within the rules which have been uniformly agreed upon by the committee. I therefore move that the committee be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN. The same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 310) in relation to postal routes, have instructed me to report it back. Your committee regard this bill as one involving legal and constitutional questions, and one which more appropriately belongs to the Committee on the Judiciary, and as no facts have been submitted to the committee they ask to be discharged from its further consideration. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAMLIN, from the Committee on Post-Offices and Post-Roads, to whom was referred a letter from the Postmaster-General addressed to the chairman of the committee regarding the general subjects of classification and expenses connected with the transportation of mail-matter, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 311) conferring certain privileges upon telegraph companies, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Legislature of California, in favor of such legislation as will procure for the people of that State cheaper rates for the transmission of telegraphic messages, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. BOOTH, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 792) granting a pension to Peter Harder, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. HAMILTON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1089) granting a pension to James I. Fox, late a private of Company C, Fifty-second Regiment Pennsylvania Volunteers, reported it without amendment.

Mr. INGALLS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 210) granting a pension to Austin R. Mills, reported it with amendments, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. CONKLING asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 977) to regulate immigration; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SPENCER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (H. R. No. 3922) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes; which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

HATTIE D. M'KAIN.

Mr McDONALD. I move to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 1347) granting a pension to Hattie D. McKain was indefinitely postponed in order to procure its recommitment to the Committee on Pensions. Some additional proof has been submitted to the committee.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be recommitted to the Committee on Pensions, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

IMMIGRATION OF CHINESE.

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to call up a resolution which was submitted to the Senate and laid on the table April 20, with reference to Chinese immigration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution submitted by Mr. SARGENT on the 20th of April:

Resolved, That the Senate recommend to the President that he cause negotiations to be entered upon with the Chinese government to effect such change in the existing treaty between the United States and China as will lawfully permit the application of restrictions upon the great influx of Chinese subjects to this country.

Mr. SARGENT. I desire to modify the resolution so as to read as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate negotiations should be entered upon with the governments of China and Great Britain to effect such changes in existing treaties as will tend to check the great influx of Chinese coolies and criminals to this country.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the resolution of the Senator from California as modified by his substitute.

Mr. SARGENT. I debated this matter at very great length on a former occasion, and I do not wish to take up the time of the Senate to further discuss it, or to repeat what I then said. I will remark, however, that this is a terrible evil upon all the Pacific coast and in the Territories, and the least we can do is to ascertain through the executive department whether the other governments interested will cooperate with us in enabling us to keep from our shores an influx of criminals and desperate characters who are destroying the civilization of one of the fairest portions of the Republic.

I trust there will be no objection to the passage of this resolution, and I ask that there may be a vote upon it.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. May I ask the Senator from California for information whether his resolution contemplates the exclusion of ordinary citizens from China? I see it is confined to "coolies and criminals."

Mr. SARGENT. I have a bill pending before the Committee on Foreign Relations which will bring that matter more particularly before the Senate. The difficulties in connection with Chinese immigration are broad and far-reaching. America, I believe, is the only country which has taken no steps to protect itself against these evils. From the Philippine Islands to British Columbia the countries bordering upon the Pacific, except the United States, have taken steps in order to prevent the influx of Chinese without regard to their criminal character. As I stated in my remarks the other day, nine-tenths of the Chinese immigrants, as proved by the testimony of reliable persons taken under oath, are coolies, and a considerable proportion of the rest are women introduced under a system of slavery for immoral purposes. The laws upon the statute-books are as wise and strong as any that can probably be framed. I have reviewed those statutes myself with an anxious desire to see if there was some loophole which might be filled up, some additional precautions which might be taken, to prevent the influx of this class; but I find that there is a defect of evidence in such cases; and it may be in order to cure this difficulty that we will have to go even further than is contemplated by the present resolution. I do not raise that question at the present time, and I trust the Senate will not, but provide negotiations to be entered into to see if any practical plan can be arrived at by a concurrence of these three governments.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Then I do not understand that this resolution contemplates the exclusion of the ordinary Chinese citizens.

Mr. SARGENT. There is no such thing as a Chinese citizen. At home he is a subject; in America he does not seek to become a citizen; and the resolution plainly states upon its face that the purpose is to devise some means by which the influx of criminals and persons imported for immoral purposes may be checked. I think no one can object to the principle of that. But I do not rise here and do not desire to discuss any humanitarian views or the traditional policy of the Republic.

Mr. CONKLING. What was the proportion of Chinese immigration stated by the Senator?

Mr. SARGENT. Nine out of ten are coolies, and ninety-nine out of one hundred of the females imported are for immoral purposes, are reduced to a condition of slavery worse than that of the poorest dog in the meanest household, by the testimony of judges, of police officers, of mayors, of clergymen, and of intelligent citizens of every kind conversant with this great evil that afflicts our people. I trust to have in a few days the volume of testimony taken by our senatorial commission, which will show to the Senate of the United States that I have not dealt in exaggeration in speaking upon these matters; in fact, I have not been able to paint the picture as it should be; I have been quite inadequate to the task, though I have done my best.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President——

Mr. HAMILTON. I object to the consideration of the resolution.

Mr. SARGENT. I believe it is not in order to object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont has the floor.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The resolution itself is taken up, and this is offered as a substitute.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rose for the purpose of moving——

Mr. HAMILTON. I did not hear the question put.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair put the question to the Senate on taking up the resolution before the substitute was offered; the substitute could not have been offered unless the resolution was before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rose for the purpose of moving that this resolution and substitute be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. It is a subject too important and too difficult in some of its aspects, it appears to me, for the Senate to decide upon it with precipitancy and without the usual and careful examination of the committee that has matters of that kind in charge. However right this proposition may seem to us to be as it is written by the Senator from California, it may turn out, on reflection and examination afterward, that it is not right in the way it is stated and that in that way it ought not to be done; and I repeat what I said in the beginning, that it appears to me the subject is too important and in some of its aspects too critical to be passed upon precipitately by a vote in the Senate without a reference to the committee that has charge, and, as we all know, has careful and prudent charge, of all such matters. Therefore, without going into any discussion at this present time of the precise grounds upon which the resolution is to stand and what its reach is, I make this motion to refer it to the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which I hope my friend from California will have no objection.

Mr. SARGENT. I object because this matter has been under consideration in the Senate on several occasions since the 20th of April, of this year. I object because it has been under the consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations before this time without action. I myself in the last Congress presented a petition of over 20,000 people of the city of San Francisco, embracing our best people and all intelligent classes of society, and the subject slumbered as if inurned with the Capulets. I object because this is not a question of detail. It simply requests the executive department to take some measures toward negotiation, to ascertain what results can be produced by that negotiation. If this were a bill affixing penalties or prescribing rules for the executive department, of course the details should be studied by a committee; but this is simply a broad, general question, and I should not be just to my people if I consented to a reference.

There have been two national conventions assembled this year. The republican convention spoke upon this matter in a way to indicate that the sympathies of the republican party are with the people of the Pacific coast upon this question. It was not done by passing a resolution without debate; but after it had been debated for nearly an hour pro and con in the convention it passed by about a three-fourths vote of that body, showing the sympathies of the representatives of the republican party at large with the position which I assume on this matter. The democratic convention met at Saint Louis and they passed a resolution going very much further than the one which I ask the Senate to adopt. They were specific and positive upon this matter, and expressed the opinion, I presume, of the democratic party upon it throughout the length and breadth of the land. Now, this being so, it seems to me that the Senate should meet this question at least in the somewhat inadequate way in which I present it at this time. If the Senate shall insist that it will refer this resolution, embracing no details, requiring no elaboration, and no one suggesting any amendment to it or any criticism of the language of the resolution, it seems to me it would be an unfriendly measure to this matter, and as a representative of the Pacific coast where this evil is so great, where it has become almost intolerable for a thousand reasons which I have heretofore adverted to, I feel constrained to ascertain the sense of the Senate on this matter by a call of the yeas and nays, and I shall look upon the reference as an unfriendly movement on the subject, as will my people. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I hope the Senator will not persuade us all to suppose that it is an unfriendly act to refer an important proposition of this character to the proper committee for consideration. I hope nobody will be put, by my friend's statement, in that attitude. I decline to occupy it myself. I am quite ready when we get the report of the committee and get at the facts, to take up the resolution in the spirit in which an American Senator ought to take it up, to see that, while consistently we do the duties that we owe to mankind, we also exercise all the duties that we owe to the protection of our own society from immoral and pernicious influences. But "to go it upon the jump," as the saying may be, and decide as the sense of the Senate that a treaty of a particular character ought to be entered into between the United States and the two powers named in the resolution, I do not think is wise.

Mr. MERRIMON. It is very true that the resolution before the Senate does not propose any very definite action; but it is manifestly intended to be the initiatory step to a line of action that may be of the most serious character, not only to this country but to other countries and to all classes and conditions of men.

Now, sir, I am as much opposed to seeing the paupers and slaves and criminals of other countries come to this country as any one; but I do not desire to take any action that would cut off the oppressed, the industrious, and virtuous of any country from seeking a refuge in this. I believe the true American doctrine is to invite that class of all nations to come here and enjoy the blessings of free government, and I shall ever be found in favor of a line of action that will result in that end.

I understand, notwithstanding what the Senator from California has said on repeated occasions, that this Chinese question has two sides to it. It is said that the great issue in California and on our whole Pacific coast is a question of labor. That is the grand difficulty. It is true there are some bad men there and bad women, who have come from China and elsewhere to that coast, and I have no doubt they annoy the good people there; but there are good people also who have come from abroad, and I do not think we ought to take action that is to result in such serious moment without due consideration. I trust, therefore, that the motion of the Senator from Vermont will prevail. It is worth while to refer this resolution and give this matter the most serious consideration, because, although it proposes no definite action, it does propose an initiatory step upon a matter of the gravest moment.

Mr. HAMILTON. Mr. President, I cannot help but express my surprise at the statements made by the Senator from California. He says in effect that the Pacific slope has diligently worked up the two political conventions recently in session on this Chinese question to see which party would bid the highest for the vote of the Pacific States. If this crusade against the Chinese immigrants to this country shall be carried out, how will the measure comport with the speeches made only the day before yesterday all over the Union. This land will no longer be the asylum for the oppressed of all the world. People have hitherto been invited here from every quarter of the civilized world almost; but now, forsooth, because labor is cheap in California, Oregon, and Nevada, there is an organized effort to cut off emigration from China not only, but to expel those of that race already in the country. To be sure, as the Senator from North Carolina says, there may be some bad men among the Chinese immigrants, but there are bad men from other quarters also. I beg the Senator from California to remember what the Mexican population of 1848 would probably have said, if they had had a body to listen to them, when the Americans overran them and took possession of that country after the war with Mexico. They were absolutely prostrate, kicked out of doors, and cuffed hither and thither, just as the Chinese are now and as the negroes and Indians are.

Nobody can fail to see that there is an alliance forming between those opposed on general principles to the negro, the Chinese, and the Indian, to make common cause for the purpose of razing these tribes from the face of the earth; and it will be done if the republican party does not stand firm. It is of course in the interest of the democratic party, but I had hoped better things from the republican party. If the Pacific slope will not support the republican party unless it comes to their aid in this behalf, then for one I hope the republican party will give them up and pursue the even tenor of its way. Why, sir, it plucks the tail and clips the wings of the American eagle, and will require the remodeling of the Fourth of July literature of the country.

Mr. SARGENT. Mr. President, I did not say that California had worked up anything in national conventions; I said the national conventions had spoken.

Mr. HAMILTON. If the Senator will allow me, I did not say that; but I said nobody could fail to see it.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well, sir. Where is a great local mischief touching three States and all the organized Territories of the United States it well demands the attention of national conventions. The idea of my friend from Texas of American freedom is that we are the mere slop-pail into which all the dregs of the earth are to be poured. What will become of our American civilization if that theory is carried out? Can we stand all the vices, all the diseases, all the mischief that infect humanity the world over, and retain our American civilization? We have here a Christian civilization organized upon republican principles. China stands with between three hundred millions and four hundred millions of imperialists and slaves, swarming like the frogs of Egypt on our land, and they will press you from your stools and they will destroy every vestige of American civilization and constitutional liberty. They have come already by the tens of thousands, ay by the hundreds of thousands, to the Pacific coast; whole streets of our cities are occupied by them to the exclusion of all other classes, and it goes on with accelerated force. The Senator says let them come with all their traditional vices, with all their inadaptability to our institutions, to levy tribute from us, to plunder us—it amounts merely to that—and then return to their own country with their spoil. If they came here to be citizens, as does the German, or the Irishman, or any other class of immigrants which America has ever seen before, it would stand on a different basis. But there is nothing in the principles of the republican party that requires the subversion of this country by a flood of ignorance and vice, eliminating American citizens, freedom-loving citizens sustaining our institutions, our churches, our schools, our families—eliminating them to make room for pagan superstition and heathenism.

I reject that idea either of republicanism or democracy. It is not in accordance with the principles of the republican party. No principle ever laid down in any platform or inserted in any statute or constitution justifies such a result as you would have worked at the expense of American liberty. Our laws and constitutions speak for the protection of American citizens; have clothed with citizenship all those born on our soil and heretofore excluded; have secured them in certain inalienable rights; but they never have conceded the right of any nation, either be armed invasion or by overflow, to take possession of this country and necessarily exclude us. I say that is not republicanism.

I ask for the passage of this resolution because it initiates a step, if not final, at any rate tending in the right direction, to remove the great evils under which we suffer; and the Senator in objecting does not bring forward a pertinent illustration with reference to the Mexicans found in California. They are a good class of population, and they are treated by our people with consideration. They become citizens, and exercise their rights at the ballot-box, and they vote indifferently the republican or the democratic ticket according to their principles. One of them was recently governor of our State, Mr. Pacheco. We have treated them decently and well; but we acquired the territory as a result of war. It was acquired and became American territory, and our citizens went there, and went there not like barbarians, went there not carrying vice with full hands; they went there carrying American civilization and blessed the land by going there.

I want to say another thing to the Senator from Texas, and that is, that the Indians in California have been treated far better than they ever have been in his State of Texas. They have been treated with humanity there.

Mr. HAMILTON. The Senator will allow me to remark that I saw it stated only a little while ago that a community of civilized Indians, or partially civilized and Christianized, had been pushed from their territory, after having located and fattened it, by citizens of California. The Indians had occupied it perhaps a century, a concession made to them by the Mexican government from which they never would have been disturbed in the world if they had not come into the United States.

Mr. SARGENT. If that is true, it is the fault of the United States Government and not of the citizens of California. But I saw it stated in the papers of Texas the other day that men were shot there simply because they were republicans; that men are persecuted there for political opinions; that their lives are not safe; that white men are not safe there; that a reign of terror exists throughout the State; that one State government was subverted by fraud and violence; and that I believe to be true in reference to the State which my friend has the honor to represent. It does not do for my friend to throw pebbles at California with regard to the Chinese or anything else.

I simply ask that there may be a constitutional exercise of the powers of the Government for investigation, for negotiation. We are not asking an army to go there and expel the Chinese; and our people have shown great patience under this terrible affliction. Here and there there has been a sporadic case of riot, with limited results, showing the fate that may impend; but the good sense and humanity of our people thus far have tended to keep down tendencies of that kind, and the Chinese there have been protected to the full extent of the law, notwithstanding there are daily occurring cases which appall the moral sense there. I do not judge by a single instance; but it may be worth relating that I took up a paper this morning fresh from San Francisco, coming as soon as the fast train would bring it, and I found there that the house of a lady moving in good society had been burglarized and articles of the value of several hundred dollars stolen from her; that she set the detectives in search and found that the culprit was a Chinese servant in her employ. She had him prosecuted, and on ample evidence he was convicted and sent to the State's prison; and thereupon she found it difficult to obtain any future Chinese servants, and they set a watch upon her house, and one morning when all her family were gone except herself a Chinese entered and assaulted her with a hatchet and left her for dead, in revenge for the offense she had committed in having their compatriot sent to the State's prison! This may be regarded as a very slight circumstance, perhaps; but it shows the inflammable nature of this population. I have myself seen, as I stated in the Senate formerly, on two sides of a narrow street one hundred Chinamen ranged on each side making threatening gestures at each other and finally coming in collision with their pistols and their knives, and a dozen left dead upon the ground almost in a moment. These things occur in our populous cities. Are they not evils? I brought forward the testimony of medical men showing the destruction of the health and morals of our children, of our boys nine and twelve and fourteen years of age. I ask whether a system which is propagating these evils is to be endured forever simply because we have declared that men are free and equal, because there has been a certain sentimentalism which has been incorporated in our Constitution and laws? Have we so fettered ourselves that it is impossible for us to protect the body-politic against a great mischief, an evil coming in a new form, and where an emergency has arisen, and where three States are liable to be subverted under a black, nauseous flood? I do not believe it; but I do not ask anything strange or extraordinary in the resolution. I simply ask that, in conjunction with the other governments named, the United States Government may investigate this matter.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, the question now before the Senate is one of very great moment, too vast in its proportions, it seems to me, for us to attempt to come to a determination upon it in a sudden and hasty debate like the present. I doubt not this body will bring at the proper time to its consideration its calm, its most deliberate judgment, and will do that which shall be deemed best. In the ages of nations it is but a day since we found this people with commercial restrictions as invulnerable as the wall that separated their territory from Tartary; and, in conjunction with England, we sent our Navy to batter down those restrictions, and in the name of civilization and Christianity to demand that those restrictions should be obliterated. It is in my mind but yesterday that I listened to "that old man eloquent" in the other end of this Capitol when he declared that before the Christianized nations of the world the United States and Great Britain were justified in extending commerce and Christianity by the use of the Army and the Navy to break down that system of restrictions which in long, uncounted ages had held that government aloof from the Christianized nations of the world.

I have not any recollection now, I do not call to my mind that one word was said of forcing opium upon them as an article of commerce that we as well as England carried there in ships; but it was upon the high ground of elevating man, of extending commerce, of spreading Christianity to the heathen of that country; and it was upon that ground alone that it was justified. Now, there may have followed, I doubt not there have followed, great evils to which the Senator from California has invited our attention, and they are evils that will demand our careful consideration and our sober judgment; but they are not to be settled by the adoption of an abstract resolution like that which is now before this body; and I repeat what I said here a year ago or more upon this subject, that I do not think it belongs to the Senate to indicate to the Executive what it ought or what it ought not to do in its negotiation of treaties with foreign powers. I cannot call such a case to my mind; and I have sought the information of Senators around me and they are at fault as well as myself, or rather they are unable to give any information which I do not possess. I do not call to my mind a single instance since we have been a government where the Senate has sought to indicate to the Executive, certainly in a legislative capacity, what ought to be the rules in relation to treaties which he may negotiate. Is it not rather a usurpation of the powers that belong to the Executive instead of to us? Ours is the duty of ratifying treaties; it is the duty of the Executive to negotiate them. And do we not tread outside of the legitimate duties that are imposed upon us, and do we not make ourselves obnoxious, in a legislative capacity too, treading upon that line of duties which belongs to the Executive, if we seek to indicate in advance what should be the provisions of a treaty.

I know very well that when a treaty shall have been negotiated and submitted to us for our ratification the amending power is with us, and we may so change it as to make it what we think it should be; but indicating to the Executive, I think, is rather a reflection upon the Executive, and is doing a duty that does not belong to us. I repeat again that this is too broad a question, a question of too much moment for us to discuss here, and I think the passage of an abstract resolution like this is entirely out of place.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, I was strongly impressed with the statements made by the Senator from California and the Senator from Oregon some time ago in regard to the extent and character and effects of Chinese immigration. But as this resolution looks to a treaty which is somewhat in violation of the traditions and the policy of this country in regard to foreign immigration, I would say to the Senator from California and to the other Senators from the Pacific coast that I am satisfied the Executive will not act, I am satisfied this Senate will not act, except upon the fullest information in regard to that matter.

We have been told of the action of political conventions. I understand the republican convention went no further than to give perhaps a pledge for an investigation into the character and effects of Chinese immigration. I suggest to my friend from California that the right way to get hold of this thing—and without doing it I think he will never accomplish any result—will be for Congress to appoint a committee or commission with power to investigate the character, the extent, the effect, and probable consequences of Chinese immigration. Let us have full information on the subject.

I do not doubt the statements made in the Senator's speech or in that of the Senator from Oregon. But the country will not act upon that; they will want a full and complete investigation of this matter before we make a treaty the object of which is to cut off in whole or in part immigration from any foreign country. If this immigration is of the kind described by the Senators, if its effects are such as they have told us, if it has become so large as they predict, threatening to overwhelm the whole Pacific coast, let that fact be established in a way to impress itself upon the whole country, and then the Government will take action. But I suggest to my friend from California that he will never get a treaty made and never get a treaty ratified until the true character of the whole question is so fully exposed and so fully established that the Government and the people will be willing to act upon the matter. There is hardly time this morning, but I believe I will offer a substitute for this resolution, asking Congress to appoint a commission or committee with power to examine this whole matter and make a report at a future time. That, I believe, was the suggestion of the Cincinnati convention, if I remember correctly.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. President, I will say one word before the morning hour expires——

Mr. SARGENT. I hope we shall have a vote on something before the morning hour expires. I do not wish to interrupt my friend from Wisconsin, however.

Mr. HOWE. I will not object to having a vote of some kind within ten minutes from this time. It seems to me that the resolution laid upon the table aims at two very different objects and ends: one is to reform our treaties with China so as to restrict the importation of labor from China and the other is so to reform them as to restrict the importation of crime. The two objects are very different and very dissimilar.

Mr. SARGENT. Is the Senator speaking of the substitute offered by me?

Mr. HOWE. No; I did not know there was a substitute. Let the pending resolution be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will report the modified resolution as substituted by the Senator from California.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate negotiations should be entered upon with the governments of China and Great Britain to effect such changes in existing treatics as will tend to check the great influx of Chinese coolies and criminals to this country.

Mr. HOWE. It is to that proposition I am speaking. I understand a Chinese cooly to be a very different thing from a Chinese criminal.

Mr. SARGENT. They are slaves and criminals. Do we want a country of slaves? We have got rid of slavery in one form.

Mr. HOWE. I did not understand the substitute to refer to slaves at all.

Mr. SARGENT. It does.

Mr. HOWE. I find no such word in it, no equivalent to it, no synonym for it. If I understand what is meant by a cooly it is a mere hired laborer, and they are found in different countries. It is not an English word, but it means an English thing; nay, it means an American thing, for if there is anything that is American it is labor.

Mr. SARGENT. It means nothing of the kind. It does not mean mere labor. It means those persons who sell themselves for a term of years and are brought to work out their contracts in America, and Peru, and Macao, and Manila, and Cuba, a system in all of its features worse than the African slave trade.

Mr. HOWE. What is the Senator's authority for that definition?

Mr. SARGENT. All the authorities in the matter; Mr. Bailey, our consul at Hong-Kong, notably among others.

Mr. HOWE. I took the pains, before I ventured to form an opinion myself, to refer to the biggest dictionary I could find in the Capitol. Mr. Worcester gives the very definition I give to it. But I think before we rush a proposition of this kind through the Senate without any reference to any committee there should be at least a common understanding in the Senate as to what the words employed in the resolution mean.

Mr. SARGENT. My friend will allow me a moment. He certainly cannot complain of the want of a reference to a committee. He is on a committee on which for two or three years this subject has been earnestly pressed by myself and by the people of California, and without the slightest result to this moment; and now I am complained of because I simply ask that the Executive may take the matter in charge and see if something cannot be done.

Mr. HOWE. I am obliged to differ with my friend from California even on that proposition. This has not been before the Committee on Foreign Relations, and nothing like it as I understood. But I am not complaining of the Senator for not letting his proposition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Upon those two points I am at odds with the Senator from California. I do complain that the Senator should insist upon having a resolution go through this body in the morning hour without a reference to any committee whatever which employs terms upon the definition of which Senators are disagreed and according to him the authorities are disagreed.

Mr. SARGENT. If I had the slightest hope of getting a report from his committee, I should consent to sending it there with pleasure; but I have not a hope of that; and experience shows me that such a hope would be baseless.

Mr. HOWE. I will not undertake to defend the Committee on Foreign Relations this morning. I think that criticism, however, is not at all deserved by the committee. It certainly cannot be abused for not having reported a subject that never has been referred to it.

But I promised the Senator to let him take a vote before twelve o'clock, and therefore I will continue these remarks no further. I should make no difficulty, however, about recommending to the executive department such a revision of our treaties as will restrict the importation of criminals; but when it comes to restricting the importation of labor it is a very different thing, and I should want to consider that subject before I consented to give the Executive a hint upon it.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MORTON. Is it in order to offer an amendment to the substitute?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is. The Senator from California modified the resolution by a substitute.

Mr. MORTON. I wish to offer a substitute for that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I thought there was a motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is a motion to refer, and that motion is pending. No amendment can be attached to the substitute, as there is a motion pending to commit.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to its being submitted, to be referred with the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. So the Chair understood, and he was about to direct the amendment of the Senator from Indiana to be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment is to strike out all after the word "resolved" and insert:

That a committee of three Senators be appointed to investigate the character, extent, and effect of Chinese immigration to this country, with power to visit the Pacific coast for that purpose, and to send for persons and papers, and to report at the next session of Congress.

Mr. SARGENT. I should be willing to take that resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Vermont object?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think this subject, as I have stated over and over again, ought to go to the committee in the regular way, and they can report this substitute if they think it is right in form. I do not know that there is any objection to it, and I do not know but that there is; but this subject I have said and still believe should go to the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves to refer the resolution of the Senator from California to the Committee on Foreign Relations. On that question the Senator from California has asked for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the amendment go to the committee with the resolution?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It does not. It has been read for information.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does the Senator from Vermont object to its going to the committee?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what the Chair asked the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand the Senator from Vermont does not object.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I understood the Chair to ask me whether I assented to the proposition to have this substitute accepted in lieu of the motion of the Senator from California. I did not assent to that; but I thought I said that I had no objection to the substitute going with the resolution to the committee if the subject was referred at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This motion to refer, then, will be understood to cover the proposition of the Senator from Indiana. The motion is to refer the resolution and proposed substitute to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. HOWE. I beg to know whether the Senator from California has or has not accepted the substitute offered by the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. SARGENT. It is not in my power to do that pending the motion to refer to the committee. I would accept it if I had an opportunity.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair submitted that to the Senator from Vermont, and he objected.

Mr. HOWE. Then I shall vote against this motion to refer, having the distinct intimation that the Senator from California will accept the substitute.

Mr. SARGENT. I will; because I think investigation will be useful. I desire investigation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the reference to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SARGENT. I am willing a vote should be taken by the sound.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The yeas and nays have been ordered. Let them be taken.

Mr. SARGENT. Very well.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 32; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Anthony, Davis, Dennis, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, McMillan, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Norwood, Patterson, Saulsbury, Withers, and Wright—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Booth, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Conkling, Cooper, Dawes, Dorsey, Eaton, Ferry, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Kernan, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Mitchell, Morton, Paddock, Ransom, Sargent, Spencer, Wadleigh, and Wallace—32.

ABSENT—Messrs. Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Logan, Maxey, Morrill of Maine, Oglesby, Randolph, Robertson, Sharon, Sherman, Stevenson, Thurman, West, Whyte, and Windom—25.

So the motion to refer was not agreed to.

Mr. SARGENT. I accept the substitute of the Senator from Indiana, and ask that we have a vote upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to further action, the morning hour having expired? The Chair hears no objection to extending the time. The Senator from California accepts the amendment of the Senator from Indiana. The Secretary will report the resolution as it now stands.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of three Senators be appointed to investigate the character, extent, and effect of Chinese immigration to this country, with power to visit the Pacific coast for that purpose, and to send for persons and papers, and to report at the next session of Congress.

The resolution was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee.

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION WITH ASIA.

Mr. DAWES. I enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between American and Asia passed the Senate yesterday.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to reconsider will be entered.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That James Tebault and others be allowed to withdraw the papers relating to their claim from the files of the Senate on leaving copies.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, pursuant to the order of the Senate made on June 19, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative and executive business.

Mr. SARGENT. I move that when the Senate adjourn it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HOWE. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twenty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 6, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of its clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LORD. I call for the regular order.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. I hope the gentleman will yield to me for a few moments that I may ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage the bill (S. No. 846) to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods, and the selling or dealing in of trade-mark counterfeit goods.

Mr. LORD. I cannot yield for that purpose. There are reasons for my insisting on the regular order. I have to go over to the Senate.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the vote on the Geneva award bill.

Mr. LORD. Before the regular order is proceeded with, I desire to offer a resolution in connection with the impeachment trial.

Mr. VANCE, of North Carolina. Is that resolution the regular order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a privileged resolution.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

Mr. LORD. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House, on the request of the managers to conduct the impeachment against William W. Belknap, appear before the Senate sitting as a court of impeachment with such papers of the House as the managers may require, and that the members of the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department have permission to appear and testify in such court in regard to such impeachment, and to produce such papers in relation thereto as the managers may require.

The resolution was adopted.

GENEVA AWARD.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in regard to the distribution of the unappropriated moneys under the Geneva award. The pending question is on the adoption of the substitute proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. KNOTT] for the report of the majority of the committee. The Clerk will report the substitute.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill to amend the act entitled "An act for the creation of a court for the adjudication and disposition of certain moneys received into the Treasury under an award made by the tribunal of arbitration constituted by virtue of the first article of the treaty concluded at Washington the 8th day of May, A. D. 1871, between the United States of America and the Queen of Great Britain," approved June 23, 1874.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That so much of the twelfth section of the said act as provides that "no claim shall be admissible or allowed by the court by or in behalf of any insurance company or insurer, either in its or his own right, or as assignee or otherwise in the right of a person or party insured, unless such claimant shall show to the satisfaction of said court that during the late rebellion the sum of its or his losses in respect to its or his war risks exceeded the sum of its or his premiums or other gains upon or in respect to such war risks; and in case of any such allowance, the same shall not be greater than such excess of loss," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

SEC. 2. That any claimant excluded by the provision hereby repealed shall have the like period of time within which to present, file, and prove its or his claim after the passage of this amendment as he could have had after the passage of the said act if not so excluded. And the time of the duration of the court created by the said act, and its powers, are hereby extended for a period sufficient to enable it to hear and dispose of such additional claims and the claims already referred to it; which period shall not exceed one year from the expiration of the time for filing claims under this section.

The question being taken on agreeing to the substitute, there were—ayes 21, noes 95.

Mr. KNOTT. I call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, there were—ayes 25, noes 29.

So (the affirmative being more than one-fifth of the whole vote) the yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WALLING. I ask that the substitute may be again reported.

The substitute was again read.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 35, nays 151, not voting 103; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashe, Atkins, Blackburn, Blount, Boone, Buckner, John B. Clarke of Kentucky, Clymer, Cox, Davis, Douglas, Garfield, Hancock, Hardenbergh, Hathorn, Hubbell, Thomas L. So the substitute was rejected.

During the vote,

Mr. TUCKER stated that he was paired with Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York, who, if present, would vote "no," while he would vote "ay."

Mr. STRAIT stated that Mr. DE BOLT was absent on account of sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr HOLMAN. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. LORD. I think that motion will be withdrawn.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think it is a fair motion to test the sense of the House.

Mr. CAULFIELD demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 96, nays 113, not voting 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, George A. Bagley, Bell, Blackburn, Bland, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bright, Buckner, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, William P. So the House refused to lay the bill on the table.

During the vote,

Mr. MONROE stated that he was paired with Mr. WARD, who, if present, would vote in the affirmative, while he would vote in the negative.

Mr. HARDENBERGH stated that his colleague, Mr. HAMILTON, was paired with Mr. LYNCH.

Mr. HENDEE stated that his colleague, Mr. DENISON, was confined to his house by sickness.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LORD demanded the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. If the previous question is not sustained, will it not then be in order to recommit the bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I give notice if the previous question is not seconded I will make that motion.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 67, noes 65; no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. LORD as tellers.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 94, noes 65.

So the previous question was seconded.

The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. HALE moved to reconsider the vote by which the main question was ordered to be put; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The question next recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HALE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 107, nays 96, not voting 86; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. TUCKER. I am paired upon this question with Mr. WILLIAMS, of New York. If he were here he would vote "ay," and I would vote "no."

Mr. HURLBUT. I am paired upon this question with the gentleman from Wisconsin, Mr. LYNDE. If he were here he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. MONROE. I am paired upon this question with Mr. WARD, from New York. If he were present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

Mr. EAMES. I desire to announce that my colleague, Mr. BALLOU, is absent by leave of the House. If present he would vote "ay."

Mr. PAGE. I am paired upon this bill with Mr. BASS, of New York. If he were present he would vote "no," and I would vote "ay."

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. LORD moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that the regular order is the morning hour and the call of committees for reports of a public nature. [Cries of "Regular order."]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I rise to a privileged question. On the 7th of June the bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein named, was reported to the House and recommitted to the Judiciary Committee, and on the next day I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. I now call up for consideration that motion, which take precedence of the morning hour.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman will yield to me to make a report from the committee of conference on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is at all times in order.

Mr. RANDALL. I know that, but I do not desire to take the gentleman from Ohio off the floor if he will yield to me.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I reserve the right to raise the question of consideration on the bill of the gentleman from Ohio.

GENEVA AWARD.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent of the House to make a statement in justice to the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. WELLS,] who introduced a substitute for the bill of the majority striking out the insurance companies and putting the balance of the fund into the Treasury. The amendment of Mr. JENKS was adopted, which was substantially the same as the substitute offered by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. WELLS] for the whole bill. I make this statement in justice to Mr. WELLS, who was the first to introduce the bill striking out the insurance companies and putting the balance of the fund into the Treasury.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I submit a report from the committee of conference on the legislative, &c., appropriation bill, and I desire to ask the previous question upon it; but before doing so I wish to make the statement that after the previous question is sustained I will yield the floor for any questions that gentlemen desire to put or for debate within the limit of one hour.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

SAML. J. RANDALL,
OTHO R. SINGLETON,
CHARLES FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

LOT M. MORRILL,
WM. WINDOM,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. I withdraw the call for the previous question for a moment.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I understand that the gentleman proposes to occupy the hour allotted to him under the rules, and yield a portion of the time to this side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not propose to occupy the full hour, but only to occupy so much time as we acquaint the House with the circumstances connected with this report. The Senate desired to have this report returned to them as speedily as possible for reasons which may hereafter appear.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Then I understand that the gentleman will yield a portion of the time to this side of the House.

Mr. RANDALL. I mean to be fair in all respects. I withdraw the demand for the previous question and hold the floor in my own right, and I desire to submit and have the Clerk read what I send to the desk, which is an offer made by the Senate conferees to the House conferees at their meeting this morning.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the part of the Senate submit that as anything like a just and intelligent adjustment of the salaries of the employés, clerks, heads of bureaus, chiefs of divisions and of the subdivisions of the Executive Departments, a service at once extended and diversified, must necessarily involve a critical and laborious examination into its details and duties, an undertaking quite impracticable in the last days of a session of Congress, and unwise to attempt in connection with an appropriation bill, the committee therefore propose, as a concession, in order to meet the views of the House on the subject of appropriations for the salaries, that the Senate will recede from its amendments to the bill of the House in this respect, and remit the question of the revision and adjustment of the same to a joint select committee of four, two of whom shall be appointed by the presiding officer of each House, whose duty it shall be to revise and adjust the salaries, having due regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service, and make report of their doing therein on the first day of the next session of Congress: And provided, That any change made in said salaries by Congress upon said report shall take effect from the 1st day of July, 1876; and all persons who shall be affected thereby and who shall continue in the service shall be deemed to have accepted the terms hereof and acquiesced therein.

But the Senate cannot, having regard to its constitutional rights and duties as a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government, assent to the changes in the existing law that it believes to be pernicious as the price of securing appropriations necessary to carry on the operations of the Government under the laws as they now exist. And upon the same principle the Senate does not demand that the House of Representatives shall vote to appropriate any money, even to meet the legal obligations of the United States, that the House may feel it to be its duty to refuse; thus leaving to each House absolute independence in respect of acceding or not acceding to new provisions of law that it believes to be unwise.

And the committee further submit that the Senate will recede from its amendments to the House amendments on the reduction of the civil list in the Executive Departments of clerks and employés, and agree to any amendments which shall reduce the number one-half that proposed by the bill of the House, observing in such reduction the exercise of such discrimination as to the needs of the service in the several subdivisions thereof as a careful examination of the same may indicate.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, the proposition of the Senate in its practical effect is just this: They accept the amount of money which the House proposes to appropriate on account of salaries as they are now fixed by law, which would leave open to future settlement a controversy which would arise at once between the clerks and other employés provided for in this bill and the Government; in other words, it would leave a claim on the Government for the balance of an appropriation, being the difference in the amount between the sums which we give in this bill and the sums as provided for by existing law. It places the House in the position of refusing to make appropriations more than we believe to be sufficient for the present year and throws the controversy into the future.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me one question?

Mr. RANDALL. I will in a moment. Our proposition was this: We proposed to fix the salaries as provided for for this year in the words of the sections which I send to the Clerk's desk in lieu of the second section of the bill as it originally passed the House. We make the salaries fixed in this bill the permanent salaries of the officers to whom it relates.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 2. That the sums herein appropriated as the compensation of the officers and employés of the Government, respectively, enumerated in this act shall be in full for the compensation of such officers and employés for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, unless Congress shall otherwise provide in the manner hereinafter authorized.

Mr. RANDALL. In that section we claim control over the appropriations for compensation to be given to these clerks for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877. We go on further to accept an additional proposition which originated in the Senate and which is embraced in section 3, which I ask the Clerk now to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That a joint select committee of four shall be appointed, two by the presiding officer of each House, whose duty it shall be to inquire into the requisite number and proper salaries of the officers, clerks, and employés in the several Executive Departments of the Government, with a view to the due and permanent adjustment of the same, having regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service. Said joint committee shall sit during the recess of Congress, and shall make their report thereon to the two Houses on the first Monday of December next.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question right here, before he leaves this subject?

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. HALE. Is the gentleman certain that the proposition of the Senate would leave open to the clerks a claim for the difference between the compensation fixed by this bill and that heretofore fixed by law? It struck me as the proposition was read that the scope of it was to this effect: that whatever the commission to settle salaries shall report as the proper salaries of these clerks shall apply from July 1, 1876. I did not hear it distinctly, because my attention was not called distinctly to it while it was being read; but that is what appeared to me to be the scope of the proposition.

Mr. RANDALL. I am not surprised that the gentleman should have received that impression. He will see that, according to the direct wording of the proposition on the part of the Senate, it practically makes the House appropriate on account of salaries, as it were. But suppose that this commission which is provided for should fail to agree. Then it would leave a claim on the part of the clerks against the Government for the remainder of their salaries according to existing law.

Mr. HALE. I think that is so. But if the commission did agree, their agreement would relate back to the 1st of July and would cover the whole year, would it not?

Mr. RANDALL. If they did agree, and Congress confirmed their recommendation to make these adjusted salaries retroactive, then well and good. But if Congress did not confirm their recommendation, or if they did not agree, then the entire number of clerks and employés affected by this bill would be put right back under the old law, and would have a claim against the Government for their salaries as now fixed by law.

Mr. HALE. That is on the assumption that the work of the commission came to nothing?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes. The next proposition is as to the reduction in the number of clerks, employés, &c. Perhaps the most intelligent way of getting at this matter exactly is to state the effect of the House bill and the effect of the Senate amendments in reference to the reduction in the numbers of clerks. The House bill, after many months of consideration in the Committee on Appropriations, provided for a reduction of twelve hundred in the number of clerks in the various Departments of the Government. The Senate in their amendments acceded to a reduction of three hundred, so that the number of clerks in controversy when the bill went to the committee of conference was nine hundred. The Senate by their second proposition proposed to accede to a reduction of three hundred more, which would make the number of discharged clerks when this bill shall go into effect six hundred, instead of twelve hundred as proposed by the House.

That proposition was rejected by the House conference on the ground that there were some places where the reduction would be very improper if only one-half of the proposed reduction was agreed to; that there might be some places where upon a review by the conferees an additional number should be allowed. The House conferees, or a majority of them, and I think all of them—the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] will correct me if I am mistaken—the House conferees preferred to consider each Department as it was reached in the bill, deciding in regard to each upon its own merits.

In reference to the 10 per cent. reduction of salaries, we have knowledge that the Senate has agreed to waive objection to the principle we have maintained in regard to the salaries of postmasters throughout the United States. According to the report on the post-office appropriation bill, hardly any postmaster is reduced in salary less than 10 per cent., while some of them have their salaries reduced 25 per cent.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a question? I know he does not desire to misrepresent.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly not.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to state for the information of the gentleman that the change in the salaries of postmasters from what they were under the legislation of June 23, 1874, the re-adjustment of which under that act would have been made as of the 1st of July this year by the conference post-office appropriation bill passed on yesterday, instead of being a reduction of 10 per cent., is an increase in all cases where the salaries are not above $1,500 a year.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman knows perfectly well that the salaries of postmasters heretofore receiving $4,000 a year are reduced.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Certainly.

Mr. RANDALL. As I understand it, the House was compelled to compromise with the Senate on a proviso that the reduction should not make the salaries of those receiving $4,000 a year less than $3,000. Is not that a reduction of 25 per cent.?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Those above $1,500 are reduced; those at $1,500 or below are increased, and the gentleman will bear in mind that of the thirty-six or thirty-eight thousand postmasters largely over thirty thousand have their salaries increased by the bill passed yesterday, the decrease in salary applying only to those postmasters whose salaries are over, say, $1,500.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, I only stated that upon the principle conceded by the Senate in the post-office appropriation bill the reduction of salaries in some cases was 25 per cent. Under that bill the salaries of ninety or one hundred postmasters who are receiving to-day $4,000 each would in all probability run down below $3,000 but for the proviso to which the House had to agree, which stopped the reduction at $3,000. Thus there are ninety or more postmasters at various places throughout the country whose salaries are reduced 25 per cent., while under this bill we ask a reduction in general of only 10 per cent.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? I was a member of the conference committee which agreed to the post-office bill; and while it is true, as the gentleman says, that the Senate conceded the principle of the reduction of certain salaries, yet it is also true that the salaries of postmasters which are called compensation do not rest upon a fixed provision like the salaries of clerks, some of which have never been changed in the last twenty years.

Mr. RANDALL. I only cited that as an instance of the Senate changing law upon an appropriation bill.

Mr. HALE. The salaries of postmasters have been fixed under a law which allows flexibility, and from year to year under that law those salaries have been increasing so that almost every postmaster in the country is to-day receiving a larger salary than he was two, four, eight, or ten years ago. The fact of these salaries or this compensation constantly leaping up was an evil confronting the Senate.

Mr. RANDALL. That may be; but I want to direct attention to the fact that, while gentlemen are here contending that the salaries of the clerks and emp loyés of this Government shall not be reduced, there is not a branch of general industry, there is not a manufacturing establishment, there is not an individual employing laborers in this nation that is not making an enormous reduction of wages. Only this morning I heard of an instance where in my own region of country compensation has been reduced from $1.75 a day down to $1.15 a day—a reduction of 33 per cent.; while in these Departments of the Government we are only asking a reduction of 10 per cent. Now, when these enormous reductions in wages, clerk hire, &c., are being made in every branch of industry throughout the nation, we do not think it an unreasonable position to assume that the clerks and employés of the Government shall have their pay reduced 10 per cent.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I think a little further statement is necessary to enable the House to understand this question thoroughly. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has correctly stated the differences between the conference committees. Now, what is the difference in controversy in dollars and cents? I believe I can state that it is tacitly agreed on both sides that the 10 per cent. reduction of the compensation of members of Congress shall stand. I believe that is tacitly agreed to on both sides, although it has not appeared in the written propositions which have passed between the two conference committees.

Mr. RANDALL. We have not discussed that.

Mr. FOSTER. I believe that is tacitly understood.

Mr. RANDALL. It is embraced in our system of reduction, of course.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, according to the House bill, the reduction of the salaries of clerks will amount, I think, to about $250,000. That applies to the classes above first-class clerks. None others are touched.

The Senate objects to the House proposition, as I understand, not because it is a reduction of salaries, but because it is a change of law; that the House is undertaking to coerce the Senate into doing something that they do not desire to do by the threat that unless this is done on an appropriation bill the necessary means for the proper running of the Departments of the Government will be withheld. Whether the Senate is right or wrong is for the country to judge. Never yet in the history of this country has one House been able to coerce the other (even on an appropriation bill) to do what in its judgment it thought ought not to be done. In times gone by such an attempt has been characterized as revolution by high democratic authority; and it is safe to say now that it is nothing else than revolution for one House to undertake to compel the other to accept a proposition embracing new legislation on an appropriation bill that it strenuously objects to, with the threat the wheels of Government must stop unless their assent is given.

For myself, I am willing to say that if I occupied the position of a Senator I would be willing to compromise upon this question: but the Senate, standing on their prerogatives, (and, as I understand, it is a solid sentiment, shared by democrats and republicans alike,) think we are trying to invade their rightful authority.

Mr. RANDALL. I have never seen any record which proves that statement. I can answer for some members of the Senate to the contrary.

Mr. FOSTER. A division on this question has never been asked in the Senate, so far as I know. There has been practical unanimity of sentiment in the Senate.

Mr. REAGAN. The record of yesterday's proceedings answers that question.

Mr. RANDALL. It is not a solid Senate by any means.

Mr. FOSTER. Practically it is. There may be a few Senators who adopt the view of the House; but it is known to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, as it is to me, that many democratic Senators stand with the majority of that body on this proposition.

Now, as to the reduction in the numbers of those employed, a question involving a very large sum of money, many times greater than the difference in salary, it is probable that we can agree, although this morning our side refused to agree to an even division of the differences. I know the Senate is willing to meet us upon this question half way at least, and perhaps more.

So that, Mr. Speaker, the difference, the whole thing we are haggling about, amounts to not over $250,000. We are (the House) standing upon our original action as to salaries of clerks, and undertaking, as the Senate asserts, to coerce them into the abandonment of a principle dear to them and to us for the purpose of trying to save $250,000.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] has talked about reductions, that these reductions extend to the manufacturing interest. I agree with him. The Senate agree with us. The Senate agree and have shown a practical illustration of their agreement in the reduction and postponement of expenditure I hold in my hand a table which shows that the Senate, including the deficiency bill, have agreed to a reduction and postponement in the expenditures of $22,000,000 this year. They feel that they have gone to the utmost limit in the passage of these bills and in agreement to the conference committees in those cases. They say to us they have come toward us and agreed to the extent of $22,000,000 in reduction, and that therefore we ought not, in order to save only $250,000, to attempt to coerce them into the acknowledgment of a principle they do not agree to.

The Senate has yielded more than one-half of the differences between the Houses on the two bills, the post-office and Navy. On all questions of discretion, as distinguished from a change of law, they have yielded to the demands of the House, and in the bill we are now discussing they express a willingness to meet us more than half way.

To sum up, then, by their action they reduce and postpone expenditures to the extent of $22,000,000; they are willing to meet us more than half way on all questions of discretion. So that the expenditures next year will be reduced by the sum of $25,000,000. Now, shall we undertake to degrade the Senate for the purpose of saving $250,000 more?

Mr. O'BRIEN. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio a single question. I believe I have the permission of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. Go on.

Mr. O'BRIEN. The gentleman from Ohio first made reference to the solidity with which the Senate stand up and oppose retrenchment and reform in governmental expenditures and also in regard to the conferees on both sides, both on the part of the House and of the Senate, in recent conferences. I desire to inquire of the gentleman, if it is a proper inquiry, and if not he will not reply to it, whether the democratic member of the Senate conferees stands with the democratic members of the House conferees in favor of reduction and retrenchment or whether he sides with the republican Senators?

Mr. FOSTER. I prefer not to answer the question. I suppose it is well known how the democratic conferees stand.

Mr. RANDALL. In many respects the House conferees united against the Senate.

I want to say, Mr. Speaker, as this debate has been somewhat general, that the first proposition came from the two conferees on the part of the House, and not from the minority representation upon the conference; and to-day the conferees on the part of the House have agreed to the first section as offered the other day on the part of the House to the Senate, leaving out the third section; that is to say, allowing these appropriations to be the full sum for this year, and leaving it an open question for future legislation whether they should continue at reduced rates. That, I think, was the united conference on the part of the House. Both propositions, however, were rejected by the Senate conferees.

Mr. KASSON. Before the gentleman sits down, let me ask him a question.

Mr. RANDALL. Certainly.

Mr. KASSON. I want to say that when he says the Senate stands against changing the laws in the direction of economy, and cites their having yielded the principle upon the post-office bill, I think he fails to detect the distinction he ought to, because the Senate has never refused to concur in the direction of economy, even to changing the laws where their judgment believed it consistent with the good of the service.

Mr. RANDALL. Just let me say a word there——

Mr. KASSON. On the other hand, I wish to ask my honorable friend from Pennsylvania to state whether he, as a representative of the majority, really denies in principle the equal right of the Senate to pass independently upon the propriety and safety to the public interest of a change of the laws; whether he maintains that the House has the right itself to determine for both bodies all change of laws in respect to salaries and number of employés? I have not heard a distinct statement from him on that principle. Does he deny co-ordinate rights to the Senate in making changes in our laws? Does he charge the majority of the House has the right to dictate?

Mr. RANDALL. The Constitution itself makes a distinction between the two Houses, and in respect to revenue measures the House stands, as I think in terms, according to the Constitution, as the superior body.

Mr. KASSON. Simply for the origination of revenue bills; nothing else. Amendment and every other consideration by the Constitution are equal in the Senate. Hence I desire to know——

Mr. RANDALL. At an early period of this session the House determined to change the rule, and only to allow the incorporation upon appropriation bills where the subject-matter was germane and where it was in the line of retrenchment.

Mr. KASSON. I do not think my honorable friend comes to the point, which is: Does he deny as a matter of principle the equal right of the Senate to pass upon laws affecting the numbers to be employed and salaries?

Mr. RANDALL. Now, at a time like this, with prostration all around, we put legislation on an appropriation bill looking to a reduction, an enormous reduction, of the expenditures of this Government, and we propose to stand firmly if we can. I propose, at least, to stand firmly in my vote in favor of those retrenchments.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman simply answer the question? Does he, upon principle, deny to the Senate the equal right with the House to act upon the laws relating to salaries and the numbers to be employed?

Mr. RANDALL. I think the Constitution and the practice and the judgment of this community is that the Senate should defer to the House in these respects.

Mr. KASSON. But does the gentleman deny the equal right of the Senate under the Constitution to pass upon these laws?

Mr. RANDALL. I do not deny its equal power.

Mr. KASSON. And equal right?

Mr. RANDALL. I take all the right for this side that the Constitution gives me. [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman read that part of the Constitution to which he refers.

Mr. HOLMAN. The House does not pretend to deny, of course, that the powers of the two branches of Congress are the same; and no law can be passed and no appropriation of money can be made without the concurrence of the two bodies. But on the question of the appropriation of money there is certainly a distinction and difference between the House and the Senate. The power to originate revenue implies this of itself. The power, the very great power under the Constitution, of originating revenue measures certainly implies also a power to determine for what purposes money shall be raised. It goes one step beyond——

Mr. KASSON. That has always been in dispute, as the gentleman knows.

Mr. HOLMAN. It implies that the House has the power to determine for what purposes revenue shall be raised from the country. And there lies the distinction between the two branches.

Mr. KASSON. That does not involve the amount to be expended for the purposes of the Government.

Mr. HOLMAN. It inevitably does that very thing.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman deny the equal right of the Senate under the Constitution to pass upon such laws?

Mr. HOLMAN. As I remarked, the powers are exactly the same. But the right of the House to originate money bills, and inevitably, as a result of that, the right of the House to determine for what purposes revenue shall be raised, does not leave the two bodies standing on the same footing as to revenue matter, the raising of revenue, and the appropriation of revenue.

Mr. KASSON. When the Constitution says that the Senate has the full power of amendment, does not that imply that it has equal power in the making of laws even for the raising of revenue?

Mr. HOLMAN. I did not precisely catch the gentleman's question.

Mr. KASSON. When the Constitution gives the Senate the full, unrestricted power of amendment, does not that imply that the Senate has equal power in the making of laws for the raising of revenue?

Mr. HOLMAN. The Constitution does not give the Senate that unrestricted power of amendment, but it is under the Constitution an implied power.

Mr. KASSON. It is given expressly in the Constitution.

Mr. HOLMAN. It is an implied power and perhaps an inevitable power resulting from the relations of the two bodies as co-ordinate branches of the Legislature. But, after all, the Government must concede that the right of the Senate is rather a negative than an affirmative one. The Senate cannot take a bill to raise revenue, a bill for instance to abolish the duty on coal or the duty on tea or coffee, and build upon that a whole revenue system. And if the Senate should build a whole revenue system on a measure, would not the House say at once, the Senate has gone beyond its power, beyond its right; and why? It has trespassed upon a power, upon a right which the Constitution devolves upon the House. Therefore, can the gentleman say that the two bodies are exactly equal in this respect?

Mr. KASSON. Except in the power to originate revenue bills, they are exactly equal. Now, does the gentleman deny the equal right of the Senate under the Constitution except in the origin of bills?

Mr. HOLMAN. I am compelled to go beyond that; else I should go back upon the record and history of this House.

Mr. KASSON. I think so, as regards this session.

Mr. HOLMAN. I should go back on the history of this House in the experience of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] who was one of the foremost of the gentlemen who asserted the right of this House as against the assumption of power by the Senate to build a whole revenue system on a single revenue measure which the House had sent over to that body for consideration. In the Forty-second Congress we most emphatically denied the power of the Senate to build up a revenue system on a single proposition in connection with the revenue which the House had sent to the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman surely recollects that when the Senate was democratic they passed several appropriation bills when the House was in a dead-lock; they originated appropriation bills, but they did not claim the right to originate revenue measures. The only question I desire to raise now is whether the gentleman from Indiana denies the right of the Senate to refuse to consent to a law fixing the number and the compensation of employés under the Government. Will he answer yes or no?

Mr. HOLMAN. Why, certainly not; but still the gentleman cannot say that the rights of the two bodies are equal as regards measures of revenue. I admit that in the practical results, inasmuch as the Senate must co-operate with the House in the passage of laws and inasmuch as the Senate may under certain limitations amend revenue measures from the House, for the practical purposes of legislation the two Houses must be equal.

Mr. KASSON. Allow me to ask this question: Suppose the House had passed a bill abolishing ninety-nine out of one hundred of the offices of the Government, which would practically abolish the Government itself; would he deny the right of the Senate to refuse to concur in that measure?

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not.

Mr. KASSON. That is the whole question.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly not; but the gentleman is submitting a proposition which is impossible in the nature of things.

Mr. KASSON. You have approached it very nearly.

Mr. FOSTER. Suppose they abolish one office and leave ninety-nine in the hundred.

Mr. HOLMAN. The gentleman ought not to put an impossible or improbable case. Sir, I remember the time when I heard gentlemen upon the other side of the House speak in different tones, and when a different spirit pervaded that side of the House than that which now pervades it. I heard gentlemen upon that side of the House with absolute admiration when as against the Senate that side of the House maintained every power that is given to the House by the Constitution in behalf of the people against the assumptions of the Senate.

Mr. KASSON. There has been no change of opinion or sentiment on that question on this side of the House.

Mr. WHITE. Will the gentleman from Indiana refer to the Constitution by sections, so that I may be enlightened as to its meaning?

Mr. HOLMAN. The strongest and most manly utterances I ever heard from the other side of the House were when an appeal was made in behalf of the right of the House, in behalf of the people, in behalf of retrenchment and reform against the solid hostility of the Senate to any retrenchment. Gentlemen upon the other side of the House at that day rose up to the occasion, and their speeches are on record in this Congress and are your most eloquent utterances of which the great party of which you are the representatives can now boast.

When the ground was first assumed as to the alteration of laws in an appropriation bill, it seemed to be at the outset a strong position, but a very distinguished Senator, whose name I am not permitted to mention, saw at the outset of this controversy over this bill the impossibility of standing upon the ground that the Senate could safely take the position that appropriations should be only made in conformity with the law, and that the House should not in an appropriation bill seek to change the law; and the reason was this: Take, for instance, a single Department of the Government, the Department of State. There is not an officer in that Department, except its head, who does not derive his existence from an appropriation bill. In 1855 what was known as the Hunter bill did not apply to the State Department at all, and, in that year, in an appropriation bill, the civil and diplomatic, as it was then termed, passed the 3d of March, 1855, a classification of clerks in the State Department was provided for and the number of officers provided for was twenty-four clerks with salaries amounting, including that of the head of the Department, to $46,000. The whole organization of the State Department was in an appropriation bill; and I find that in 1860, when the democratic office-holders were satisfied with the pay they received, although you on the other side at that time denounced that salary as too high, as excessive, and that they ought to be reduced, that they constituted too great a burden on the labor of the country, yet investigation shows that while in 1860 the number of employés in the State Department was thirty-four, the salaries amounting to $58,000, since that time, in appropriation bills, mark you, without one single, solitary instance of general legislation on the subject, the number of employés in the State Department was increased from thirty-four to ninety-two for the present year, and the amount of salaries from $58,000 to $123,480, as will appear from the following table:

And I take it that the duties of that Department at least have not been largely, if at all, increased since 1860.

Our foreign relations are not more extended to-day than they were sixteen years ago. Our commerce is not so extended; we have not so many sailors who are to receive the protection and care of our consuls and diplomatic representatives abroad.

The fact is the whole fabric of the State Department should have declined during the last sixteen years, and more especially since the termination of the war; but instead of that decline we find that the salaries in that Department stand now, as compared with 1860, as $123,480 to $58,000, and the number of employés as 92 to 34. This argument cuts both ways, or rather in one direction it cuts with double force, indicating first that the pretense that we are changing existing laws by provisions inserted in appropriation bills is entirely without foundation—that is, existing laws independent of appropriation bills. The whole fabric of the State Department, based on the act of 1855, has been built up on appropriation bills, and not a single officer of that Department, except the head of the Department himself, now holds office and receives his salary independent of appropriation bills.

Again, the rapid growth of the number of employés and the rapid increase of the salaries seem to challenge our attention, not of this side of the House alone or of the other side, but of the whole of Congress, as demanding retrenchment, and the reason why you cannot take the classification of clerks as it stood in 1860 is this——

Mr. KASSON. A question on that point before you get away from it.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me finish this statement; I am not leaving the point. Gentlemen will find that between the head of the Department of State and the chief clerk provided for by the act of 1855 there are now intervening no less than thirteen different officers, with salaries amounting to $24,000—intervening between the chief clerk, who then was next to the second officer of the Department, the Assistant Secretary of State.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman propose to leave out of consideration the growth of the country, the internal-revenue system, the great increase of taxation imposed by the war? Does the gentleman leave all that out of sight?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not leave it out of sight at all. On the contrary, I am confining my remarks to a single Department, and that Department one not affected by the internal revenue, not affected by the growth of the country, but only by the relations which our country sustains to the other nations of the world. I have selected that Department for the purpose of pointing out the extraordinary growth of clerks and salaries in a Department not affected by the development of our country or by the very remarkable changes caused by the operations of the late war.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman say there has been no increase of our commerce abroad, no increase in the number of consuls and diplomatic officers, no increase in the foreign relations of this Government since the beginning of the war? They have been very nearly doubled.

Mr. HOLMAN. What has been doubled?

Mr. KASSON. The number of questions and the amount of labor of the State Department since 1860.

Mr. HOLMAN. I think the gentleman is mistaken. What new questions of international law have arisen of late years? I admit that for the time the conference of the two great nations at Geneva——

Mr. KASSON. Exactly; the Alabama claims and other questions.

Mr. HOLMAN. That was but a momentary affair and has long since passed by. Our commerce has declined, as shown by the number of our vessels. The protection of the men sailing upon our vessels has come to be of less consequence than it was sixteen years ago. Sixteen years ago we were still the ship-builders of the world.

Mr. KASSON. Does not the gentleman see that it makes no difference whether the goods invoiced are shipped on foreign bottoms or our own, so far as our consular business is concerned?

Mr. HOLMAN. The purpose I had in view when I arose was simply to declare what I understood to be the attitude of this House. The attempt to place this House in even an apparently wrong position will certainly fail before the intelligent judgment of the country. We do not assume that we have any more power than the Senate of the United States. As the representatives of the people we have equal but no greater powers than Senators.

As to practical steps in legislation, our right is exactly equal, except that revenue measures, and the purposes to which the revenues are to be applied, and the purposes for which revenues are to be raised, are measures which must originate in this House. In the halls of legislation the two bodies stand upon the same high ground of constitutional right. And further than that the House is now willing to make every reasonable concession to secure the passage of the remaining appropriation bills. In regard to the bills that have been passed, there has been no reluctance on the part of the House to meet the Senate, as the House has met the Senate for a hundred years past.

Mr. FOSTER. Not quite so long as that.

Mr. HOLMAN. We are even now approaching the grand anniversary of this legislative assembly. De minimus non curat lex. The gentleman would scarcely take away from a figure of speech the little time that remains. During all these years the House has met the Senate in deliberation. A committee of free conference is appointed. That very term "free conference" implies the relations of the two bodies. The representatives of this House not only meet the members of the Senate on equal grounds of high public duty, but all the courtesies that belong to the deliberations of great legislative bodies, during the interruption of legislation upon our appropriation bills, have been observed in the past history of our Government.

I do not think the people of this country will be at all deceived as to the present condition of things. This House was elected—not this side alone, but the other side also—this House of Representatives was elected on high pledges of retrenchment in the expenditures of the Government to the end that purity may be restored in the administration of our affairs.

We came here upon that pledge. Do gentlemen want us to back down upon that? Will they do it themselves? Will gentlemen on that side consent that no earnest effort shall be made to fulfill this pledge to the letter? We will insist upon its fulfillment.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman know that both sides are insisting? The Senate has agreed to $22,000,000 of reduction.

Mr. RANDALL. They could have agreed to $40,000,000 if they had had the disposition.

Mr. HOLMAN. The judgment of the country is that the expenditures of the Government for the present fiscal year, in comparison with the last, should be largely reduced.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman concede that the appropriations made by the House bill were in some cases too much reduced?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have already said in the presence of the gentleman, and I will make the statement here if he desires it, that as to the Surgeon-General's Office I think there should be a slight increase of clerical force. Does the gentleman refer to that?

Mr. FOSTER. I have asked the gentleman the question whether he does not agree that the House bill in some cases reduced too much.

Mr. HOLMAN. Well, I mention that case.

Mr. FOSTER. Are there not others?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not remember any other.

Mr. FOSTER. I would ask the gentleman particularly about the Pension Office?

Mr. HOLMAN. In reply to that I would say that, if there is any branch of this Government where the vigilance of those controlling public affairs is important in order to secure promptness, it is in that Pension Bureau. While the number of cases to be acted on has been enormously reduced, the clerical force has been immensely increased; yet my constituents tell me, and such is my own experience, that frequently weeks elapse before citizens applying for pensions can even receive information touching their claims.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. HOLMAN. I do not understand that an increase of force is required there. What is required is increased application to public duty; nothing else.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman say that the House bill did not make too great a reduction in the Pension Office?

Mr. HOLMAN. I have said to the gentleman that an increased force is not required there. Increased vigilance on the part of the head of that Bureau is demanded in behalf of every pensioner in the country.

Mr. FOSTER. But do you not cut down the force too much?

Mr. HOLMAN. In that Bureau the force is larger in proportion to the duties to be performed than perhaps in any other under the Government, yet the citizen applying for a pension for wounds received in battle applies in vain for information even.

Mr. FOSTER. And notwithstanding that, the House reduced the force in that Bureau 25 per cent., so that the pensioners will have to wait still longer. Tell that to your constituents.

Mr. HOLMAN. In the Surgeon-General's Office I admit the force ought to be somewhat increased. I have already stated that in the presence of the gentleman from Ohio.

The only object I had in view in these remarks is fully accomplished. I claim that it is the duty of this House, as the representatives of the people, to insist sincerely and earnestly upon every retrenchment demanded in the public service. This is its duty as a House dealing with that august body the Senate, representing the States of this Union.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I would like to ask the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] one question.

Mr. RANDALL. How much of my hour remains?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Eight minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I yield five minutes to the gentleman from New York, [Mr. COX.]

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I wish to ask the gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. COX. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman from New York will allow me to answer the question of the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. COX. Very well.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Does not the gentleman from Indiana know that the post-office appropriation bill as it passed the House absolutely increased the salaries of over twenty-five thousand postmasters in the United States, and as finally passed upon the report of the conference committee absolutely increases the salaries of over thirty thousand postmasters?

Mr. HOLMAN. The salaries at the small post-offices are increased.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. And it does not decrease the pay of over one hundred postmasters in the whole country.

Mr. HOLMAN. I am very glad to hear the gentleman talk so cheerfully. [Laughter.] He was rather disheartened yesterday. I am glad to find him in a different mood to-day.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Yesterday, when the fact was pertinent, you refused to allow me to state it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York is entitled to the floor.

Mr. HOLMAN. I hope the gentleman will allow me to complete my answer to the question of the gentleman from Illinois. The compensation at the smaller post-offices is slightly increased under the bill as passed.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Over thirty thousand postmasters have their salaries increased by the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. But in its general effect the bill makes a large reduction in salaries, amounting, as we understand, to $700,000 a year.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to yield to any gentleman, for my time has been cut short. I notice that recently there have been admissions by gentlemen on the other side that at least $30,000,000 might well be saved over last year by our action this session. That means $30,000,000 for this one year. Good. Now why did you not thus commence to save as soon as the war closed? If $30,000,000 can be saved this year, $30,000,000 could have been saved every year since the end of the war; and somebody—I think I have him in my eye [laughter]—is responsible for $300,000,000 of excess and extravagance.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois, rose.

Mr. COX. I cannot allow the gentleman to interrupt me. I understand him to make a reference to the life-saving service. It has not been hurt one dollar.

I do not propose to be interrupted again by gentlemen who are so prompt to laugh in this House at all efforts at economy. Perhaps they may laugh differently in their several districts next November.

This House is not in the same condition as the Senate on money bills. Any student of our Constitution can tell you that. Any one who will take Judge Story and go back with him to the British constitution for our guidance; any one who will consider the revenue proposition Franklin made in the constitutional convention after coming from England, fixing that peculiar clause which gives us superiority over the Senate upon "money bills," will not duck down to the Senate as before a golden calf for our worship. [Laughter.]

The Senate is a permanent body. It is more permanent than the House. It is not permanent for life, as the House of Peers, but it is permanent in the sense that it is only renewed once in six years.

As Judge Story well said, the House is nearer the people. They have local information. All revenue bills, which, by English construction, mean "all money bills," originate here; and, sir, if we have not the legal and constitutional, we have the moral superiority over the Senate in this relation, and should not defer to the Senate.

How is it in England? There the peers only "assent" to the bills of the Commons. It is a perfunctory arrangement only. They are one of the estates, and are required only as a form. Doctor Franklin, when he brought the English system to our shores, when he comprehended the great question of taxation and representation as affecting the colonies, made the clause in the Constitution according to the English theory. We should stand by it.

Mr. Speaker, I have seen two Congresses battle here bravely against the Senate. They put provisos to "money bills." One in 1855 was the famous Kansas proviso, which cut off the Army in order to kill those barbarous southern codes as well as slavery itself. The House stood by it. It defied a democratic Senate, and went home without the appropriation.

Again in 1865 a republican House was here. Questions about unlawful arrests and lettres de cachet came up. Who was the champion of habeas corpus and personal liberty then? Henry Winter Davis.

Mr. KASSON. Who was against him?

Mr. COX. I do not know how the gentleman stood. I do not think he was here then. Henry Winter Davis from about the quarter of the House where the gentleman from Iowa now sits rose up and moved an amendment to an appropriation bill, demanding public liberty and personal freedom, habeas corpus, release of those illegally tried and bound, and breaking down all illegal tribunals. He was fought by Thaddeus Stevens and a great many members on that side of the House. Points of order were made, but a republican Speaker ruled his proviso in order. We fought here behind him, your lamented eloquent republican leader, for many days and nights until disagreement was inexorably fixed by both Houses; and in the interest of personal liberty the House would not trade off liberty for money!

English history and our history are full of illustrations of the popular and parliamentary power against exactions and tyranny.

Mr. HUBBELL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. HUBBELL. The gentleman from New York is reported as saying at Saint Louis, "You of the Southern States need no Army until after November, and so far as the Indian wars were concerned, all we had to do was to turn the boys on our frontier loose and they would take care of the Indians." I wish to know whether he stands by that here to-day.

Mr. COX. I do not want to bring Saint Louis here, or anything but that which concerns us in the question as to the power and rights of the House; but what I meant to say there, and what I did say, was this, that we could well afford until after the election—you understand me, my honorable friends of the South—we can very well afford until after the election to keep the Army from the throats of the southern people.

Mr. RUSK. But you did not say that.

Mr. COX. Do you understand what is meant?

Mr. HUBBELL. Will the gentleman be kind enough to explain what he meant.

Mr. COX. I said further, that if you should turn loose the border men you could put down these Indian-contractors' wars a great deal sooner, cheaper, and better.

Mr. HUBBELL. I beg the gentleman's pardon——

Mr. COX. I will not be interrupted.

Mr. HUBBELL. But what I wish the gentleman to explain is——

Mr. COX. I will not be interrupted.

Mr. HUBBELL kept on addressing the House, but could not be heard, as the Speaker pro tempore constantly beat his gavel, calling him to order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan is out of order, and will take his seat.

Mr. COX. When the gentleman asked me to yield to him for a question I courteously gave him the right to ask his question, and yielding to him I did not expect—but what he was a gentleman.

Mr. HUBBELL. You are not able to tell whether I am or not.

Mr. COX. The House sees it. When I referred to the Indian business I had in mind discussions here. I know these contractors' wars will not put down the Indian troubles. I have said so again and again here, and, if the telegraphic rumors as to the Custer massacre be true, to-day we have another illustration that the insane policy of expending large sums of money for the Army is not the true policy of Indian retrenchment.

I stand here, sir, for retrenchment as the men in the old parliamentary days of England stood by their privilege. They would not grant supplies until retrenchment, liberty, and reform were guaranteed. You remember the old song during the trial of the bishops in South England:

> And shall Trelawney die?
> And shall Trelawney die?
> Then forty thousand Cornish men
> Will know the reason why.

I almost quote it by saying:

> And shall retrenchment die?
> And shall retrenchment die?
> Then forty million honest men
> Will know the reason why.

[Great laughter and applause.]

Mr. RANDALL. How much of my time have I left?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the time will be extended further.

Mr. PAGE. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to let the time be extended.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask for a vote. I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PAGE. What is the first question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is on agreeing to the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the gentleman from Ohio be allowed five minutes by unanimous consent.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 75.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is a second to the previous question.

Mr. PAGE. No; I demand tellers.

Mr. MILLIKEN. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be allowed five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. I am urging this bill at the personal request of the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PAGE. Never mind the Senator from Maine; the House has some rights here.

Mr. RANDALL. I am carrying out the promise I made to the Senator from Maine.

Mr. PAGE. But this House has some rights.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Maine made a personal request to me that I would hurry this bill back to the Senate, and I am trying to do so in the interest of the public business.

Mr. PAGE. Yielding five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio will not make much difference.

Mr. FOSTER. It will save time if the gentleman will yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust my friend will allow five minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not object to yielding five minutes to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RUSK. No; he wants ten minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I will pledge the gentleman that it will not delay the passage of this bill as much as by refusing to yield.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Order must be preserved, and gentlemen will resume their seats. Does the gentleman withdraw his demand for the previous question?

Mr. RANDALL. No; I do not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will appoint the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] and the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] as tellers.

Mr. SPRINGER. Tellers were not ordered; a quorum voted.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not matter to me whether the bill stays here all day.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 3.

Mr. KASSON. There is no quorum.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move there be a call of the House.

Mr. PAGE. I move the House adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House refuses to adjourn.

Mr. PAGE. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. RANDALL. Let them go on filibustering.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. SPRINGER. I move there be a call of the House.

The motion was disagreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I move the House adjourn, as there is no quorum voting.

The House refused to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I rise to address the House on the question now pending. The previous question has not been called, and I am in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House is dividing on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. GARFIELD. But it has not been seconded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot have the floor except by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARFIELD. Very well; I am very comfortable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There is nothing in order except the motion for a call of the House, the last motion being the motion to adjourn.

Mr. GARFIELD. I wish to say, by unanimous consent, there is no disposition to delay, but when a gentleman rises and makes a decided attack upon the late chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, pointing directly to him, I have never before known the ordinary sense of fair play shut off a brief reply. That is all I ask.

Mr. RANDALL. When this subject was before the House the other day, nearly all the time was consumed by gentlemen on the other side.

Mr. GARFIELD. But there was no personal attack like that which has transpired to-day.

Mr. RANDALL. I am hastening this bill at the suggestion of the Senate.

Mr. COX. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will be allowed to go on, if I am allowed to answer him.

Mr. GARFIELD. That is all I ask.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I propose, if these gentlemen want to fight it out, to give them five minutes on each side.

Mr. GARFIELD. I want ten minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. Very well; I am willing to yield ten minutes to each one of these gentlemen, but I do not want to be held responsible for delaying the appropriation bills.

Mr. HALE. That is fair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has demanded the previous question. By common consent, ten minutes is allowed to the gentleman from Ohio and ten minutes to the gentleman from New York to reply.

Mr. COX. I do not think I will require that time.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman has had ten minutes already.

Mr. GARFIELD. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] closed with a direct charge upon the management of appropriations by this House in recent years, stating that we had not made reduction of expenditure, and wanting to know why we had not done it; why we had delayed until these honest men came into power? This is the charge to which I rise to respond. I would like to know where the gentleman has been during these last ten years. I would like to know what he has read, and what he has heard, and what he has remembered of what he has read and heard that justifies him in making a statement like that on his responsibility and sending it out to the country. Does the gentleman not know that in the year 1865 the expenditures of this Government were twelve hundred and ninety-seven and one-half millions? And why were they twelve hundred and ninety-seven and one-half millions? Because eleven States, and all the assistance that the eleven States could get from those that would not help prevent the rebellion, piled up the enormous debt of three and a half billions of dollars for the faithful people of this country to pay. That load heaped upon the shoulders of the laboring-people of this country an honest nation felt bound to pay. Did he and his associates help prevent it? Or rather did not all who joined him in political opinions help pile up the debt which the nation was compelled to pay? Let the responsibility for these grievous expenditures rest where the events of our history have placed it.

I say twelve hundred and ninety-seven and a half millions were paid over the national counter in 1865. Of course it was an extraordinary amount. But in 1866, the year following the war, five hundred and twenty millions were paid out of the national Treasury to meet the necessary expenditures of the war and the Government. What since? We have steadily reduced expenditures in every year of the last ten, except two, in which there was a slight increase, from five hundred and twenty millions in 1866 down to two hundred and sixty-three millions in 1876, just closed; so that in the fiscal year that closed last week the expenditure was one thousand and thirty-four millions less than in the year 1865, and two hundred and fifty-three millions less than the expenditures for the year 1866. There has been a steady, constant reduction toward the level of peace, and the gentleman knows it if he is not party-blind to every fact in his country's history.

Let him turn to official analysis made at the Treasury of the total appropriations made by Congress at its last three sessions, and he will find that the total appropriations in the annual bills for 1874 were $172,000,000, and for 1873 were $155,000,000, and for 1876 were $147,000,000, a reduction in actual appropriations of more than $25,000,000 in three years. No man who is familiar with the subject will deny this.

The gentleman knows that for the last three years we have been fighting a constant battle in favor of the reduction of expenditures, and his colleagues know it. And he knows, moreover, that when we were overwhelmed by propositions to enlarge public buildings and to begin great expenditures for the construction of new ones, he was among the foremost of New York Representatives to plunge us into the expense of a great post-office building in his own city—a good work, a work that ought to have been done, perhaps—but he was the foremost in pressing it upon the House, as well as the public building at Albany, for the benefit of his people. And when, two years ago, the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, instructed by the committee, attempted to restrict the great expenditures on public buildings, a joining of forces on his side of the House with many on this side prevented it. It comes, then, with an ill-grace from him to rise up in his place and taunt us with having made no more reductions than we have made, and denying even those we did make.

Now, Mr. Speaker, when the gentleman goes away to a distant, turbulent, stormy, popular assembly, and talks about sixty-four millions of reduction by his party in this House below the estimates, and thirty-nine millions of reduction below last year, does he know whereof he affirms? Does he not know that four millions of that sum have no right to be named as reduction, because it is a re-appropriation of unexpended balances that does not appear in the footing, but is as really an appropriation as though it were now made for the first time? Does he know that this House left out $2,000,000 required to pay the judgments of our Court of Claims and of the Supreme Court of the United States, and that if they mean to leave it out they mean to repudiate the solemn obligation of the Government? And he calls that a reduction of expenses! Here is a great public building in progress of construction for which the estimates for next year are $1,300,000, to save the precious records of the War and Navy Departments. The House appropriates but $200,000, I believe, and calls that a saving a million! Let the Navy and the War Departments burn, and where will the saving and the responsibility appear? If that is what the gentleman calls saving and if he goes out before the country and proclaims that as their honest saving, the country will know it and will understand the object and purpose of a pretense.

And what does the gentleman mean when he goes to a great stormy popular convention and says the Army can be dispensed with until November next and the pioneers can get along with the Indians alone? The bloody answer will come as it came yesterday, when hundreds of our soldiers fell down in death, with Custer at their head, because we have not an adequate army to restrain the savages of the West.

Mr. RANDALL. Why are you using the Army in the Southern States instead of sending them to the frontier?

Mr. GARFIELD. While these scenes are transpiring, the gentlemen on the other side are proposing still further to cripple our gallant little Army, break its spirit, and make it inefficient for the protection of our frontier. And all that, Mr. Speaker, because these gentlemen are preparing for an election; and when it is over they will come back to this place and make up by deficiency appropriations what they now refuse to provide for the manifest necessities of the public service.

They know that I will join them, notwithstanding their party zeal, in all honorable measures to reduce expenditures where reduction is possible. I have complimented them for all their reasonable reduction, because I believe they can reduce to the extent of fifteen or eighteen millions below the figures of last year. Now to-day we are informed that the Senate agrees to go to that extent and more; that the Senate expresses its willingness to go to twenty millions of reduction, which is all that the imperative necessities of this Government will permit; and yet these gentlemen are seeking to make the impression upon the country that they are the honest men, and that they are saving for the honest, hard-working people, when in fact they are attempting to delude the people by a pretense and a sham when they claim that they can reduce the necessary expenditures by the sum of $39,000,000.

Now, I happen to know that a large number of the very best and most thoughtful gentlemen on that side of the House do not approve of this policy. They do not indorse your conduct in that regard, but they submit to it for the sake of peace. They are men who agree with you in your political doctrines, but desire at the same time to discharge their duty as loyal representatives of the people; and you will find it out after the election, if not before.

Now, when the gentleman from New York comes here and undertakes to blacken the reputation of a worthy body of which he has long been a member, when he undertakes to cast discredit on men whom he knows have worked faithfully in the line of retrenchment, he must consent to be told that his statements are unfounded in fact and unworthy of this place.

Mr. COX. I do not object to being told anything by the gentleman. When I hold the gentleman from Ohio responsible for the expenditures of the last four years, I did it because he had been chairman of the Committee on Appropriations during the past two Congresses. Does the gentleman not know how he has been increasing the expenditures of the Government, since he has had charge of them, in the aggregate? No little refinement on details can hide the facts from the country. I do not, sir, understand the sensibility of the gentleman. Because I chose to fix the responsibility where it belongs, how does it blacken the gentleman? Men are not blackened on account of mere fiscal mistakes. Because men commit a rape on a cloud of statistics it does not follow that they are corrupt. It only shows that they are not statesmen. Men are blackened otherwise. In case they have failed to recognize the needs of a suffering and paralyzed country they are regarded not as bad, but weak; and therefore when the gentleman says that he has been engaged in cutting down expenditures, I fix the responsibility upon him in that respect. In the year 1872 the expenditures were about $153,000,000. Was that reduced then under the auspices of the gentleman? In 1873 the expenditures ran up to $180,000,000. In 1874—I still speak of the time of the gentleman's administration of economy—how was it? The expenses amounted to over $194,000,000. Am I not correct? Did it not require after such a record a good deal of audacity for the gentleman to call me to account for voting appropriations which I never voted for public buildings? I did not lead off in favor of the appropriation for the post-office in New York; but let that go.

Mr. GARFIELD. Your statement is not a correct one, and the chairman of your committee will tell you so.

Mr. COX. The chairman of the committee tells me that I am correct. I have examined the record. I am glad to see that the gentleman talks now "with bated breath and whispering humbleness." Here is the report on finance, page 577, Forty-fourth Congress, first session, Executive Document No. 2. It is all regularly from the Treasury, and proposes to give us the statement of expenditures—civil list, miscellaneous, military service, pensions, Indian, naval, &c., and in one column, when the gentleman began his appropriations, it has these net figures:

Perhaps the gentleman will take some other opportunity to explain this over again. But did he not say the other day that we could save this year $15,000,000 or $18,000,000? Who was it on the other side of the House who said we could save $30,000,000? Ah, it was the distinguished financier from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] who is sitting by his colleague [Mr. GARFIELD] now to prompt him. It was he who said that we ought to save $30,000,000 this year. Now, this is quite a difference between these two gentlemen. Is it $18,000,000 or $30,000,000? Which one of them is right? One or the other or both must be wrong; and yet they must be in a right direction. Keep along, gentlemen, and you will find out the truth. I did state at Saint Louis that we had reduced the estimates submitted by your administration $64,000,000, and the appropriations over last year nearly $40,000,000. I am thus instructed by gentlemen here who know all about it; and it will go to the honest men of Ashtabula and Fostoria, Ohio. [Laughter.]

I suppose the gentleman from Ohio wants to make these "eleven" southern States a scape-goat to carry into the wilderness the sins of the republican party. Have they not sacrificed enough? Must they again sacrifice for their ten years of radical suffering? There has been a time of profound peace since the treaty was made at Appomattox Court House. All the disturbances that have existed since that time in these States have resulted because of wrongful and vengeful interference with the self-government of the States and people.

You talk about the Army; why, a portion of it, its generals at least, are rollicking now at the Centennial in Philadelphia while Custer falls in the wilderness. You say that we have not troops enough and that this House cuts them off. Where are the 25,000, not yet diminished by our legislation, who constitute our Army? Three thousand of them and more are in the States of Mississippi and Louisiana, and in other Southern States. What are they doing there? There is no revolt there, no rebellion, no election yet. And only two thousand men are sent out to fight the wild Sioux Indians. I cannot understand what the gentleman means when he says that the Army needs to be increased. It has not been decreased as yet. Does he want more troops in the South than there are there now; I mean outside of the Texas border? Does he want still to punish these "eleven States?" If the purpose is to carry the elections in that forceful way, then for another reason forty millions of people will understand the "why."

I have already taken, sir, more time than I intended. I did not intend to be drawn into this last debate; but the gentleman made it personal because I had fixed the responsibility of this increase and large expenditure of money since the war. Suppose, according to his own idea, that we can save fifteen or eighteen million of dollars this year, or double that amount, according to his colleague, [Mr. FOSTER;] then during the last ten or eleven years since the war the republicans are responsible for the excess of expenditures.

We know that all through our civil administration there has been a riot of prodigality, not to speak of a system of badness, unearthed by our committees and which the people will stigmatize. In the name of purity and reform, I trust in them, next after God, for our salvation. Our hope is in their ballots to be given in November next for the election of an honest man, now governor of the State of New York, Samuel J. Tilden! [Applause and laughter on the floor and in the galleries.]

Mr. RANDALL. I want to answer a statement made by the gentlemen from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] as to the Army; I only want a minute or two.

Mr. COX. I will yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL.]

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GARFIELD] has said that this House attempted to cripple the Army. I desire to state what this House has done in that respect. The gentleman from Ohio when he was chairman of the Committee on Appropriations year before last failed to appropriate enough to pay the Army by $500,000. Last year he failed to appropriate money enough to pay the Army by $900,000, arbitrarily cut off, as I am informed. We have supplied both these deficiencies.

And more, the bill which the House passed in reference to the Army makes it more efficient. It increases the cavalry force of the Army by twenty-three hundred men, to be used on the frontier, and provides that the reduction of the Army shall be only in the infantry and artillery, which are of no use comparatively for the protection of the frontiers and our border settlers. Therefore, this House has not only paid the Army that to which they were entitled at the hands of the gentleman from Ohio for two years, but we have augmented that branch of the Army which alone can be used to defend General Custer and those brave men who on yesterday fell in behalf of the border pioneers. So much for his accusation against this House in connection with the Army. The action of the Committee on Appropriations, except in one or two particulars, has met the approbation of all the officers of the Army.

Mr. GARFIELD. Allow me to say that we appropriated last year exactly what was asked for for the pay of the Army, and the failure, if there was any, was in the estimates.

Mr. RANDALL. No matter what you did. I am apprised by the Pay Department that the $900,000 was arbitrarily cut off, and no reason given for it. At all events, the fact stands forth that the money was not given to the Army, and for nearly a year they had to go without two weeks of their pay, and would have gone for a month this year without appropriations to pay them but for the action of this House.

Mr. FOSTER. I would like to have the gentleman tell the House what kind of appropriation was made to pay that deficiency?

Mr. RANDALL. I will tell you. The Paymaster-General did not know how to pay. I went up there and delved among their books and found that a year or two ago they had appropriated too much for other items. We re-appropriated that amount for the pay of the Army, which for two years you had neglected to appropriate an adequate amount for. I now call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question was ordered.

The question was upon the motion of Mr. RANDALL that the House further insist upon its disagreements to the amendments of the Senate to the legislative appropriation bill and ask a further conference.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore appointed as the conferees on the part of the House Mr. RANDALL, Mr. MORRISON, and Mr. KASSON.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I must now resume the floor.

Mr. RANDALL. I would like to have the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER,] a member of the Committee on Appropriations, report two bills of the Senate, both of which are worthy charities, and which I think will cause no debate.

Mr. LAWRENCE, of Ohio. I will yield for that purpose.

JOHN T. KING AND L. B. CUTLER.

Mr. FOSTER. By direction of the Committee on Appropriations I report back, with an amendment, the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler.

The preamble recites that John T. King, lately employed as a carpenter and cabinet-maker about the Capitol, while in the discharge of his duties, was killed by an explosion of gas in the closet under the eastern stairway of the Senate, leaving a wife, three children, two grandchildren, and a mother-in-law without any means of support; and that L. B. Cutler, principal assistant in the folding-room of the Senate, was so injured, at the same time and under the same circumstances, as to be disabled for life, having a wife without means of support, and a mother to whose support he has partly contributed.

The bill therefore appropriates the sum of $3,000 for the aid and support of the family of the late John T. King, and the further sum of $3,000 for the aid and support of L. B. Cutler, to be paid to the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the above-mentioned purposes, who may, at his discretion, pay the same to the respective parties in annual installments, or all in one payment, or invest the same for their benefit, as he may think most expedient; provided that a further sum equal to the amount of the previous regular compensation of King and Cutler from the 19th of May to the 30th of June, inclusive, is appropriated, to be expended immediately by the Secretary of the Interior in the manner above stated.

The amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out the proviso of the bill.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be read a third time; and it was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REMOVAL OF REMAINS OF HON. E. RUMSEY WING.

Mr. FOSTER also, by unanimous consent, reported back from the Committee on Appropriations, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Owensborough, Kentucky.

The bill was read. It appropriates for the purpose named in the title $1,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be used under the direction of the Secretary of State.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. FOSTER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, requested the House to return to the Senate the bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia.

IMMIGRATION.

Mr. COX. I beg to say that the commissioners of emigration of the State of New York are here, and desire a conference with the Committee on Commerce to-morrow on the question of immigration. The Supreme Court of the United States has recently decided that all the State legislation by which this subject has heretofore been regulated is unconstitutional and void. There is some urgency, therefore, that Congress shall provide the needed legislation on the subject. I therefore ask unanimous consent to present the memorial of the commissioners of emigration, to be printed in the RECORD and referred to the Committee on Commerce; and also to introduce a bill on the subject, to be referred to the same committee.

There being no objection,

Mr. COX presented the following memorial; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed in the RECORD:

Memorial of the commissioners of emigration of the State of New York.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The commissioners of emigration of the State of New York, in obedience to the instructions contained in the following resolution of its Legislature—

"Resolved, (if the Assembly concur,) That the commissioners of emigration are hereby instructed to call the attention of the Congress of the United States to the present condition of the emigration laws, resulting from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring the State laws on that subject unconstitutional and void, and to impress upon Congress the necessity for speedy national legislation in regard thereto, and the said commissioners take such steps as in their judgment may be proper to secure such legislation"— offer for the consideration of your honorable bodies the following statements and statistics:

From the month of May, 1847, up to the 20th day of March, 1876, the legislation of this State provided in substance that the captain, consignee, or owner of every vessel arriving at the port of New York from a foreign country, having on board as passengers immigrants or persons not citizens of the United States destined for the city of New York, should give a bond to the people of the State in the penal sum of $300 for each of such passengers, conditioned to indemnify every city, town, and county in the State against any charge or expense on account of the passenger named in the bond within five years from arrival. The parties interested in the vessel had, however, accorded to them by the same legislation the right to commute for this bond by paying a certain sum (which varied at different periods, the highest being $2.50 and the lowest $1.50) to the commissioners of emigration, whose duty it was made to pay out of this commutation fund the expenses which any city, town, or county of this State might incur for any alien passenger who might have arrived at the port of New York within the previous five years. The commissioners were also empowered to purchase land and erect whatever buildings the exigencies of immigration might demonstrate to be necessary for the care, support, and protection of such immigrants within the same period.

In the year 1847 the commissioners begun and for many years after continued to purchase lands on Ward's Island and to erect buildings thereon for the care and treatment of the sick and diseased and the support and maintenance of the necessitous among such immigrants.

These lands and buildings were purchased, erected, and have been and continue to be used exclusively for immigrants who have paid commutation-money and have arrived at the port of New York within five years from the date when they require and seek care or support from the public authorities.

The commissioners have also leased from the city of New York and occupied since the year 1855 the wharf and the made land adjoining the Battery in said city known as Castle Garden, and have inclosed it for the purpose of a landing depot for immigrants, whereby they have been enabled to afford protection to them against the frauds and depredations of emigrant-runners and other marauders who had combined to defraud and pillage the simple and unsuspicious strangers of whom the enormous mass of immigration to this country has been chiefly composed.

The following is briefly the mode of proceeding and operations at Castle Garden: After examination of their luggage on shipboard by the customs officers, the immigrants are transferred to this landing depot, where they are received by officers of the commission, who enter in registers kept for the purpose all necessary particulars for their future identification. The names of such as have money, letters, or friends awaiting them are called out and they are put into immediate possession of their property or committed to their friends whose credentials have first been properly scrutinized. Such as desire can find clerks at hand to write letters for them in any European language, and a telegraph operator within the depot to forward dispatches. Here, also, the main trunk lines of railway have offices, at which the immigrant can buy tickets and have his luggage weighed and checked; brokers are admitted (under restrictions which make fraud impossible) to exchange the foreign coin or paper of immigrants; a restaurant supplies them with plain food at moderate prices; a physician is in attendance for the sick; a temporary hospital ready to receive them until they can be conveyed to Ward's Island; those in search of employment are furnished it at the labor bureau connected with the establishment; such as desire to start at once for their destination are sent to the railway or steamboat, while any who may choose to remain in the city are referred to boarding-house keepers admitted to the depot, whose charges are regulated under special license, and whose houses are kept under constant and rigid supervision by the commission.

These services are rendered without any fee or compensation whatever to the commissioners.

The experience of the commissioners demonstrated the fact at an early day that a large percentage of the immigrants would either on their arrival or within the prescribed five years become chargeable to them as sick and diseased or as unable to support themselves. Under the influence of this fact the lands and buildings before mentioned were purchased and erected.

The establishment of Ward's Island, a beautiful and salubrious island in the East River to the north of Hell Gate, where sick and destitute immigrants are cared for until able to proceed to their destination, embraces over one hundred and twenty acres of land, whereon have been erected by the commissioners hospitals and refuge buildings, chapels, a school-house, and workshops of various sorts, in all about forty separate edifices, costing upward of $1,000,000. The main hospital has accommodation for five hundred patients, and is admitted to be, in plan and internal arrangements, one of the finest in the world.

The following statistics will show your honorable bodies the extent and importance of the services rendered by this State commission since its organization:

Number of alien immigrants arrived at the port of New York from May 5, 1847, to December 31, 1875, for whom commutation money was paid, 5,532,808.

Of which number the commissioners of emigration provided and cared for out of the emigrant fund for a greater or less period during the five years subsequent to arrival 1,717,838, as follows:

Number treated and cared for in the institutions of the commissioners of emigration, 547,209.

Number supplied temporarily with board and lodging and money relief in the city of New York, 485,669.

Number provided with employment through the labor bureau at Castle Garden, 400,187.

Number forwarded from Castle Garden to destination in United States and returned to Europe at their own request, 58,122.

Number relieved and provided for in various counties and institutions of this State at the expense of the commissioners of emigration, 226,651.

Many immigrants who on arrival have passed out of the State of New York to other States, possessed of strength and money, and who through various causes had suffered or lost both, soon after have been returned to this State and become a charge on this commission, and have been not only cared for in its institutions, but many on request have been returned at its expense to their native land. And in numerous cases immigrants destined for other States who have arrived here sick have been cured in the hospitals of the commission, and then dispatched to their destination to enrich other parts and communities of this country with their money, capital, and labor value unimpaired.

Ever since the tide of emigration first set strongly toward the United States the city of New York has been its chosen gate-way. Statistics show that of the immense European emigration the benefits are shared by many of the old and by all the new States, while the disadvantages have been principally borne by those on the Atlantic. To the West for the most part go the strong and vigorous immigrants, who become the bone and sinew of the agricultural population. The poorer, weaker, and less enterprising remain behind at or near their port of arrival. Whatever burden is imminent from the indolence of this latter class, and whatever danger is threatened from their diseases, the sea-port States must first encounter. It would seem, then, that the expensive and elaborate provision made for these exigencies, gradually perfected through many years, ought not to be cast aside and lost, but should be maintained.

The beneficent operations of this commission in the protection it has extended, the information it has imparted, the care it has exercised, and the support it has afforded to immigrants became by various means and through numerous channels well known many years ago throughout Europe. Some of the greatest of the impediments to leaving birth-place and friends to seek a new home in a foreign country, thousands of miles away, to wit, the uncertainties surrounding arrival, the dangers or apprehensions about the journey to the point of destination, increased a hundred-fold by ignorance in many cases of the language and in nearly all of the geography of the country, were thus removed, and immigration thereby encouraged and greatly increased. Indeed it has become a common fact that under and supported by the influence of this knowledge of the action and scope of the authority of the commissioners of emigration tens and hundreds of thousands of immigrants have disembarked at Castle Garden with no more anxiety or apprehension concerning themselves, their property, or their journey than the cabin passengers by the same vessels.

In January last the question of the validity of the statutes of this State, which required the bond and permitted the commutation of it, as stated in the early part of this communication, was brought up for argument and decision in the Supreme Court of the United States, and after elaborate argument and long consideration by the justices of this court these laws were in March last adjudged unconstitutional and void.

This adverse decision terminated at once the contributions to the fund by which the commissioners had been enabled to discharge the humane duties for which they were constituted, and in May last their available means became exhausted. The Legislature, influenced by the pledge implied in the receipt by its officers of the commutation money in former years that the immigrants on whose account it had been paid should receive its protection, care, and support, when needed, for five years from their arrival, appropriated, after this decision had been received and acted upon by the ship-owners, a sufficient sum from the State treasury whereby the commissioners will be able to redeem its faith for the year ending the 1st day of May, 1877. No provision, however, has been made for immigrants arriving subsequent to the promulgation of the judgment of the Supreme Court.

Miller, justice, delivering the opinion of the court, says in regard to the legislation of this State under consideration: "We are of opinion that this whole subject has been confided to Congress by the Constitution; that Congress can more appropriately and with more acceptance exercise it than any other body known to our law, State or national; that by providing a system of laws in these matters, applicable to all ports and to all vessels, a serious question, which has long been matter of contest and complaint, may be effectually and satisfactorily settled."

This decision affects not only the State of New York, but all other Atlantic States, and throws their ports wide open and leaves them unprotected against the introduction and subjects their people to the expenses of immigrants who at the time of their disembarkation may be sick, diseased, disabled, or who, before they leave the State in which they may have arrived, become from any cause a public charge. It also removes from the interior States, to which any of these immigrants may have gone, the right to return them, when necessitous, to the port or State of arrival. The reason which justified such return consisted in the receipt of commutation money and the pledge implied thereby. It has now been swept away by this decision and ceases to exist.

The entire country is therefore interested in this subject and in need of national legislation in regard to it.

Under these circumstances the commissioners of emigration of this State have had correspondence with the boards of charities or other proper officials of other States as to the principle and form of a law to meet the changed condition and present exigencies of the immigrant question. The result of this consultation has been a bill accompanying this communication, which is submitted for the consideration of your honorable bodies.

The lands and buildings above mentioned, on Ward's Island, and the landing depot at Castle Garden, are still in use, the former for immigrants who have arrived within five years previous to the decision of the supreme court, and for orders account of whom commutation money has been paid, and the latter for all arriving immigrants. They may be utilized in the future as they have been in the past, if the means to maintain them be provided. This can be done through the vessels bringing immigrants to the United States by Congress alone.

The experience of twenty-nine years with immigrants of all classes, conditions, and countries has matured a system which is in successful operation at this port. It is operated by officers, physicians, clerks, and other employés who have been engaged for years in the service, and are familiar with all its intricacies, peculiarities, and requirements, and if it be permissible here to speak favorably of an establishment instituted and carried on by these commissioners and their eminent predecessors, it seems to them that it would be of incalculable advantage to the immigrants hereafter arriving at the port of New York to maintain for them the arrangement which benevolence at first suggested, great intelligence organized, and much experience has matured, and that those of the United States to which the tide of immigration flows will reciprocally with the port States be the gainers by the provisions made by the latter for the receipt and treatment of sick or diseased immigrants on their arrival, and the establishments existing to secure them against frauds and depredations, or to maintain them if they come to require public aid or support.

Board of commissioners of emigration of the State of New York:

GEO. I. FORREST,
President.
HENRY A. HURLBUT.
GEORGE STARR.
DANIEL MAUJER.
GEORGE W. QUINTARD.
W. H. WICKHAM,
Mayor of the city of New York.
JAMES LYNCH,
President of the Irish Emigrant Society.
FREDERICK SCHACK,
President of the German Society.

NEW YORK, June 28, 1876.

Mr. COX also, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3853) to regulate immigration; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

COMMISSION BETWEEN UNITED STATES AND VENEZUELA.

Mr. SPRINGER, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee on Foreign Affairs the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Affairs be authorized to print the evidence taken by said committee in relation to the petition of Seth Driggs and the mixed commission between the United States and Venezuela, and the report accompanying the same.

SAINT PAUL, MINNESOTA, A PORT OF APPRAISAL.

Mr. DUNNELL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Commerce the bill (S. No. 413) establishing the port of Saint Paul, Minnesota, as a port of appraisal. This bill has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Commerce.

The bill was read. It provides in the first section that the provisions contained in, and the privileges accorded by, sections 2990, 2991, 2992, 2993, 2994, 2995, 2996, and 2997 of the Revised Statutes be extended to, and held to include, the port of Saint Paul, in the collection district of Minnesota.

The second section provides that the appraiser at the port of Saint Paul shall receive the same amount of salary that the deputy collector of that port now receives.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe this bill ought to go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is subject to that point of order if the gentleman makes it. It creates a new office and provides for an expenditure of money.

Mr. DUNNELL. It does not increase expenditures. It simply provides that the officer created by this bill shall receive the compensation that an existing officer now receives.

Mr. RANDALL. It makes an increase.

Mr. DUNNELL. It does not involve any increase of expense. It is so stated by the Secretary of the Treasury. The bill is the unanimous report of the Committee on Commerce. I trust the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not insist on his point.

Mr. RANDALL. It increases the number of officers.

Mr. DUNNELL. It does not.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, it opens the way for that.

Mr. DUNNELL. There is a population of 70,000 interested in the passage of this bill.

Mr. REAGAN. This bill will operate as a very great relief to commerce, and it does not involve any increase of expenditure.

Mr. RANDALL. Is there no increase of expense at all?

Mr. DUNNELL. No, sir.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair understands that the point of order is not insisted upon.

Mr. HOLMAN. Renewing the objection, I wish to inquire whether the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. DUNNELL] states that there is no increase of expense by creating this port of entry?

Mr. REAGAN. The bill does not create a new port of entry.

Mr. DUNNELL. It simply makes Saint Paul a port of appraisal; it is already a port of entry.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask that the bill be again read.

The bill was again read.

Mr. HOLMAN. For the purpose of examining this subject I shall have to insist upon the point of order. The bill, as I understand, creates a new inland port of entry.

Mr. DUNNELL. Then I withdraw the bill.

SILVER COIN.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now yield the floor to my colleague, [Mr. PAYNE,] and give notice that I will yield to no other business unless of a public and urgent nature.

Mr. PAYNE. I wish to take up from the Speaker's table joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin, which comes back from the Senate with a request for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, which I hope will be agreed to.

Mr. FORT. I should like to know what the difference between the two Houses is.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, July 1, 1876.

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its first amendment to joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and disagree to the amendment of the House to the second amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, and ask a conference of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Ordered, That Mr. SHERMAN, Mr. BOUTWELL, and Mr. BOGY be conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the conference asked for on the part of the Senate be agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. RANDALL. I ask the gentleman from Ohio to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, chairman of the Committee on Appropriations, to report on one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. RANDALL. I am directed by the Committee on Appropriations to report back the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and to move that the House non-concur in those amendments, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. PAGE. I ask for the reading of the Senate amendments.

Mr. RANDALL. I have no objections if you want to waste a couple of hours.

Mr. PAGE. Then let us have some statement of what they are.

Mr. RANDALL. There are two hundred and forty amendments of the Senate.

Mr. RUSK. They are all printed.

Mr. RANDALL. The amendments of the Senate are all printed, and the gentleman can see them for himself.

Mr. PAGE. If they are printed then I do not ask for their reading.

The amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in, and a committee of conference asked on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

PACIFIC RAILROAD.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now call up my motion to reconsider.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If I have the right, I wish to raise the question of consideration. What is the gentleman's motion on?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3672) entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein named, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. I entered the motion to reconsider on the 8th of June last. By the forty-ninth rule it is privileged, and takes precedence of everything else but a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. What is the subject-matter of the bill which the gentleman from Ohio proposes to call up? I will state frankly my only object is to prevent cutting out the morning hour.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The bill which I propose to call up for action at this time is one requiring the Pacific railroad companies to create a sinking fund to re-imburse the United States for the subsidy bonds and the interest advanced by the Government.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Is it a report from any committee?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes; from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do not wish to antagonize the gentleman's bill, and if members of the various other committees have no objection I certainly have none, and will withdraw my point raising the question of consideration.

Mr. PAGE. I insist on the call in the morning hour of committees for reports. I put the question to the Chair, whether the morning hour does not take precedence. I do not believe that the committees of this House ought to be deprived of the right to report bills. The Indian Committee was on the floor in the last morning hour. I myself reported a bill which has never been acted on, although the previous question has been seconded and the main question ordered. I think the committees of the House have the right to have at least one hour in which they may be heard for the consideration of public business. I do not understand the notice which the gentleman from Ohio

[Mr. LAWRENCE] gave three weeks ago, that he would to-day call up the motion to reconsider the recommitment of the bill to which he has referred, takes precedence over the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The calling up of the motion to reconsider takes precedence over all other motions except the motion to adjourn.

Mr. LAWRENCE. By Rule 49 it is a privileged question, and takes precedence of everything else but the motion to adjourn.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is of high privilege, and the gentleman from Ohio is therefore entitled to the floor.

Mr. PAGE. Is there a motion to reconsider pending?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is so informed.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Pending that I raise the question of order, has not the House a right to raise the question of consideration, which the Speaker must submit to the House, namely: Will the House consider it now? If the House is averse to considering the motion to reconsider at this time, cannot the House so declare?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman can raise the question of consideration.

Mr. PAGE. Then I ask the Chair to submit that question to the House.

Mr. LAWRENCE. When I called up the motion to reconsider I was entitled to the floor and have not yielded it.

Mr. HUBBELL. I renew the question of consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This is a bill involving $150,000,000. It is a bill to put money into the Treasury.

Mr. RANDALL. It is too late to raise the question of consideration. The gentleman from Ohio took possession of the floor and yielded to me as chairman of another committee for the time being to make a report.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Illinois reserved the right to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois did reserve the right to raise the question of consideration, and he can do so at this time.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I do not insist on raising the question of consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is too late for anybody else to raise it.

Mr. HUBBELL. I raise the question of consideration.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. I would like to know whether the unfinished business of the Committee on the Texas Border Troubles has not precedence of any new business?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] that if the House refuses to consider the privileged question now before it, that question may arise; but it does not arise at the present time, the regular order being the morning hour and the call of committees for reports.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill is necessary in order to save a large amount to the Government.

The question being taken on the question of consideration, there were—ayes 88, noes 12.

The point was made by Mr. MACDOUGALL and Mr. BANNING that a quorum had not voted.

Mr. BANNING. I make the point that a quorum has not voted, simply for the reason that I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has a substitute which he desires to offer for the bill of his colleague, [Mr. LAWRENCE;] and that gentleman is not here.

Mr. RANDALL. There is more than a hundred million of dollars involved in this bill due by the railroads to this Government.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will that spoil or waste before to-morrow?

Mr. BANNING. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] will probably be here to-morrow.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The consideration of this bill was postponed on account of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] going to the Saint Louis convention; but there was a distinct statement at the time, on the part of several members of the Judiciary Committee, that there would be no postponement after to-day. It is too much of a sacrifice to sacrifice $150,000,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A quorum not having voted, the Chair will order tellers, and appoints the gentleman from New York, Mr. MACDOUGALL, and the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. LAWRENCE.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 129, noes 22.

So the House agreed to consider the question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Treasury shall at all times withhold payment of any money due from the United States to any railroad company which has received any gift or grant of land, or grant of a right of way or easement, or gift or loan of money or credit from the United States, whether such money so due be reduced to judgment or not, to the amount of any and all claims due from such company to the United States.

SEC. 2. That in any action or proceeding brought in pursuance of law by such company against the United States, any claim or demand in favor of the United States against such company may, at the election of the United States, be a set-off and pleaded as such, or may be made the subject of a separate action or actions in any court of competent jurisdiction.

SEC. 3. That all claims and demands for money due the United States from any such company, from the time they respectively become due, if payment be unreasonably withheld, shall bear interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum.

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the several railroad companies to which bonds were issued under any of the several acts of which this act is amendatory to provide a sinking fund for the payment, according to law, of the interest and principal of such bonds, and for re-imbursing the United States for such sums as have been, and may from time to time be, advanced and paid by the United States upon such bonds and interest, and which may not be re-imbursed from compensation for services as now provided by law, and from 5 per cent. of net earnings. And for the purpose of providing such sinking fund said companies shall severally be required to pay into the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the said compensation for services and 5 per cent. of net earnings, the following annual installments, to wit: The Union Pacific Railroad Company shall, during the period of ten years from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, pay annually into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $750,000, to be paid one-half on July 1 and the other half on January 1 in each of said years. And during each and every year, commencing with the expiration of said period of ten years, the said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States $1,000,000 until the whole amount of bonds issued to said company, together with interest, shall have been fully paid, one-half of each annual installment to be paid on the 1st of July, and the other half on the 1st of January. And the said Central Pacific Railroad Company, on its own account and on account of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, shall, during the period of ten years from and after the 1st day of July, 1876, pay annually into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $568,210, to be paid one-half on July 1 and the other half on January 1 in each of said years. And during each and every year, commencing with the expiration of said period of ten years, the said Central Pacific Railroad Company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $760,330, until the whole amount of bonds issued to said company, together with interest, shall have been paid, one-half of each annual installment to be paid on the 1st day of July and the other half on the 1st day of January: Provided, That the sums paid into the sinking fund under this act shall apply first to the extinguishment of interest and the balance to the principal of the aforesaid bonds. And there shall be paid into the Treasury on account of said sinking fund, annually, one-half on the 1st day of July and the other half on the 1st day of January in each year, by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, $87,327; by the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $22,296; and by the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $20,723, until the bonds issued to said companies respectively, and the interest thereon, shall be fully paid. And said several companies shall owe and be indebted to the United States in the several sums required to be by them respectively paid as aforesaid. And any company may pay any sum herein required to be paid in bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par.

The total sum required to be paid by any company in any one year by virtue of this act, and including said 5 per cent. of net earnings and said compensation for services as now required by law, shall not exceed the several sums following, to wit: By the Central Pacific Railroad Company, on its own account, $1,861,484, and on account of the Western Pacific Railroad Company $133,588; the Union Pacific Railroad Company, $1,969,462; the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, $489,034; the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $124,856; and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $116,050.

SEC. 5. That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to invest to the best advantage the money paid into the Treasury or collected in pursuance of this act on account of said sinking funds in any bonds issued by the United States, and to re-invest the same from time to time, with all interest and profits, and hold the same for the purpose of said sinking funds respectively; and at the maturity of the bonds issued to said railroad companies, to sell, dispose of, or otherwise apply said money and bonds, at not less than their par value, to the credit of said sinking funds respectively, in paying and canceling said bonds issued to said companies and the interest thereon advanced by the United States not already re-imbursed. But nothing herein shall require said 5 per cent. of net earnings or said one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government to be invested as herein mentioned.

SEC. 6. That if any such railroad company shall fail to pay any money or claim due or to become due the United States, or payable in pursuance of this act, such company shall be liable to an action therefor in any court of competent jurisdiction, at the suit of the United States. And it shall be the duty of the Attorney-General to institue the necessary suits and proceedings to collect said money and claims so due or payable, and otherwise obtain redress in respect of the same, and prosecute the same with all convenient dispatch to a final determination. And all such suits and proceedings shall have precedence in the courts over other cases.

SEC. 7. That it shall be unlawful for any such railroad company, or director, officer, or agent thereof, to make or pay, or cause or authorize to be made or paid, any dividend from the earnings, profits, or resources of such company, so long as such company may for sixty days be in default in paying to the United States any money due and owing by such company to the United States in pursuance of this or any act relating to such company or otherwise, the payment of which has been demanded of such company by the Secretary of the Treasury. Every person receiving such dividend shall be liable to refund the same to the United States; and every director, officer, or agent of such company who shall violate any provision of this section shall be individually and personally liable to account and to pay to the United States the whole amount of such dividend.

SEC. 8. That no director or officer of any company hereinbefore mentioned or referred to shall hereafter be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract therewith, except for his lawful compensation as such officer. And every such person who shall violate the provisions of this section shall, on conviction thereof, be fined in any sum not more than $10,000 or imprisoned not exceeding one year, or both of said punishments may be inflicted.

SEC. 9. That any remedy herein provided shall not be deemed to deny, exclude, or impair any other heretofore existing in favor of the United States. And nothing herein contained shall affect any pending suit instituted under the fourth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874, and for other purposes," approved March 3, 1873. And nothing herein shall be deemed a waiver of the power and right of Congress at any time to alter, amend, or repeal this or any other act relating to any such railroad company; but such right and power are reserved to Congress. And nothing herein shall impair any right existing by law under the first-mortgage bonds issued under the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862." And nothing herein shall be deemed a waiver of any right which the United States may have.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question before the House is on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] to reconsider the vote by which the House recommitted this bill to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is tolerably evident that we will not be able to reach a vote on this bill this evening; and if it be agreeable to the House I will make a proposition which I think will lead to a disposition of it that I hope will be satisfactory on all sides.

I propose that the morning hour be allowed to-morrow; that after that there be two hours allowed for debate on this bill, equally divided, if there be anybody to speak against the bill, between those who are for it and those who are against it; that then the previous question be called; and that the closing hour be equally divided. I do not think, so far as I am able to learn, that there is any disposition on the part of those who have favored this bill, and who have examined it most, to consume any considerable time in the discussion. It has received more consideration than any bill that ever came before the Judiciary Committee during the years that I have been a member of that committee. It is very desirable that the bill should pass, and pass without delay, so that it may be acted upon by the Senate.

Mr. HENDEE. Let me inquire of the gentleman, if there is no opposition to the bill what is the use of three hours' debate upon it?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I stated that as the maximum time. If we find that there is no opposition to the bill, or but little opposition, we may close up the matter in half the time.

Mr. HENDEE. If there be no opposition to the bill, why not confine the debate to one hour after the morning hour to-morrow?

Mr. LAWRENCE. One gentleman, undoubtedly, desires to speak against the bill.

Mr. HENDEE. Is it the understanding that one hour after the close of the morning hour to-morrow the gentleman will call the previous question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I propose that there shall be two hours' debate after the morning hour; after which I will call the previous question.

Mr. BANNING. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has a substitue which he desires to offer for the gentleman's bill. Is that the fact?

Mr. LAWRENCE. That is not my recollection. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] did state to me, however, that he proposed to offer some amendments; and they may be in the nature of a substitute.

Mr. BANNING. I understand that the gentleman from Maine, [Mr. FRYE,] the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD,] and the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] are opposed to the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] and that they presented a minority report.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] and the gentleman from Maine [Mr. FRYE] have presented a minority report, which is printed. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LYNDE] has not united in any minority report.

Mr. BANNING. I understand that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] has telegraphed that he will be here in the morning and that he wishes to speak on the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well; my proposition will accommodate him. I propose that after the morning hour there shall be two hours' debate, and then I will call the previous question.

Mr. HURLBUT. I would suggest to the gentleman that to-morrow is private-bill day.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Private bills must give way to this.

Mr. RICE. That will be a matter of consideration for the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This can only be arranged by unanimous consent.

Mr. WHITE. Then I object.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. WHITE. Before insisting on my objection I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. If I understand correctly, the regular order to-morrow will be the consideration of the Private Calendar?

Mr. LAWRENCE. This will take precedence, because it will come up as unfinished business.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If this is pending at the adjournment it would come up in the morning as unfinished business, and would take precedence of everything else.

Mr. WHITE. Then I withdraw my objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, as the time to be allowed for discussing the bill is quite brief, that by unanimous consent the speeches be short. Let the time for speeches be fifteen minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am willing for that; we can arrange all that matter to-morrow. Let there be two hours' debate after the morning hour, and then let the previous question be called.

Mr. PAGE. I understand that this arrangement does not conflict with the morning hour at all.

The SPEAKER pro tempore It does not interfere with the call of committees for reports during the morning hour.

Mr. LAWRENCE. My proposition is that after two hours' debate, after the morning hour, the previous question shall be called.

Mr. WHITE. If this measure has precedence, why does the gentleman ask unanimous consent now?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I desire to fix a time for the consideration of this bill; otherwise it would take up the whole day, and we should lose the morning hour.

No objection was made, and the proposition of Mr. LAWRENCE was agreed to.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I must hold the floor, and therefore I move that the House do now adjourn.

WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. HOPKINS. Pending the motion to adjourn, I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table a concurrent resolution of the Senate in reference to the Washington monument.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Whereas it has pleased Almighty God to guide the United States of America safely through one hundred years of national life and to crown our nation with the highest blessings of civil and religious liberty: Therefore,

The Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled in the name of the people of the United States in reverent thankfulness acknowledge the fountain and source, the author and giver of all these blessings, and our dependence upon His providence and will; and

Whereas we recognize as our fathers did that George Washington, "first in peace, first in war, and first in the hearts of his countrymen," was one of the chief instruments of divine Providence in securing American independence and in laying broad and deep the foundations of our liberties in the Constitution of the United States:

Therefore as a mark of our sense of the honor due to his name and to his compatriots and associates, our revolutionary fathers,

We the Senate and House of Representatives in Congress assembled in the name of the people of the United States at this the beginning of the second century of national existence, do assume and direct the completion of the Washington monument in the city of Washington, and instruct the Committee on Appropriations of the respective Houses to propose suitable provisions of law to carry this resolution into effect.

Mr. RANDALL. The resolution provides for an appropriation, but there is no appropriation provided for in it.

Mr. HOPKINS. It directs the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses to report a bill making the necessary appropriation.

Mr. HURLBUT. It is merely instructing the Committee on Appropriations, instead of the Committee on Appropriations instructing us, as they have been doing for the last six months.

Mr. ANDERSON. What amount of money will be necessary to complete this monument?

Mr. ATKINS. I hope the House will determine how much it means to appropriate for this purpose, and not leave it to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. HOPKINS. I do not know how much money would be needed. The resolution only came from the Senate to-day. I had no previous notice that such a resolution was contemplated. It passed the Senate unanimously. It provides that the Committees on Appropriations of the two Houses shall report a suitable bill, and it will be for those committees to ascertain the amount needed.

Mr. ANDERSON. I have no objection to the resolution.

Mr. HOPKINS. I have no desire to discuss the question, but I hope it will pass the House with the same unanimity with which it passed the Senate.

The question was taken, and the resolution was unanimously agreed to.

Mr. HOPKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA INDIANS.

Mr. PAGE. I desire to report from the Committee on Indian Affairs, with amendments, the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians, in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The bill and amendments were read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill at this time?

Mr. PAGE. I desire to say one word. This bill has the approval of the Indian Bureau, and was approved by the Committee on Indian Affairs of the Senate as well as by the committee of the House.

Mr. TERRY. I object to its consideration. [Cries of "Regular order."]

LEAVE TO PRINT.

Mr. LORD. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague from New York, Mr. LAPHAM, who was called home on public business and did not get back in time to make his speech upon the Geneva award bill, be allowed to have it printed as a part of the debates in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There was no objection, and leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

TELEGRAPHIC COMMUNICATION BETWEEN AMERICA AND ASIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the Senate, requesting the return of the bill (S. No. 892) to encourage and promote telegraphic communication between America and Asia.

No objection was made, and the request was granted.

CHARLES DAIKER.

The SPEAKER pro tempore, by unanimous consent, also laid before the House a letter from the chief clerk of the War Department, transmitting reports of the commanding general of the Department of the Columbia on the case of Charles Daiker, of Sitka, Alaska; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IRREGULARITIES IN PENSION CLAIMS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions recommending legislation authorizing him to waive irregularities in claims filed prior to July 1, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana, asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of Mrs. Margaret A. Northeren for a pension.

Mr. WHITTHORNE asked and obtained unanimous consent for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the papers in the case of George P. Hebb.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. PARSONS for one week;

To Mr. DENISON indefinitely from Monday last on account of sickness; and

To Mr. HARALSON for two weeks.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 176) to authorize the Northwestern Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to enter upon the Menomonee Indian reservation and improve the Oconto River, its branches and tributaries;

An act (S. No. 369) to exempt vessels engaged in navigating the Mississippi River and its tributaries above the port of New Orleans from entries and clearances;

Mr. HARRISON, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes providing a penalty for mailing obscene books and other matters therein contained and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the same committee, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

RANK OF THE PAYMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Military Affairs, with a recommendation that the same do pass, Senate bill No. 843, establishing the rank of the Paymaster-General.

Mr. HOLMAN. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS.

The following petitions were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

By Mr. CASON: The petition of citizens of Des Moines Valley, Iowa, that Congress request the United States Supreme Court to issue a special mandate to the Federal courts in Iowa to postpone all action in reference to the Des Moines River lands awaiting the action of Congress upon certain memorials in regard to said lands, to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HOPKINS: The petition of Vincent T. d'Auville, a citizen of Pennsylvania, for compensation for the loss of time and property and for damages to his health and chances for advancement in life by reason of his illegal imprisonment by English authorities, to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, July 7, 1876.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GREEN ADAMS, its Chief Clerk, announced that the managers on the part of the House at the third conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having reported that they were unable to agree, it was Resolved, That the House further insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the said bill, and ask a further conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and that Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM R. MORRISON of Illinois, and Mr. JOHN A. KASSON of Iowa be the managers at the conference on the part of this House.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of Amy Otis, mother of Henry Otis, late of Company F, Ninty-eighth Regiment New York Volunteers, praying for an amendment to the fifteenth section of the act to revise, consolidate, and amend the laws relating to pensions, extending the time of limitation for obtaining arrears until the 4th of July, 1876; which was referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MERRIMON presented the petition of John H. Wheeler, D. C. Forney, and William Russell, citizens of the District of Columbia, praying that they be relieved from illegal assessments made by the authorities of Washington; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. JONES, of Florida, presented the petition of Hannibal Rowe, of Milton, Florida, praying compensation for services rendered as agent of the United States Government while employed in protecting and preserving the live-oak timber in that State on the live-oak plantations belonging to the United States; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORT OF A COMMITTEE.

Mr. WITHERS, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 832) to increase the pension of Helen M. Stansbury, reported it without amendment.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. WINDOM asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 978) extending and continuing the act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government;" which was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

SIOUX INDIANS.

Mr. INGALLS submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be requested to inform the Senate, if not incompatible with the public interest, whether the Sioux Indians made any hostile demonstration prior to the invasion of their treaty reservation by the gold-hunters; whether the present military operations are conducted for the purpose of protecting said Indians in their rights under the treaty of 1868, or of punishing them for resisting the violation of that treaty; and whether the recent reports of an alleged disaster to our forces under General Custer in that region are true.

FORT KEARNEY RESERVATION.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (S. No. 894) to provide for the sale of the Fort Kearney military reservation in the State of Nebraska. It is a bill that will take but a single moment. It was objected to by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] the other day, but I understand that he now withdraws his objection.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill.

The bill was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs with amendments.

The first amendment was in line 6, to insert after the word "only" the words "at the minimum price;" so as to read:

To offer said land to actual settlers only at the minimum price, under and in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I ask to withdraw this amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is withdrawn, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

The next amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was to insert at the end of section 1 the following additional proviso:

And provided further, That the heirs of any person having made settlement and improvement as above described prior to June 1, 1876, may complete the pre-emption or homestead entry of the person so deceased.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. In line 14 I move to amend the amendment by adding after the word "any" the word "deceased," and to strike out the word "having" and insert "who had;" so as to read:

That the heirs of any deceased person who had made settlement and improvement as above described, &c.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I should like the Senator from Nebraska to be good enough to explain the nature of this bill.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. This is a reservation about ten miles square, two hundred miles west of Omaha. It has been abandoned for all military purposes. There is nothing on the land except the improvements placed there by settlers. Settlers have been there for some time; I do not know how long, but ever since it was abandoned, now two or three years ago. They have settled upon this reservation as they usually do in such cases, and this bill is to allow them to go on and pre-empt and homestead this land like any other land.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Is there any communication from the War Department upon the subject?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There has been. The War Department approves it. The bill passed the Senate once before. The War Department approved the bill at that time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the first section be again read.

The Chief Clerk read the first section of the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I rise to present a report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The Chief Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial departments of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

LOT M. MORRILL,
WM. WINDOM,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

SAML. J. RANDALL,
OTHO R. SINGLETON,
CHARLES FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will simply send to the Chair and ask that the proposition of the conferees on the part of the Senate to the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives may be read at the Clerk's desk, and I ask the attention of the Senate to the proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read what is desired.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the part of the Senate submit that as anything like a just and intelligent adjustment of the salaries of the employés, clerks, heads of bureaus, chiefs of divisions and of the subdivisions of the Executive Departments, a service at once extended and diversified, must necessarily involve a critical and laborious examination into its details and duties, an undertaking quite impracticable in the last days of a session of Congress, and unwise to attempt in connection with an appropriation bill, the committee therefore propose, as a concession, in order to meet the views of the House on the subject of appropriations for the salaries, that the Senate will recede from its amendments to the bill of the House in this respect, and remit the question of the revision and adjustment of the same to a joint select committee of four, two of whom shall be appointed by the presiding officer of each House, whose duty it shall be to revise and adjust the salaries, having due regard to a just public economy and the efficiency of the service, and make report of their doing therein on the first day of the next session of Congress: And provided, That any change made in said salaries by Congress upon said report shall take effect from the 1st day of July, 1876; and all persons who shall be affected thereby and who shall continue in the service shall be deemed to have accepted the terms hereof and acquiesced therein.

But the Senate cannot, having regard to its constitutional rights and duties as a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government, assent to the changes in the existing law that it believes to be pernicious as the price of securing appropriations necessary to carry on the operations of the Government under the laws as they now exist. And upon the same principle the Senate does not demand that the House of Representatives shall vote to appropriate any money, even to meet the legal obligations of the United States, that the House may feel it to be its duty to refuse; thus leaving to each House absolute independence in respect of acceding or not acceding to new provisions of law that it believes to be unwise.

And the committee further submit that the Senate will recede from its amendments to the House amendments on the reduction of the civil list in the Executive Departments of clerks and employés, and agree to any amendments which shall reduce the number one-half that proposed by the bill of the House, observing in such reduction the exercise of such discrimination as to the needs of the service in the several subdivisions thereof as a careful examination of the same may indicate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives, and if it is the desire of the Senate I will make some observations in regard to the attitude of the two Houses upon this great bill touching the entire civil service of the country and the circumstances surrounding it.

I begin by saying that the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate from the outset have been disposed, in great sincerity and candor and with alacrity, to meet every honest disposition on the part of the House of Representatives for retrenchment of the public expenditures, as I am sure every member of that committee will bear me out in saying, and as I certainly in turn will say of every member of that committee on the other side of the Chamber, and I am sure that those who have observed the temper of the Senate will agree that no other feeling or disposition has at any time been manifested except to meet every just demand for retrenchment which is consistent with the public service.

Now let us see what the precise points of the difference between the two Houses are upon this question. The House of Representatives sent this particular bill to the Senate, covering the entire civil service of the Executive Departments, with certain amendments: first, an amendment touching the compensation of this service and a change in the law in that respect and, secondly, a very large numerical reduction of the civil list. Those were the two fundamental propositions. The bill came from the House of Representatives at the end of six months to be considered by the Senate. To investigate a question so broad as anything like an intelligent and just consideration of the salaries would involve very great labor, very careful and exact consideration and detail, and a great deal of time. Now, consider that at the end of these six months the Senate was expected to consider and pass, or pass without consideration, the principal appropriation bills for carrying on the Government. That is the predicament in which the Senate found itself at the end of six months of the session of Congress.

What was to be done on the first proposition by your committee? By the exercise of the only function it is presumed to have, and the only real function it really has, it was to consider, first, what the service was, as established by law, and to provide for it; and if we had had any other function, that was the only practicable one at the late hour at which this bill came to us.

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator before leaving that point state the extent of the changes?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The extent of the changes covered the entire service. I am speaking now of the compensations to all clerks and employés receiving above $1,200 a year.

Mr. KERNAN. The Senator will allow me to ask what was the percentage of the general reduction?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The percentage was not quite exact. It varied from 10 to 35 or 40 per cent.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It was a variegated percentage.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes; the Senate will perceive there was no exact rule that could be applied. As a general proposition, 10 per cent. was applied to a certain class of clerks and employés above class one and up to class four, but beyond that it was irregular.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Not to interrupt the Senator again, I should like him to state what gross amount of reduction was made by the bills as passed by the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. In the whole?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What gross amount?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. On this particular bill?

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. No; the gross amount of all the appropriation bills.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. If my honorable friend will excuse me, I will come to that a little later. I should like to speak now of the difficulties the two committees have encountered in coming to an agreement on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and I am stating the difficulty your Committee on Appropriations found in the beginning. It was to enter upon the task of arranging the salaries of the entire civil service in the Executive Departments of the Government, and that, in the last month, it was to be hoped, of the session. If there were no question of law or parliamentary usage to control a matter of that sort, is it not obvious that such a task as that could not be undertaken? But your committee had no option about it. It had no right whatever to consider a question of a change of salaries. Its duty, and its whole duty, having charge of making appropriations for the service of the Government, was done when it had ascertained what that service was and the amount of appropriations demanded for it in order to comply with the requirements of law. That was the sum total, the beginning and the end of its whole duty, and anything else than that was a usurpation of the legislative functions of this body. Therefore the committee had nothing to do but to place that compensation where the law had placed it, and report the bill back to the Senate. I believe the Senate divided upon that whole subject but once, upon one single proposition, thereby approving as the committee had a right to believe and did believe the proposition that it was not the function of an Appropriation Committee to change the law, but to appropriate in obedience to it was the obvious duty of the committee.

We are met in conference upon the ground that the House of Representatives does not agree to the proposition of the Senate to place these salaries in harmony with the obligations of the law and the public service as established by law, but it will put its judgment and fiat against the Senate and against the law; it is insisted that it possesses that omnipotence which is peculiar to the House of Commons, and which practically constitutes the House of Commons the Parliament, and makes the Senate "the effete Lords of Great Britain." That is where we are. An appropriation committee has come to mean the will of one branch of Congress and but one, and on a question of that sort there is no co-ordinate branch; and that is the attitude in which the Senate is placed, and upon such ground as that conference is impracticable, conference is impossible because there is and there can be but one party to such a question.

Now, in order to get rid of this complication, let us see what the committee on the part of the Senate proposed. The House on the first conference, as I said on a former occasion, refused to concur with the Senate in placing the compensation in harmony with the law. They would appropriate no more. Very well. It must be seen that in order to get a conclusion there must be concessions on one side or the other. The Senate could not recede from its amendments and take the action of the House of Representatives changing by absolute law the entire salaries of the whole civil service in the Executive Departments. The Senate could not do that; especially the Senate could not do that if demanded as the price of any appropriation at all. To do that, was to concede that we were no longer a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government. It was abdication, as my honorable friend sitting near me [Mr. SHERMAN] says, absolute abdication. Well, if adhered to it is revolution. As long as the House of Representatives simply insists, we are to confer; but when the House of Representatives gets so far that it adheres, it is revolution. That is what it is, absolute revolution. It is a defiance of the law, and that is revolution in this country. I maintain that in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, or out of it, the rule of right for our action here or elsewhere is the law, and it is equally obligatory on all; and whoever rebels against it is revolutionary.

What then did we propose? The House will appropriate no more than a certain portion for this compensation. We said, "We will take it, gentlemen." "Well, but there will be a claim for the balance." "Certainly there will." "Well, we shall be open to suit." Certainly you will, because this civil service is no myth. It is a reality; it is an entity. While it performs its duties it has its claims upon the Government as sacred as any right. It has a right to the compensations that are fixed by law until they are changed by the concurrent action of the two branches of Congress, with the assent of the President; and either branch that undertakes to innovate upon that basis gives the civil service a remedy against the Treasury of the United States. Now, how should such a complication as that be cut? The House would not yield, would not appropriate any more money; the Senate would not yield to the House to change the salaries. What, then, should be done?

The Senate conferees, in order to make a concession which would relieve the House from the appropriation of any more money, and in order to relieve the Senate from the embarrassment in which the House amendment changing the salaries had placed it, and maintain its own character and its own independence as a co-ordinate branch of the Government, said, "We will do this: we will take what you appropriate; but on the question what the salaries shall be for this particular year and for all the future, so far as we are concerned, we will remit that question to a committee of four appointed by the presiding officers of the respective branches, who shall revise and adjust the whole question of compensation covered by this bill; and, Congress enacting it, that shall be the compensation for this year." Is that fair? Is that a reasonable proposition? Can any Senator rise here and tell this committee if he can, pray instruct them, or some other committee, what is to be done in this difficulty consistent with the integrity of both branches of Congress, consistent with the views of economy which they present to us on the part of the House, and also consistent with our own prerogative or our own character as a co-ordinate branch of the Congress of the United States.

You will see, Mr. President, that instead of undertaking to arrange the salaries ourselves, which is an impossibility, if we were to try it at this period of the session, instead of taking these salaries from the House of Representatives and changing the law, we say to them, "Let the whole subject be revised, and whatever shall be the judgment of Congress upon that revision, the report being made on the first day of the next session, that shall be the law and that shall be the compensation." Provision is made in this proposition to the end that all persons in the civil service shall take notice of the fact that we are revising the salaries, and if they continue in office up to the time when the change is made the changed compensation shall be that which they shall receive.

If more can be done consistent with the integrity of this body, let some man here proclaim it. So far as I am concerned, with every disposition to make honorable and just concessions to the House of Representatives, and only anxious to guard against the perils of an assumption which denies to the Senate of the United States the rights of a co-ordinate branch of the Government on questions of this sort, I have done the utmost in my power to conciliate and to concede everything that would bring us to a conclusion.

So much for the first part. The next proposition was the reduction of the numerical force. The House of Representatives propose to reduce that force twelve hundred. I appeal to my associates on the committee if they do not believe we all acted in perfect good faith and with a desire to meet the House of Representatives at the very lowest figure consistent with the public service. The committee came to the conclusion that something like a third of the proposed reduction was all that the public service would bear without being crippled. I desire that the Senate should understand how we got at that. It was by no guess. In the first place this committee has some experience on this subject. Year after year since the war was over, since it became necessary to curtail the expenditures of the Government, it has been our annual, obvious, and exigent necessity to examine into this service in detail. We think we know something about it; but we are not apt scholars, perhaps. However, with that knowledge which we have, we made application to the heads of the Departments and Bureaus having this great duty in charge, requiring them to institute a careful inspection into the whole service and to report to the committee the lowest figure to which that service could be reduced with a view of meeting the House of Representatives as far as was practicable, consistent with the public welfare.

Thereby we reached the conclusion previously stated. But here is the disagreement. The bills must be passed in some way by some mutual concession. The House of Representatives stands on a reduction of twelve hundred, which is one-fourth of the entire service, and the Senate on its judgment, backed by the authorities at the head of this service, stands on one-fourth of that. What is to be done? This last proposition meets the House of Representatives half way. Why? It is better that the public service should suffer somewhat than to encounter the perils which will come from a disagreement on this subject; and therefore, although it is the judgment of your conferees that this concession will to some extent injure the public service, will involve a good deal of difficulty first and last, yet on the whole it is best to make that concession, distributing it carefully over the various Departments, and take the consequences, whatever they are. How is that received? Absolutely rejected. The Senate will judge what is to be done after that.

Now, just a word about the difficulties in which we are. It is said that we are dividing on a small matter. Well, Mr. President, if you look at this question of salaries as applicable to the clerks—I am not now speaking about the compensation of the members of Congress; but, taking this rule as it applies to the clerks, it is so small that it seems to me, standing by itself, it would be so immaterial—the mere dust in the balance—that you could hardly suppose the Congress of the United States would accord it a moment's consideration, as surely they would not. Now, what is the trouble? How much do Senators suppose is in controversy on that simple question of salaries touching the clerks? I see it is stated in the RECORD this morning that it all amounts to only $250,000, or less than $300,000.

Mr. WINDOM. Right at that point will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator will bear in mind that a proposition was made from the House conferees to reduce on the second-class clerks $50 a year, on the third-class $50, and on the fourth-class $100, and that, footed up, makes less than $100,000, so that it is not the amount so much as the principle of coercing the Senate into an agreement on a change of the law.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is all they care about.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That shows how trivial a thing it is in the way of economy to touch those salaries; and that shows how right we were in our belief that the reduction of salaries fixed in 1854 when the purchasing power of the dollar was twice what it is now, particularly as applied to this city, is not the real point and that this effort is not in the interest of a just economy. I do not mean to impeach the motives of the House of Representatives. I have said heretofore and I repeat now that they think this can be done. I give them all credit; but I do not believe it ought to be done, nor do I believe it can be proved to anybody that a crusade upon salaries fixed in 1854 under those circumstances and never touched by the party in power down to this day is a matter of public necessity, or that there is any public justice in the attempt to raid upon the clerks in these Departments for any such purpose. It is too insignificant altogether for the consideration of statesmen.

Now let us see the order of events by which it comes to pass. The first event of which this is the outgrowth was the attempt of a committee to gather unto itself all the power of legislation upon an appropriation bill. There is where it began; and only in this light can you see the significance of what has been attempted, and only in this light can you see the importance of performing our duty to this Senate to-day and to the country to-day on the whole question of the salaries.

Do not understand that I am here to invoke the Senate of the United States to stand firm as to the change of a salary of a clerk from $1,400 to $1,350. That is not a subject of very great gravity in my mind, but the principle that lies behind it, the authority that demands the right to do it as against the Senate, covers the whole field of legislation and annihilates the Senate of the United States in principle. That is what it is. Now let us follow this out a little and we shall see the consequence of this change which we resist, of this undertaking to tell the Senate of the United States how much shall be appropriated and what laws shall be changed. Let us see what has been done on the line of the change of the public service through a Committee of Appropriations simply, whose functions are rather administrative than legislative. This is not the only instance. Other things in their order came up on other bills.

On the bill appropriating for the Army is a re-organization of the whole Army of the United States, a thing so delicate, a thing so complicated, a thing so critical in all its relations, as was well explained by my honorable friend from Illinois, the chairman of the Military Committee, [Mr. LOGAN,] that it would take months of the time of those best acquainted with the subject to comprehend it; and yet the whole thing is proposed to be done upon an appropriation bill. And, Mr. President, just in harmony with the purpose—just in harmony with the act—for I will not talk of motives or purposes—what do you find? It is proclaimed that the Army is altogether out of place in our system. Yes, sir; that has gone to the country absolutely that the Army of the United States is utterly out of place in our system, and one honorable gentleman has said here or somewhere else that he believes it is not only useless but on the whole it is pernicious in this country; that all we needed, he believed, was about three regiments of cavalry and those should be under the direction of the Interior Department to guard the frontiers against the Indians. See what a predicament we should be in. Abolish all the Army except three regiments and cover them into the Interior Department; and then abolish the Indian Bureau and cover that into the Army! That is the condition in which these bills come to us.

Then following out the same policy, you had a re-organization of the Navy to some extent, and then you had an abolition, absolute and unqualified, of the Indian Bureau, and then you had a repeal of the enforcement act. Think of that! You had a repeal on an appropriation bill of the enforcement act and of the election laws, and in consequence of that, of course you had a large reduction of the expenditures necessary for the maintenance of those acts.

Then again, as if the extravagance of the Government was so extreme that no branch of the public service could be omitted, you had an entire revision of the diplomatic and consular relations of this country. The salaries of this service were established in 1856, resting upon the basis of 1856. Now the expenses of living are increased very largely over the expenses of living at that day in all quarters of the world, and everybody who knows much about our foreign affairs knows that we pay our diplomats much less than any nation at all comparable with us as a power. That must all be revised and reduced, as if we stood in the presence of some overpowering exigency!

Mr. SHERMAN. With my friend's permission I will move that the order in regard to the meeting of the court at twelve o'clock be postponed until one to allow this matter to be discussed and disposed of.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It would be better to say "until the termination of this business."

Mr. SARGENT. We ought to notify the House, and so fix a definite time.

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, I think we ought to fix a definite time. I think we ought to finish this matter; it is pressing. I think we had better fix an hour so as to notify the House.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we shall lose time by fixing an hour. I think it would be better to say, "until this matter is terminated, and that the House be informed when we are ready to receive the managers."

Mr. SHERMAN. I will make a motion that the trial be postponed for the present, and that due notice will be given to the House when the Senate is ready to proceed with the trial.

Mr. THURMAN. What is the pending question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report of the committee of conference on the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

Mr. THURMAN. If I comprehend the object of my colleague in his motion, it is that the Senate shall take some definite action on this report.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a request for another conference.

Mr. THURMAN. I wish to understand the precise question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine has moved that the Senate insist on its amendments, and grant the request of the House for another conference. That is the pending motion.

Mr. THURMAN. Then, if it is in order to say a word on the motion of my colleague, I wish to say that I do not see why we cannot vote on that motion at once; but if there is to be a heated debate here, an impeachment trial, not of the late Secretary of War, but of the whole House of Representatives, or at least a majority of that House, I do not know when this debate will end.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does not my colleague see that it is very proper that the Senator from Maine should give to us the status of this question, just as was done in the House? I think the Senate is not to be led into a heated debate about this matter, but it is manifestly proper that we should understand the status of the bill.

Mr. THURMAN. I do see a propriety in our knowing the status of it; but as to the propriety of the heated and impatient manner in which the statement is made and the declaration that attributes to the House revolutionary proceedings, that is another question.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I do not give way.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine resumes the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. I hope the question will be put on my motion.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I will yield for that purpose.

Mr. THURMAN. One word more.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not yield.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine does not yield.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Especially if the Senator attributes to me what I did not say. I said nothing which authorized the Senator from Ohio to make his remark that I had charged revolutionary purposes or proceedings upon the House of Representatives. I was stating of certain tendencies and certain results, and what they would be if they reached that point; and I said nothing of the purposes of the House of Representatives except what is honorable to them, nor do I intend to; but upon the status of things between the House of Representatives and the Senate of the United States, my honorable friend will pardon me if I state the exact condition of things; and I hope to be decorous in doing it.

Mr. President, I have said all I care to say about the pernicious policy of undertaking to gather into an appropriation bill the legislative functions of Congress and to insist upon enforcing that upon the Senate of the United States. I know, as everybody knows here, that we have been accustomed from time to time, on the one side and on the other, to propose alterations in the statutes of the country upon appropriation bills. That has been done, and that will be done, but it always implies of course the consent of both sides. Where an amendment of a statute is proposed by one side and the other side dissents, the party proposing is the innovating party, and so far as I know in the whole history of the country the innovating party always retires. If the Senate, for instance, proposes a material change in the law upon an appropriation bill or upon any other bill, but particularly upon an appropriation bill, which the House of Representatives does not see fit to accede to, it is the bounden duty of the Senate to retire from it. The law still remains, and is the law of the land, here as everywhere else. That is all I meant to say, and that is all I did say.

I hope, therefore, my honorable friend from Ohio will not think it is quite right for him to say that I have arraigned the House of Representatives as a revolutionary body. Nothing was further from my purpose, and nothing was further from anything I said. I repeat, Mr. President, that we are not quarreling or dividing (dividing is a better word, I withdraw the other) upon the question of the salaries of fourth-class clerks, fifth-class clerks, sixth-class clerks, or what not. We are dividing upon the general power undertaken to be exercised against the Senate to require it to receive whatever appropriation the House of Representatives sees fit to send to it, accompanied by whatever change of the law it sees fit also to send.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will interrupt the Senator to receive a message from the House of Representatives.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the joint resolution lie on the table and be printed, and I desire to give notice to the Senate that to-morrow I shall call it up for consideration.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had disagreed to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, and asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War. The House of Representatives will be duly notified.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the court adjourn until to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

Several SENATORS. O, no.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will then move that the court take a recess until two o'clock, with a view to finish the consideration of the legislative appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment adjourn until two o'clock.

Mr. SHERMAN. And on that motion I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand——

Mr. SHERMAN. The question is not debatable. I should like to debate it myself if I could.

Mr. DAVIS. I was going to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations if one o'clock would not be sufficient, instead of two o'clock. I see no use of extending the time more than one hour.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That will be time enough.

Mr. DAVIS. Then I move to amend the motion by fixing one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from West Virginia to the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I hope that the amendment will prevail. There are peculiar reasons why we should hear the Senator from Maine, and I understand that he will not want to occupy more than an hour.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand that the Senator from Maine thinks one o'clock will afford sufficient time.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will accept the amendment, and modify my motion so as to say one o'clock.

Mr. MORTON. I will state that there are other Senators who desire to be heard upon this question. It is a question of great importance and cannot be passed over by shutting everybody out. I hope the time will not be limited to one o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Would it be in order now to move to amend the proposition so as to order that the business of the Senate sitting for this trial be suspended until the further order of the Senate, of which the House of Representatives will be notified?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Such a motion would be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. If that be in order, I move it as a substitute for the pending proposition.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont moves that the proceedings of the trial be suspended until the further order of the Senate, of which the House of Representatives shall be notified.

Mr. CARPENTER. I suggest to the Senator to also embody in his motion that the defendant be notified.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I suppose it will only be for two or three hours any way. I do not suppose anybody will go away.

Mr. CARPENTER. Very well.

The motion was agreed to.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATION BILL.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine, [Mr. MORRILL,] that the Senate further insist upon its amendments to the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and agree to the further conference asked by the House, on which the Senator from Maine is entitled to the floor.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Mr. President, I have said all I desire to say, and more than I intended upon the branch of the subject to which I had been adverting. I said that I believed the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate had from the beginning been disposed to meet the House of Representatives in a spirit of candor and fairness, appreciating their motives and willing to cut down the public service to the lowest point practicable. That is my belief, and I think the unanimous feeling of the Committee on Appropriations.

I now purpose to tell the Senate exactly what we have done and what has been realized, what the House of Representatives has done for the public service in the way of reduction and what the amount of reductions on the part of the Senate has been, and how the public service is left by its action.

I hope the Senate will give me their attention on this subject, because I think they will be surprised to see how near the House of Representatives and the Senate really stand upon the question of the appropriations for this year. There is an impression in the country, as there is here and in the House of Representatives, that the Senate has stood obstructing the reductions of expenditures.

The House of Representatives say to the country that we are supporting a very redundant service; that it is plethoric, that it needs to be curbed, to be pruned. In many respects that is true; but I think I am authorized to say that a wrong impression has prevailed about this service, and it is time the Senate of the United States addressed itself to a consideration of the subject. In the last three years we have reduced this very service about which so much complaint is made $33,000,000.

Whoever supposes that the Senate of the United States has been redundant upon this question of appropriations, year in and year out, has a total misapprehension of the labors and the performance of the Senate of the United States.

In the first place, and I mention it not particularly to criticise, it is said that the House of Representatives have reduced by their bills over the appropriations of last year $39,000,000. I will have very little to say about that, except that apparently it would seem to be true; that is to say, assuming that the amount of the appropriations last year was in round numbers $177,000,000, as it was. My understanding of it, which I get from a careful examination of the bills, is that the bills as they passed the Senate reduced the appropriations over those of last year $22,000,000. The difference, then, between us would seem to be that between $22,000,000 and $39,000,000. I do not speak with entire accuracy, but I speak with approximate accuracy. Now, how shall we account for that difference?

In order to see whether that reduction of $39,000,000 is really what it seems to be, it is necessary that there should be some analysis of the appropriations on the part of the House. In the appropriation bills of last year there was a deficiency of $4,000,000, and in making this estimate of $39,000,000 the House inadvertently reckoned that in as a reduction of the expenses of this year. Of course that should not be counted in. That would reduce their expenditure to $35,000,000. Then they have re-appropriated balances, a thing quite unprecedented as a general appropriation; that is to say, starting upon a career of economy, starting upon the idea of making a large reduction of the public expenditures apparent to the public, they count in, in the first place, the deficiency bill of last year, which does not belong to this year at all because it is not a reduction anywhere; then they re-appropriate balances, and they do not count those as an appropriation at all, that is to say, balances due from this service of the last fiscal year. Instead of making a direct appropriation out of the Treasury they re-appropriate that balance.

Mr. WEST. Without mentioning the amount.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Without mentioning the amount. That does not go into the appropriation, and their appropriation seems to be less by so much as are those unexpended balances of the last year. I have not gone into those. I do not know but that some of my colleagues on the committee have; I have not. I have seen it estimated elsewhere to have been five millions in all. The whole of the re-appropriation is put at five millions. If you deduct that, then what? That brings it down to $30,000,000; that is to say, they have reduced the appropriations this year from those of last year $30,000,000. Then where do we stand? The Senate have conceded to the House of Representatives within $8,000,000. That is not bad. I am inclined to think I shall surprise many of my honorable friends here when I state this fact. I am now undertaking to justify the action of the Senate and the Senate committee. I will show you by and by that in some respects we have done this very reluctantly. I think it has been overdone; but it has been done in the spirit of concession to the House of Representatives. I think the House of Representatives have exacted more than they were authorized to exact of us in just public economy.

My judgment is that it will be found when the year expires that by reason of these reductions very large deficiencies will be required, and that is the way they will be made up. We shall get through this year; we shall get over this particular occasion, and when we come to reflective days in the future we shall see that we have struck the service down below its demands, and shall be obliged to make appropriations for deficiencies to no inconsiderable extent.

Now let us see how the House of Representatives manage to reduce the expenditures—rather the appropriations. That must be interesting to us all. How do they make the appropriations of this year fall so much below the appropriations of last year? I have already remarked that in the first place they got rid of the Indian Bureau; in the second place they went at the foreign service; in the third place they went at the Army—they did not want any Army; and in several other particulars they interfered with the public service. But coming down now to that service which is not fixed and certain by law, there is where the innovation begins; and what did they do? I will show you how they managed to reduce in the sundry civil bill. The sundry civil bill of last year was $29,459,855. The House appropriated $15,256,731.32 in this year's bill. The sundry civil bill is well understood by the Senate to mean that which covers all the outlying service in great variety, and the House of Representatives reduced that $14,000,000. How were they able to that? Did they have an intelligent appreciation, a solicitous regard for the service?

Let us see how they accomplished it. I will give you some of the items. It will be too tedious for you to listen to a detail of the whole, but I will give you some as a sample. There are two ways of reducing expenses. Everybody understands that. If your housekeeping has become very expensive this year you will sell off your carriages, you will dismiss your servants, you will break up a variety of things so as to curtail expenses. Now the House of Representatives adopted two methods: first, to curtail the salaries in the way of compensation; secondly, to dispense with certain branches of the public service. The first item we come to, to account for this reduction in the sundry civil bill, is in regard to navy-yards. We appropriate annually for the support of the navy-yards from one million to a million and a half of dollars ordinarily; latterly, a little less, about a million or a million and a quarter.

Mr. THURMAN. Are those appropriations made in the sundry civil bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; in the sundry civil bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Is that the proper place for them?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Yes, sir; all that outlying service goes into the sundry civil bill; it is usual there, and there it was not found this year, but was put in by the Senate. That service covers all the expenditures for all the navy-yards. I do not mean the appropriations for improvements, but for the civil force for the maintenance of the organization of the navy-yards. What did they do with that? Left it out altogether.

Come to another item, the question of fortifications. The estimate for fortifications this year was $3,315,000. What did they do with that? Appropriated $315,000; and what about the $3,000,000 omitted? What do we do? We accepted their action. Why? It was discretionary with the House of Representatives whether they would do it or not, and it was obvious enough that they did not intend to do such a thing as that; and that is a question over which either branch of Congress has control, particularly these outlying matters. Will not the Senate perceive how easy it is to retrench, to reform, and to reduce if you neglect the public service altogether in whole or in part? That is the way to account for it.

Now, what is to be said about that? It is a public service omitted, is it not? When does it come back to us? Next year, of course. It is a service omitted; I speak of the fortifications. As to these navy-yards, does anybody suppose that they are to exist without an appropriation?

Mr. SHERMAN. Is there no appropriation for repairs or painting, or anything of that kind?

Mr. SARGENT. Not a dollar.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then, Mr. President, another item is the judicial expenses of the Government, amounting to a little over $3,000,000 now. They have been increased of late years. The judicial expenses of the Government have been increased from various considerations. I will not stop to state them. They were appropriated for last year at something like three millions, perhaps a little over. The reduction on that was $834,250. Why? They do not want so much judicial proceedings this year. That is obvious, and I think I am authorized to make the remark from the fact that they repealed certain laws which involved large expenditures in the way of judicial proceedings; and that may be consistent. So you may go on and enumerate. If you are disposed to give up the public service, there is no end to your retrenchment. But the question for the Senate of the United States is, What does the public service demand? That is the question that comes home to every one of us, and that is the paramount question wherever it arises.

Further on we come to the Court of Claims. Has the Court of Claims any claims on Congress? We established the Court of Claims; we invite suitors there; we inspire the confidence that they will have justice done them there; and the legitimate inference would be that we would pay the judgments if they are against us. Well, they are estimated to have rendered judgments to the amount of $2,000,000 against the United States, but not a farthing is appropriated in the bill, not a penny. What becomes of the Court of Claims or what becomes of the judgments of suitors? Their payment awaits what? It awaits the good favor of the House of Representatives to appropriate money to pay the judgments which the suitors having been invited into the court have obtained against the Government of the United States. That is $2,000,000 more. I believe in almost every instance those judgments have passed through the Supreme Court of the United States and have the sanction of it. Now, it is an easy thing to save money in that way. Any man almost in his private affairs can be very saving if he will pocket other people's money and then refuse to pay his debts and he can get immunity from it. That is one way to reduce expenditures—an easy way!

Then again there is the item of public buildings, and a saving of $1,987,160 is made over last year for public buildings. Well, I agree that that is a field where there is the exercise of a discretion undoubtedly, and undoubtedly this is one of the years when a sound discretion should be exercised; but my own belief about it is, considering these public buildings as a necessity, and considering the money spent in them an investment which is not lost, that we have cut them down unreasonably. Yet the House thought otherwise, and the Senate consented. I believe we objected in one or two cases, Saint Louis was one; we generally concurred with the House. What has been saved? It is said, and the idea is given out, of large saving in public expenditures. Are we not going to finish these buildings? Of course we are. If we do not finish them this year, is it money absolutely saved? That depends upon whether you can sell the buildings for what they cost, and want to sell them; but if they are to stand there to waste, it is not money saved, it is not a just economy and a just administration of public affairs at all. I am accounting, remember now, Mr. President, for the reductions this year from the expenditures and appropriations last year.

Now I come to the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, $800,000. That is saved by the ordinary operations of the public service. We are not doing as much printing, and I hope we shall do less. The good day indicated by the resumption act, by the abolition of note printing and the introduction of silver, enables us to do that. It will enable us to do many more things, and when it is consummated our finances will be in a much better condition than they are at present.

Another item is as to the surveys of the public lands. Usually we appropriate something like a million or a little more than a million dollars to survey the public lands. Our domain is immense, as you know. It has been considered a good policy to survey the public lands. Heretofore I believe without exception, during the whole series of years that I know anything about the Senate, we have thought it one of the proper things to be done to open the public domain, to survey the public domain, and last year we appropriated about $1,000,000 for that purpose. This year it is thought good economy to save $630,000 on that, and so for that particular item there is that much less than was appropriated last year.

But I shall weary the patience of the Senate, I am sure, if I go on with these items. I give you these samples. This is the way these appropriations have been reduced. In many instances I approve them; in many instances, I am sorry to say, I do not to the extent proposed; but where the service has been flexible, where the House of Representatives has a right to exercise judgment, in regard to that, in every instance, the Committee on Appropriations on the part of the Senate have made ample concessions; and we are not dividing on any of them.

Now let me refer to one other item which is of a class omitted entirely from the public service, and goes into this estimate. We appropriated last year $1,060,000 toward the government of the District of Columbia. I would not like to enter upon that subject; but that we have some obligations to the District of Columbia I think is apparent from the fact that it is the capital of the nation; we have public buildings and grounds here; we own in the way of valuation at least one-half of all the property here, and in the end we shall have much more than one-half of all that is or ever will be here. We have an interest in it. That we have no obligations toward it, for myself, I have never supposed. I have believed that we have obligations to it. There is an administration here, civil and political, and we owe something to it. The appropriations for it last year were $1,060,000, not a penny this. What is to be done? I appeal to the Senate now whether that is a right thing to do in regard to the District of Columbia. I appeal to the Senate whether they believe there is a condition of things in this country which justifies the Congress of the United States in neglecting altogether any contribution to the government of the District of Columbia. That is the way to save money apparently; that is the way to keep down an appropriation bill; and does anybody suppose that the District of Columbia will have no claim on us in the future? Is there any Senator here who expects to be here next December who does not expect to hear the clamor come up from the District of Columbia for help? Does anybody here believe that there is any saving in leaving it out now? For myself I do not believe it. The Senate did non-concur in this matter so far as to appropriate $500,000, the fate of which I have not learned; but I have said sufficient upon that branch of the subject.

I wish now to say one thing more as to what the Senate has done approximately, and I shall relieve the patience of the Senate. I think it necessary that I should inform the Senate, because we are supposed to have been a little disposed to hold back from what the House of Representa ives has done in a spirit of economy. I have already stated that the sundry civil appropriation bill last year was $29,000,000 in round numbers. The House made it $15,000,000 this year in round numbers, and the Senate made it $19,000,000. The Senate you will see appropriates $10,000,000 less than it did last year. On what ground do they do that? It will be said at once, "on the ground that you are not so expensive this year;" and therefore it becomes necessary for us to consider the elements that go into this reduction of the Senate bill from $29,000,000 to $19,000,000, a reduction of $10,000,000.

Without specifying details, seeing the purpose of the House of Representatives to make the greatest possible economy in their judgment, and being disposed to meet the House of Representatives upon that basis, which I have already considered somewhat at length in stating their side of it, we have reduced the public service beyond what we believe it ought to be. That is the way to account for it and that is the way it stands. I will enumerate some of the branches of the service where we have made concessions which will have to be made good by an appropriation by a deficiency bill next year as certain as the service exists.

The revenue-cutter service has been reduced $250,000. I do not think it ought to be reduced a dollar. It is that sort of service that has a perfect establishment. You cannot reduce it without injuring its efficiency. But we yielded to that.

Take the judicial expenses of the Government, $838,000 reduction. Upon any basis that we know anything about, upon the representation of the Department of Justice, the appropriation is too low; but between this and December what they have got is enough, and when December comes the Department of Justice will raise its voice to justice for its needs, and a deficiency bill will supply what we now leave out.

Now as to public buildings; we put them in last year and would have been glad to put in this year; but out of deference to the House we agreed to leave them out.

Then you come to the Washington Aqueduct, $790,000; and then to the District of Columbia, $1,060,000, to which I have already referred; we leave that out except as to $500,000, the fate of which I say we do not know.

In this way it will be seen that I explain on behalf of the Committee on Appropriations of the Senate how it is that we consent to reduce the appropriations in the sundry civil bill from $29,000,000 to $19,000,000, and are still perfectly consistent with the idea that the public service is not what it is supposed to have been.

One other observation and I shall have done. It is said that what we have witnessed since this Congress began is all in the interest of an exigent public necessity; that the deficiency of our revenue estimates demands all that is being done and much more besides. I think it was enunciated on the floor of the Senate in that kind of emphasis which I was complained of exercising by my honorable friend from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN]—I would remind him that he sometimes gets emphatic—that it was obvious that we must retrench, or tax, or borrow to preserve the public credit. It was a phrase so compact and so easy of transportation that it went everywhere; and particularly as it went from the lips of my honorable friend at the time it did, it made an impression all over the country that we were absolutely in a dilemma where we must either tax or borrow money, or must do some extraordinary thing in regard to expenditures. Of course I make no objection to the emphasis of my honorable friend, but to the general statement I do.

Now what is the fact? The late Secretary of the Treasury in his report told us that the receipts for the next year would be equal to all the obligations of the Government, including the sinking fund. I know, in answer to that, it will be said that since that time there has been a falling off in the customs revenue. That is true; but how much? Not above $6,000,000. And do those who reckon in that way know that the balances saved from the appropriations of the last year nearly meet the deficiencies up to this time? That is never taken into account; nobody has even observed that so far as I know. Ah, it may be said that we appropriated extravagantly last year. No, not at all. Under the present accountability of the Departments it has become the policy of Congress, and no sounder policy ever did exist, to say to these Departments, "You shall not spend one dollar for anything except for that for which it was specifically appropriated." Therefore, it will be seen that it has become the necessity of Congress to appropriate amply for the service, and the balance goes into the public Treasury. That accounts for the latitude in some of the branches where appropriations have been made. But what has been the result? The accountability under the act of 1870 has become so strict and so exacting that whoever is disposed to read the estimates, the appropriations, and the expenditures of the Government can tell what they are for each year with as much certainty as he can tell the state of his own private account, unless there is fraud and forgery in the exhibit. Now what I mean to say is that the expenditures of this year fall short of last year over $6,000,000.

As to next year, the latest estimate that I know anything of from the Treasury is: From customs, $150,000,000; from internal revenue, $122,000,000; from miscellaneous sources, $19,000,000; making $291,000,000 in all. If those receipts are to be realized, and they stand as against $303,000,000 last year, then the revenues of this Government are ample for all its purposes. Of course, it does not lie in human wisdom to say with entire accuracy whether that will be so or not. General causes operate upon our customs receipts and upon our internal revenue; but the probability, from the best information the Department has upon the subject, is that our revenues from all sources will amount to $291,000,000, which will be, according to the appropriations of this year, ample to meet all the obligations of the Government, including the sinking fund.

Mr. CONKLING. May I, without incommoding the Senator, ask him a question?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Certainly, for I am about through.

Mr. CONKLING. Will he be good enough to state first the difference in the post-office appropriation bill between the amount proposed by the Senate and the amount to which the Senate ultimately agreed; and the same statement, if he has it before him, touching the naval appropriation bill?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I can give that information as furnished to me very kindly and courteously by the chairman of the House committee. I have a list of all the bills, and I will give it to the Senate if it is desirable. Take the pensions; the pension bill, as reported by the House, was $29,923,500, and as passed by the Senate the same.

Mr. WINDOM. At that point I will suggest to the Senator whether that is not the whole estimate for this year.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Precisely.

Mr. CONKLING. And there the two Houses agreed in the beginning; that is, we adopted the House bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. We adopted the House bill. That was the appropriation. It was simply the estimate, and understood by both Houses to be the exact demands of the service.

The Military Academy bill was $231,241 as passed by the House, $280,850 by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. What was the amount agreed upon?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The bill is in conference. The consular and diplomatic bill as it passed the House was $922,847.50, and as it passed the Senate $1,341,647.50, which was the estimate and the appropriation for last year. The fortification bill was $315,000 as it came from the House, and the Senate passed it in concurrence at the same amount. The legislative, executive, and judicial bill as reported to the House was $14,009,871.61; as it passed the Senate, $16,635,338. As it is still in conference it cannot be told how it will come out. It will probably be somewhat reduced from what it passed the Senate, perhaps half a million or a million. On the basis of the proposition of the Senate conferees it will be reduced at the rate of from half a million to a million.

The river and harbor bill, somewhat unlike the exterior defenses, as it passed the House appropriated $5,872,850. It is still with the committee of the Senate, and of course I can say nothing of that. The deficiency bill for this year was $671,486.74 as it passed the House, and $840,831.27 as it passed the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. Has that bill been agreed to?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. That bill has been agreed to, and appropriates for the deficiencies of the entire service for this year, except a small bill that passed early in the session in regard to some expenses of the House of Representatives.

The post-office bill as it passed the House appropriated $4,230,906 as deficiency over the postal revenues, and as it passed the Senate $7,286,647. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. WEST] is better informed on this subject. There has been a conference upon it and there has been an agreement, and my understanding is that the result is a reduction of the bill somewhat as it passed the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. That amounts to $5,667,498, as given by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Reduced a million from what it passed the Senate, and that results from some change of the public service, precisely what I am not well advised.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask my friend from Maine if it is true—it has been stated elsewhere—that the compensation of the great body of the postmasters has been raised rather than lowered by that conference report?

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. I do not know that I can speak with entire accuracy about that; but I should answer, from what I understand about it, numerically yes; that is to say, the salaries, as applicable to the lower class, which are the numerous class, have been raised; but my colleague will know how that is.

Mr. SHERMAN. I understand it has been stated elsewhere, and it ought to be put on record here, that the salaries of the great body of postmasters have been raised by the action of the committee of conference on the post-office bill.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. My understanding of that is—and if I am incorrect my colleague, who is chairman of that committee, will correct me—that the salaries of all postmasters below $1,500, who number about thirty thousand, have been increased either directly or indirectly.

Mr. HAMLIN. No, sir.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. Then I withdraw anything I have said on that subject as being inaccurate and ill-advised.

Mr. HAMLIN. If my colleague will allow me, I think in the scale adopted by the committee of conference it is probable that in one case in twenty that scale operates to increase some small offices and I think usually in less than $100, while the general reduction of the whole scale is between $400,000 and $500,000.

Mr. EDMUNDS. On salaries?

Mr. HAMLIN. On salaries.

Mr. MORTON. What percentage on the larger salaries?

Mr. HAMLIN. The postmasters that received $4,000 are uniformly reduced to $3,000 and some below $3,000. Those who received $3,000 are reduced perhaps on a general average to about $2,500.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The naval bill as it passed the House of Representatives was $12,432,855.40, and as it passed the Senate $14,857,855, and as it became a law, $12,740,000. The Indian bill as it passed the House appropriated $3,900,000 in round numbers, and as it passed the Senate $4,900,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. Will my friend allow me to read what was stated by a member of the conference committee in the House, which I think is proper as matter of historical information? The Senator from Maine ought to correct it if it is wrong.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think the Senator ought to read anything that was said in the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. As a matter of information?

Mr. EDMUNDS. If it is read it must be commented on, and that leads to the difficulty the rule meant to prevent.

Mr. SHERMAN. I do not propose to comment on it at all, but to state facts.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But it would give anybody else the right to comment on it, and I do not think that is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SHERMAN. I call the attention of the Senator from Maine to a statement made positively, and he can correct it himself in parliamentary language.

Mr. MORRILL, of Maine. The Army bill as it passed the House was $23,192,334.22 and as it passed the Senate $27,715,572.20. The sundry civil bill I have already stated.

And, now, Mr. President, I have done. Thanking the Senate for their great consideration and patience, apologizing to them for the severe infliction I fear I have put upon them and knowing that I am not likely to repeat it, I take my leave of the subject and the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. Mr. President, the principle involved in the discussion this morning and in the apprehended dead lock between the two bodies is one of the utmost importance to the independence and character of this body, and it is one which, if carried out, involves the existence of any form of government, two houses instead of one constituting its legislative department. Has the House of Representatives a right to say to the Senate, "We will refuse to make appropriations which the general laws of the land require unless you will consent to the alteration of those laws; we will refuse to make an appropriation unless you consent that some law, which is obnoxious to one party or to the House, shall be changed or repealed?" That proposition involves the principle of nullification, pure and simple; it involves the precise position taken by the State of South Carolina in 1831 and 1832. South Carolina then said to the Government of the United States: "The tariff law is unconstitutional, and it is obnoxious; unless you repeal that law we will nullify it." Now, has the House of Representatives on the one hand, or the Senate on the other, a right to say to the other House, "A general law is obnoxious or it is unconstitutional in our view; unless you consent to repeal or to modify that law we will nullify it by withholding all the appropriations necessary to carry into operation the existing law?" Whenever either House takes that position it is nullification, it is revolution, and you can make nothing else out of it.

Mr. BOGY. That is to say, you mean that the Senate nullifies the action of the House.

Mr. MORTON. No, sir; I say if either House puts itself into that position, that is nullification. For example, here is a general law on the subject of the tariff. Suppose the Senate should say to the House—to avoid giving offense I will put it in that form—suppose the Senate says to the House "This tariff law is wrong," and, when the appropriation bill comes, attaches an amendment to it repealing certain sections of the tariff law, the House does not agree to that amendment, therefore the Senate says, "If you do not consent to this modification of the tariff law we will withhold all appropriations for custom-houses, for the collection of the revenue; we will nullify the whole law on the subject of collecting duties upon imports." If the Senate puts itself in that position, the Senate is a revolutionary and a nullifying body, and cannot justify its action for one moment; or if the House puts itself in that position, it assumes the attitude of a revolutionary or nullifying body.

Take for example the Army bill. Suppose the House attaches to the Army bill a provision repealing an election law, a law providing for the purity of elections; the Senate will not consent to the repeal of the election law; the House says, therefore, "We will make no appropriations for the Army." It says to us, "Repeal the election law or we will strike down the Army." That is no legitimate argument. Neither House has a right to do anything of that kind; that is the end of a government by two Houses instead of one. We should then be driven to go back to the old Roman senate, or to the French system, and have but one House instead of having two. If the House says: "You like the election law so well you will not repeal it, we will destroy the Army; take your choice; take your choice between giving up the election law or giving up the Army entirely," the House has no right to say that to us; it is the end of government if it does. Whether the election law is right or not is a question which the House has a right to present as a separate proposition; it is a fair matter of discussion between the two Houses. If we cannot agree to repeal or to amend it, the law must stand. But when the House comes in and says, "Repeal that or we will destroy the Army," that is illegitimate, it is revolutionary. It is the old argument, "Your money or your life."

So in regard to the Treasury Department. The House says, "The Treasury Department is one-half too large; it has too many employés; now, agree to reduce them one-half or we will destroy the whole Department, we will refuse to make any appropriations at all for the Department." Has the House a right to do that? As to whether a general law providing for the organization of the Treasury Department ought to be amended is a fair question for debate; but if it is not amended, it must stand; and until it is changed it is the duty of both Houses to appropriate according to the requirements of that law. But suppose the House says, "The Treasury Department is too large; it is too costly; reduce it one-half, or we will destroy it." Is that legitimate; is that constitutional? Can you carry on this Government upon that principle at all? Certainly not.

Take the case of the Army. Suppose it is proposed to reduce the Army one-half. We do not agree to that. The House says, "Then we will destroy the Army altogether; take one-half or take none; you must either take half a loaf of bread or take none." Suppose they should say in regard to the Navy: "The Navy is too large by one-half; reduce it one-half, or you shall have no Navy at all; we will make no appropriation for a single ship; we will tie them up at the docks to rot, or we will anchor them out in the stream and let them sink gradually." I therefore appeal to the Senate upon the principle involved here. I say that sort of threat, "Yield to our views about the election law, yield to our views about the size of the Army, yield to our views about the cost of the Treasury Department, yield to our views upon this subject and that, or if you do not do it we will destroy the Government," that argument is illegitimate, it is unconstitutional.

If there is a proposition on an appropriation bill to change a general law, if both Houses do not concur in it, then the House proposing it should yield. In other words, they have no right under the Constitution and under their oaths to withhold the necessary appropriations because the change of a law outside of these appropriations is not conceded. We are now brought face to face with that principle. If it is proper for the House to say to us, "Reduce your Army one-half or we will destroy it," they then put us in that trying position, and we should be required to argue with ourselves, "Well, must we yield up our convictions in order to save a part of the Army?" Has one House the right to put the other in that position? Suppose the House says to us, "Yield up your convictions about the election law," an outside thing altogether, affecting other matters; "yield that up or we will take away from you the Army, we will make no appropriations for it at all, and of course it must fall to pieces." Can the House say that inside of constitutional government? I say not. Beware, then, of the precedent you set in this matter. If one House can nullify a law because the other House does not consent to amend it, it is the end of a government with two Houses. We should then come back to one House only, where there can be no conflict of that kind.

It is then, Mr. President, a sharp issue, and there is no dodging it. The simple question is whether we shall be driven to a change of general legislation by the threat of destroying the Government, or of stopping the wheels of Government, or of stopping a particular department in the Government. That is the whole question. They can argue with us upon general principles, persuade us that the thing is wrong, that it ought to be changed; but to say to us, "If you do not agree to what we want, then we will destroy the whole thing," is no argument addressed to our reason. It is simply an argument addressed to our fears. We are, then, put in the position of saying we would rather yield on this subject than have the Government stop; we would rather surrender our judgment than to lose the Army or lose the Navy, or stop the wheels of the Treasury or any other Department of the Government. It does seem to me that no Senator can consent for one moment to the recognition of that principle. Whenever the argument of destruction is addressed to us we should resist it, and we should say to those who offer that argument and take that position, "Take the consequences of your revolutionary and unconstitutional proceedings."

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, will the Chair state what the question is that is before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine moves that the Senate further insist on its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives.

Mr. THURMAN. That I supposed to be the question; and, so far as I know and believe, there is not a Senator in this Chamber who is not prepared to support that motion; and, if the question had been taken upon it as soon as it was made, it would have been unanimously adopted, and the Senate could have gone on with the quiet and orderly proceedings of the body. In view of this fact, I for one cannot help feeling some surprise that the very air of this Chamber has rung, for the last few hours I was going to say, but at any rate for an hour or more, with language of alarm, with language calculated to excite people's fears and imaginations, with talk about threatening the destruction of the Government, stopping the wheels of the Government, nullification, reducing the Senate to the condition of an effete House of Lords, and the like. Why, in the name of common sense and reason, what ground is there for all this declamation? Who has heard of any threat of destroying the Government? Because the House of Representatives exercises its own judgment, who is authorized either directly or by implication to charge that House, or a majority of its members, with being any less patriotic or any less devoted to the Constitution, or any less devoted to the Government than the Senators on this floor? Who is authorized to treat their adherence to their own opinion upon an appropriation bill, peculiarly a subject for legislation by the House, as a menace to the Senate, an attempt to coerce the Senate, an attempt to carry an obnoxious measure by a threat of stopping the wheels of Government? I must say, Mr. President, that if we are to have the appropriation bills passed, if the Government wheels are to run smoothly, this is not a very good way to achieve that purpose.

What is this great complaint that is made? That the House has introduced legislation into an appropriation bill? Pray is this the first instance of legislation in an appropriation bill? The Senator from Indiana alludes to an election law and says the House wants it repealed. How did that election law come to be the law? How did that measure which for the first time subjected the elections of the States to the supervision of Federal officials become a law? There, sir, it lies before me [holding up the statute-book] in the midst of an appropriation bill—put in the midst of an appropriation bill in this very Senate. That is how it came to be a law. But if the House cannot put legislation in an appropriation bill, or the Senate cannot do so without infringing upon the rights of the other branch of the Legislature, pray let me ask the Senator from Indiana, who talks about nullification, what right have both Houses together to put legislation in an appropriation bill and coerce the executive department, the President, to sign the bill or go without the means of carrying on the Government?

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me to answer?

Mr. THURMAN. When I am done, because I know from experience the Senator will make a speech instead of answering a single question. I say it is idle alarm; and it is extraordinary that at this stage of the session the time of the Senate should be occupied by speeches that sound much more like speeches from the stump than speeches from the Senate Hall.

Mr. President, there is no man on this floor who approves, when it can be avoided, inserting important legislation in appropriation bills. We all admit that it is a vicious practice. Everybody, I have no doubt, in the House admits that it is a vicious practice. Every party has admitted that it is a vicious practice; and yet every party has done it under peculiar circumstances. Every party has from time to time resorted to it. They have not gone as far as our English ancestors. They have not made a grant of subsidy by the House of Commons a condition of grants to be made by the Throne, or concessions to be made by the House of Lords. No House of Representatives has ever done that yet. No House of Representatives has ever said to the President yet "We grant you subsidies on condition that you do thus and so." Our English ancestors have done it again and again. It was the strongest weapon of the people against the prerogative of the Crown. But under our form of government the President is supposed to have no prerogative, to be an independent branch of a limited government, and not to be coerced as the English House of Commons has coerced the monarchs of England. That is our idea, and therefore I do not say that the House of Representatives should ever go as far as the British Commons have gone; but I do remember when a certain Andrew Johnson was President of the United States that more than once he was compelled to swallow most distasteful legislation or let the appropriation bills fail. It was considered a good precedent then to make him acquiesce in the policy of the dominant party in these Halls.

Now, Mr. President, there is no nullification at all in this business; there is no disrespect to the Senate in the action of the House. I will take one of the cases put by the Senator from Indiana. He said, "Suppose the House should say 'reduce the Navy one-half or we will make no appropriations for the Navy.'" Sir, I can suppose a case in which it would be the duty of the House to say that very thing, in which it would be for the public interest rather to abolish the Navy altogether than to maintain it at the status in which it existed at the time; and so with the Army, and so with almost any other department that is not absolutely essential to the working of the Government. Of course you cannot abolish the judiciary without abolishing the means of obtaining justice. You cannot abolish the Treasury. Of course you can do no such thing as that. You must provide for the executive department. But I take the very case put, and I say that upon the high responsibility of their oaths and their duty to the country, it might be, although not likely to be, that the House or the Senate would be justified in saying, "Reduce the Army one-half, reduce the Navy one-half, or take the alternative of no Army or no Navy at all." That might be so.

Mr. SHERMAN. Does my colleague now assert in the presence of the American people that either House of Congress may say that the Army must be reduced one-half or entirely abolished, the Navy reduced one-half or entirely abolished, at the will of a single House of Congress?

Mr. THURMAN. Who said that? I say that if that is the judgment of that House it is bound to stand by its judgment; if that is its judgment it has a right to stand by its judgment. That is no dictating to the other House. Each House must stand by its judgment. What right has either House to say to the other, "You shall not exercise your own judgment?" That will not do at all, Mr. President. It is no dictating; it is no violation of either the letter or the spirit of the Constitution. The House of Representatives say, "We consider a certain reform more material than a certain appropriation." Now, if it were reduced to a single appropriation no one would hesitate for a moment in saying that the House was perfectly right. You might say that one House would not be right in losing a whole appropriation bill for an entire Department of the public service because of the refusal of the other to repeal a particular obnoxious piece of legislation; and yet if it were reduced to a single appropriation in regard to a single item every one would say at once that if that appropriation was not absolutely essential to the carrying on of the Government the House might, if in its judgment it was proper, say, "Repeal that legislation or you do not get that appropriation."

Mr. MORTON. Will the Senator allow me a question?

Mr. THURMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. MORTON. The Senator is speaking of the election law, and says it was an amendment put by the Senate into an appropriation bill. So it was. Now suppose when that bill went back to the House of Representatives that House had refused to accept the amendment and sent the bill back to the Senate; if the Senate had then said, "You must accept this election law, or we will make no appropriation," the action of the Senate would have been nullification and revolution. But the House did not say that; the House took the election law, and it became the law of the land. Now the House puts a provision to repeal the election law on an appropriation bill. If the House should say to us, "Repeal this law or we will make no appropriation," what would that be but nullification and revolution?

Mr. THURMAN. O, nullification, Mr. President, is like a great many other things that are flaunted in people's faces now, that are full of sound and fury, and signifying nothing. There is no nullification in it at all. If without any good reason, if upon some mere proposition to repeal some insignificant law, or to enact some insignificant law, either House should say to the other, "Unless you enact this law, or unless you repeal this law, insignificant or unimportant, there shall be no appropriations at all to carry on the Government," that, I agree, would in practice be revolutionary; but you must judge every case by its own particular merits. If you had a President in the executive chair that you had good reason to believe was seeking to overthrow the liberties of this country, some man who was contriving to march into the Hall of the House of Representatives and tell his underlings to "remove that bauble," the mace of the Speaker, and to say to the Representatives, "Leave this chamber; the Lord has no further use for you;" some man like Napoleon, to enter into the French Assembly and order them out at the point of the bayonet—if you had reason to believe that there was some man at the other end of the Avenue plotting against the liberties of the people and the Constitution of his country, you would be perfectly right in refusing him one dollar; nay, it would be your duty to do it. That would not be revolution; that would not be nullification; but that would be the exercise of the power vested in you by the Constitution for the preservation of the Constitution and the liberties of the people.

But what is the use of talking as if we stood upon a volcano? What is the use of this alarm this morning? Here is a case of a very serious disagreement, I admit, between the two Houses; but no one has a right to suppose that either House is more patriotic than the other or that either House means to menace or to threaten the other.

Mr. President, I shall not go into anything like an examination of the figures presented by the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations. I am not qualified to do so. I do not belong to that committee; nor have I been, fortunately for me, on any of these committees of conference. If I were I should want time to examine his figures and his statements. I do not complain that he has made a statement for the Senate, although I must say, if I may do so, as I do with entire respect for him, entire respect for the intellect and the services of that distinguished Senator, that there was something of vehemence and passion in his manner this morning that did not look like the beginning of a peace conference; and when it is followed up by declamation about nullification and by an appeal to Senators not to have their independence trampled under foot by the House of Representatives, I do not quite understand the scene that has been enacted here to-day.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President, I certainly did not intend to take any part in this discussion, but the language uttered by the Senator from Ohio has been of such an extraordinary character that I feel called upon at least to make some remarks in reply to a portion of the statements made by him. The particular remark that calls upon me to say anything was that if the House of Representatives or the Senate either should conceive the idea that any branch of the Government, or, to state it as he did, that the Army or the Navy was in excess of what it ought to be, they would be perfectly justified in refusing an appropriation unless a reduction was made.

Mr. THURMAN. I did not say that broadly at all.

Mr. LOGAN. Then I will ask the Senator to state what he did say.

Mr. THURMAN. I said there might be a case; I did not say that case was now.

Mr. LOGAN. I did not say that you said it was now.

Mr. THURMAN. I said I could suppose a case in which it would be perfectly justifiable for either branch of Congress to take that ground.

Mr. LOGAN. Very well.

Mr. THURMAN. I can recollect when this country would have gone on in the old times of peace, perfect peace and quiet, when, if there had not been one hundred soldiers in the United States, the Government would have got along as well and the people been as happy as if there had been all that there were then.

Mr. LOGAN. The Senator from Ohio seems to be excited this morning, and probably he does not see exactly the force of the remarks he makes himself.

Now, sir, I believe that the statement made by the Senator that a case might arise where one House would have the right to demand of the other that they should do certain things or have no appropriation to carry on the Army is revolutionary in fact. It is what the Senator from Indiana denominated it, both nullification and revolution; and the suggestion probably is timely that where revolutions may not be successful by force they may possibly be brought about in a peaceful manner by stubbornness. There would be no way more effective in this country to disorganize and destroy the Government than for one House to take upon itself to demand of the other that it should agree to a certain character of legislation or have no appropriations to carry on the Government. Why, sir, there could be no more effective plan adopted for the destruction of the Government than that would be.

Let us see for a moment, and I desire to discuss this matter in a dispassionate way. The two Houses of Congress, if I understand the Constitution, are based upon a perfect equality. They both are the representatives of the people, the members of the House the direct representatives of the people and the members of the Senate the representatives of the people of the various States, each House having equal power in matters of legislation; and neither branch has a right to say that anything shall be a law unless the other branch concurs. This, I believe, is a fair statement of the proposition; and when any Representative or Senator shall say that either branch of Congress has a right to demand that certain legislation shall occur or certain things shall not occur, they are usurpers of a power which the Constitution does not give them. They are attempting to take upon themselves the power of the House of Commons, not under a constitution like ours, where the powers are assigned and delegated to each branch of the Government.

In reference to appropriation bills, the Senator says that many times legislation has been interpolated in such bills. That is true; legislation has been put upon appropriation bills by either House of Congress at different times; but it was such legislation as was in consonance with the views of both Houses of Congress; it was such legislation as both Houses of Congress concurred in; and when both Houses concur in certain legislation it is, although not a good precedent, immaterial whether it is on an appropriation bill or not. But when one House proposes to put legislation on an appropriation bill and the other does not concur, then it is an attempt to force legislation that both branches of Congress do not agree to; which is unconstitutional legislation, for the Constitution requires the assent of both branches of Congress, and of the President also, to make legislation perfect.

Now, look at the attempt that is made and the argument that is made. I notice from reading the RECORD that certain gentlemen assert that the House of Representatives has the right, they do not say in so many words, to legislate, but that is clearly the inference, in respect to money bills. It has been asserted in this Congress that the House of Representatives has the sole right to originate and suggest what money bills shall be, and that it is the duty of the Senate to assent to that because the House has the right of origination. I differ with that logic. I do not believe the House has the sole right to originate appropriation bills. By precedent alone they have the right. The only right of originating bills given to the House alone is as to bills for the raising of revenue. They have a right to originate all bills for raising revenue, tax-bills, bills in reference to the tariff; but an appropriation bill to expend money is a different thing; and yet I do not care to discuss it, because precedent has given their origination to the House. Let them have it; but they have no right to say that because they originate such bills they can legislate as they please in them without the concurrence and sanction of the Senate and the President.

Now, what do they propose? They propose that, unless we reduce the Army by a very great reduction in numbers, muster out certain officers, hold others in reserve until vacancies occur, and also reduce their salaries to a very great and considerable extent, there shall be no money appropriated for the Army of the United States. They propose that unless we transfer the Indian Bureau to the War Department there shall be no money appropriated for the Indian service. They propose that unless we repeal the election law as applied to cities of over 20,000 population on the sundry civil bill there shall be no appropriation for the objects covered by that bill. I do not know that they propose to stand by that, but that is their proposition on appropriation bills and they say that they have the right to place this legislation upon them and that it is our duty to assent to it.

For one, while I remain in this body I am a representative in part of my State, sent here under and by virtue of the power of the people, a right having been given to them by the Constitution to be represented here for the purpose of joining in legislation; and unless my consent with that of others making a majority, or a majority without my consent, shall concur with the House in a bill proposed by them, it is not legislation; and I say to my brother-Senators now that when an attempt is made to put a law on the statute-book by putting it in an appropriation bill that does not meet my views, if the House do not withdraw it, it never can have my assent, and if I were in the House of Representatives I would maintain the same proposition. If I were in the House of Representatives the Senate should not force upon me, at least, a law if my voice was required to give it assent, to give it force, unless that law was in accordance with my views.

But it was said here the other day that the Army was once regulated by an appropriation bill. That is true, but that was by the consent of both Houses of Congress. It was a bill that I draughted myself and the only difference between the House and the Senate was in details. That bill was agreed to by both Houses of Congress and was put on an appropriation bill by a committee of conference, and not in the House or in the Senate. I offered it in the committee of conference myself, and it was agreed to; agreed to because both Houses were in favor of that line of policy, although they differed in reference to the details of the matter. But I being on the committee of conference then, if the Senate had said, "We do not concur in that legislation," I would have said "of course I shall withdraw it." It would have been my duty to do so as one of the conferees; it would have been the duty of the House to do it, as it is now; and I would do the same as a Senator. Any proposition that we should put on an appropriation bill that did not meet the assent of the House, I would vote at once to withdraw from the appropriation bill when it was returned to the Senate, because we have no right to say "Stand and deliver, or give me your life." No, sir; this proposition, in my judgment, is for the purpose of making a little capital before the country. If any capital can be made before the country by refusing to appropriate money to carry on the affairs of this Government, gentlemen are perfectly welcome to have the benefit of it so far as I am concerned. If it was left to me—and I only speak for myself—I would stay here until the termination of my time in the Senate before I would ever agree to a proposition on an appropriation bill because it was demanded with a hand at my throat. I would stand and say "Appropriate the money under the law as the law requires, a certain amount of expenditure for the purpose of carrying on the Government. That amount of money I will appropriate; but when you come to put on the appropriation bills vicious legislation and that which I do not consent to, I never will agree to do and never consent to it so far as I am concerned."

It is not necessary for one House to undertake to drive the other; it is not necessary for one House to undertake to demand of the other that they shall do certain things unless we lose our independence as a deliberative body. And, sir, I will say further—I might as well say it while I am up—that this attempt at legislation on appropriation bills at this time for the purpose of destroying the efficiency of the civil service and for the purpose of destroying the efficiency of the Army means more than economy. Why destroy the efficiency of the Army? The purpose I leave to the gentlemen engaged in that business to say, but it is for some purpose either hidden or not; and the same object is in view when an attempt is made to derange and destroy the civil service of the Government. If I had my hand on a man's throat, and he was too strong for me, I might resort to some other device, some other means I might use for his destruction. So it may be with gentlemen now who have failed of success perhaps in times gone by to take control of the affairs of this nation in one way. It may possibly be that another way seems to be a better one to obtain that strong hold and that control than the one they attempted once before. If Senators and Representatives desire to legislate honestly and fairly, and Senators and Representatives being out of power for the purpose of obtaining power legislate so that the country may understand that they intend if they get control to act honestly and fairly, does any Senator suppose that he is going to gain the confidence of this country, so recently out of confidence with him, by attempting to legislate to stop the very wheels of government? Does any party suppose that it is going to obtain the confidence of the people by destroying at the very start the machinery of government? Does any party suppose that it is going to obtain the confidence of these forty millions of people by as soon as they get only one branch of Congress taking steps by which they destroy the efficiency of the Government merely to obtain power? If you believe that, you have less appreciation of the intelligence of the American people, in my judgment, than you ought to have. They are intelligent; they understand political maneuvers about as well as the gentlemen who are engaged in them; and when they come to look at the case it will be pretty easy for them to see what there is beneath. The whole country will see it, and you take nothing by the hip.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I have only a few suggestions to offer. As I understand, the motion before us is for another conference committee on the bill making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government. The chairman has stated to us that the differences between the two Houses on this bill are, first, that the House is in favor of reducing the number of employés in all the Departments, including both Houses, about twelve hundred in number; and the other difference is in reference to increasing some salary, which the Senator said was not very large; I did not hear him state the amount. Surely all this debate about destroying the Government, about nullification and revolution, has no application to the bill in hand. Every business man, every company having numbers of employés, owing to the changing times, the reduction of the price of living, the cutting off of profits of business, is reducing its employés and reducing their pay. I assure gentlemen that the people of this country will stand a great deal of this kind of revolution.

The chairman of our committee said that they were willing to reduce these employés by one-third of the number of twelve hundred; that is, by about four hundred. This bill reaches over all the Departments and the employés of both Houses. I think every one knows that in times past the number has grown up beyond what is necessary. I think the times have changed, so that some reduction in salaries would be appropriate. I submit that there is nothing to alarm any one in this proposition. I doubt not another conference committee, as is asked for, conferring with the House in the right spirit, will be able to agree. Surely I hope that this body will be ready to yield considerably in reference to reducing the employés of the Departments and reducing their salaries.

I trust, therefore, we shall not discuss the Army bill now, or any other bill, but have another committee of conference, and I hope they will agree in reducing the number considerably and in reducing their salaries also somewhat.

Mr. BOGY. Mr. President, I regret at this late hour of the session and under the circumstances now surrounding us, that this debate should have been forced upon the Senate; but we who believe in honest reform, and that the expenses of the Government have been too large and should be reduced to a smaller amount, and who also believe that there has been great extravagance heretofore, have a right to say something in reply to the most singular arguments which have been made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. MORTON] and the Senator from Illinois, [Mr. LOGAN.]

The House, acting in obedience to a voice which is heard all around this whole country—the voice of both parties calling for economy and reform, which is a command of the people—has attempted to reduce the expenses of the Government. How has that been met by the Senate? The motives of the House have been assailed by both of the Senators; and this is not the first time that this has been done by different Senators on the other side.

The Senator from Indiana says that this is nullification, and an attempt to destroy the Government; and if it is permitted to go on, we shall soon get to the condition of the French government or of the old Roman governments, with only one house. If there be any nullification, it springs from the Senate and not from the House. The Senator from Indiana cannot deny that the House has, if not the exclusive right, nevertheless the right to give us an honest opinion as to what amount may be proper in any appropriation bill. It has that right beyond any doubt. The Senate has the right to oppose to the House its own views. That we have expended for all the different branches of the Government heretofore too large a sum of money is a fact undeniable. It is also the right of the Senate to say whether they will concur with the House or not; but it is not nullification for the House to insist upon its own view. When the day comes that the Senate will have the exclusive power to state to the House, "Unless you maintain the former status of extravagance, unless you maintain the Army as it is now, whatever it may be, we will consent to no reduction;" and it may also say, "Unless you consent to maintain an appropriation of $300,000,000 annually to carry on this Government, as is the case now, we will consent to no reduction"—when that day comes it will be nullification, but it will be nullification from the Senate and not from the House. When that day does comes I hope the House will stand to its rights, let the consequences be what they may.

Suppose we had an army of one hundred thousand men now, and the House of Representatives, speaking the voice of the people, not the voice of a party, but speaking the potential voice of the people, say: "We desire the army to be reduced one-half, and will appropriate no more." The Senate say no; regardless of what may be the condition of the country, and no matter how depressed the finances of the nation may be, or how much the people may be suffering; regardless of all these things we will contend for an army of one hundred thousand men, and if you do not agree to that there shall be no appropriation. Where is the nullification? Is it from the House or from the Senate? I say it is from the Senate.

Mr. LOGAN. Would it not take both Houses to consent to a reduction of the Army?

Mr. BOGY. There is nothing new in that idea. As a matter of course it takes both Houses; but is the Senate to dictate to the House? I say that neither House should dictate; but the dictation from the beginning during this whole session has been from the Senate and not from the House. Yet the Senate has yielded. According to the very argument made by the Senator from Maine who has now left his seat, the Senate has yielded to a legitimate reduction of $22,000,000. At the outset the Senate was not willing to yield, but it has yielded now $22,000,000.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator upon what he bases the statement that at the outset the Senate was not willing to make one cent of reduction?

Mr. BOGY. I base it upon the action of the Senate when those bills were before it. In one sense it did make a reduction, but this reduction was very small. It did not amount to anything like the reduction which was afterward agreed to, of $22,000,000.

Mr. WINDOM. The Senator from Maine stated here distinctly today, and the figures prove it, that the bills as passed by the Senate are a reduction of from eighteen to twenty million dollars on the appropriations of last year. That was a voluntary reduction reported by the Senate committee and made by the Senate.

Mr. BOGY. The Senator from Maine stated that the two Houses had agreed upon a reduction of $22,000,000. It was a reduction proposed by the House in part to which the Senate yielded to the amount of $22,000,000. That did not include the Army nor many other bills. The sundry civil appropriation bill as it was last year, and as the Senate wanted it this year, was $29,000,000. The House appropriated $16,000,000, making a difference of $13,000,000 upon the sundry civil bill alone.

Then there was a compromise upon an amount between those two figures. I cannot say what was the amount now, but these were the two figures at the outset. The pension bill appropriates about $39,000,000. In the Military Academy bill the amount proposed by the House was $231,000. The amount proposed by the Senate was $280,000, making a difference of about $50,000. In the diplomatic bill there was appropriated $922,000 by the House and in the Senate $1,341,000. The fortification bill stands at $315,000 instead of $4,000,000 as heretofore. The House, in making an appropriation of only $315,000 for fortifications this year, of course means this: that the system of fortifications heretofore adopted, both here and elsewhere throughout the world, is not adapted to the system of warfare carried on at this day, and it is just so much money thrown away, as we all know the fact to be. Some other system has got to be devised, and perhaps the best system is that which was brought about during the late war. If you go down to Hampton Roads you will see the old Fortress Calhoun, now commonly called the Ripraps. What vast sums of money have been thrown away upon that! It is an entire and total loss: and so it is in regard to most of the fortifications. The system of warfare has been changed. It matters not whether this money was wisely expended at the time, but the system has undergone a change. Therefore it is not our duty to appropriate three or four millions of dollars, as we have been doing for forty or fifty years past.

In the legislative and judicial bill the House appropriated some $13,000,000, the Senate $16,000,000. There is a difference of $3,000,000. I do not exactly remember the amount appropriated by the river and harbor bill, but even here there was a difference. In the post-office deficiency bill the House was $4,000,000, (leaving out the fractions,) and the other was $7,000,000; making a difference of $3,000,000. In the naval bill there was a difference of one or two millions of dollars, and so on. I make my statement from the speech made by the Senator from Maine this morning. All the different items amount to an aggregate of $39,000,000.

It may be true, and it was no doubt stated correctly, that a large portion of this amount can be explained away and justly and fairly, but that there was a retrenchment on the part of the House there can be no doubt. That this retrenchment is necessary on account of the financial condition of the country there is also no doubt; and any attempt here to place the House before the country as a body revolutionary in its character or disposed (to use a figure of one of the Senators) to take the Senate by the throat and say, "Yield, or your life," is not a correct statement of fact.

The House has acted within what I conceive to be not only its right, but its duty to the people. I do not deny that the Senate has the power also to refuse to yield; but in refusing to concur it should not assail the motives of the House. The House has acted in obedience to the voice of the people. That voice will be heard again. The day of reform has come, and so has the day for retrenchment and economy; and the people will enforce it. Senators may say what they please here and they may accuse us of bad motives; it matters not; the people will take up this question, and you will soon hear the refrain from mountain, valley, and plain.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire merely to call the Senator's attention to what he missed and may desire to discuss. As far as retrenchment is concerned there has been no point made, as the Senator well knows on that subject. The point made by the Senate is that the House cannot put upon an appropriation bill and force the Senate to agree to it a character of legislation which is not agreeable to the Senate. That is the only point of controversy between the House and the Senate.

So far as the appropriation for fortifications is concerned, that is a mere matter of discretion as to whether each House will agree to a certain amount or less. That is not a question of new legislation at all. It is merely a question as to the amount that we will appropriate, for there is no law fixing any amount to be appropriated. Hence that is no question between the Senate and the House; it is a mere matter of opinion as to the amount. The question is in regard to legislation that has been interpolated into an appropriation bill and forced upon the Senate, not a question as to the amount of money to be appropriated at all.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the Senator from Maine, that the Senate further insist upon its amendments and agree to the further conference asked by the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BAYARD were appointed the further committee of conference on the part of the Senate.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. Before the Senate proceeds to the trial, I ask that the sundry civil bill, returned from the House recently, be taken up in order to move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

Mr. WINDOM. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments and agree to the conference asked by the House of Representatives.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee; and Mr. WINDOM, Mr. MORTON, and Mr. THURMAN were appointed the conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. WINDOM subsequently said: I ask to be excused from serving on the conference committee on the sundry civil bill. I am already on two conference committees.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to excusing the Senator from Minnesota? The Chair hears no objection; and the Chair appoints the Senator from California, Mr. SARGENT, in his place.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. SHERMAN. I move that the Secretary now inform the House that the Senate is ready to proceed to the trial, and also that he give notice to the defendant.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion of the Senator from Ohio? The Chair hears none, and the Secretary will inform the House of Representatives that the Senate is ready to proceed with the trial.

JOHN T. KING AND L. B. CUTLER.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask that the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler be laid before the Senate. It has been concurred in on the part of the House, except that they have stricken out the proviso. I wish the amendment concurred in by the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair understands that the bill to which the Senator from Vermont refers passed the House without amendment, and has been sent to the office to be enrolled.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I see by the report of the House proceedings in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD that there was an amendment made striking out the proviso.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice here is "without amendment." In that case the bill goes to the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and does not need the action of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. What is the proviso?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. It provides for the payment of the regular compensation of these two men who were injured by the gas explosion here to the 30th of June.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has been well advised that the bill is here as having passed the House "without amendment."

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMER.

Mr. CONKLING. I move to take up the bill (S. No. 884) to authorize the change of name of the steamboat Peter Crary to that of Joseph L. Chapman. It is not a very important matter except to those interested, and they are very anxious to have it acted upon.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to give notice that to-morrow, unless some business intervenes which I cannot control and which the Senate will not be disposed to lay aside, I shall call up the House bill No. 58, known as the bounty bill, and ask the action of the Senate upon it. It is a bill which has passed the House to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union.

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

Mr. WHYTE. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate, before the managers come in, to take up the bill (S. No. 952) to remove the political disabilities of G. T. Beauregard, of New Orleans, Louisiana.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there a petition in that case praying for the removal of his disabilities?

Mr. WHYTE. Yes, sir; and the bill was reported from the Committee on the Judiciary after the petition was referred.

Mr. CONKLING. Is the petition at the desk?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will find it.

Mr. WHYTE. I presented the petition myself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition is with the papers in the office, and can be sent for, if the Senator desires it.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to see the petition or hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has been sent for. [A pause.] The petition is now here.

Mr. CONKLING. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be reported.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

NEW ORLEANS, May 23, 1876.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the Congress of the United States:

The undersigned, an officer of the army of the Confederate States during the late civil war, respectfully asks of the Congress of the United States the removal of the disability imposed by a clause of the fourteenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States upon me.

Very respectfully,

G. T. BEAUREGARD.

Mr. CONKLING. I have no objection to the passage of the bill.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read the second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed, two-thirds of the Senators present voting in favor thereof.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore, (at two o'clock p. m.) The Senate resumes its session in trial.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I offer the following order, which I shall ask to call up to-morrow morning:

Ordered, That Rule 20 of the rules for impeachment be so amended that on offers of and objections to evidence and other interlocutory and incidental questions one counsel or manager may open, one counsel or manager be heard in opposition, and one counsel or manager be heard in reply; and that the whole argument on each side shall not exceed thirty minutes without leave of the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to offer an amendment to that amendment, and I will ask the Secretary to refer to the number of the rule.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not offer it to be acted on now, but to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Then I want to offer an amendment to come up whenever this amendment to the rules is taken up. I move to amend the amendment by adding that consultations of the Senate—if that is what they are called in the rule providing for them—may occur, if so ordered by the Senate, without the galleries being cleared and without closed doors, subject to the operation of the rule which confines the right of a Senator to ten minutes in debate upon interlocutory questions, and confines his right to debate to some other time, I believe, upon final questions. My purpose is to so change the rule that the members of this court, as it is called, may have an opportunity of expressing their opinions in consultation, as they do now under the rule for clearing the galleries or going out into some other chamber. If the Secretary will reduce my amendment to form in writing, as he has his pencil in his hand, I will offer it to-morrow, or whenever this amendment of the Senator from Vermont comes up.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The proposition will be reduced to writing. It is not in order now.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is that amendment in order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not now.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will it be when offered?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be as a proposition to the amendment of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. STEVENSON. I only rise for information. I favor the motion of the Senator from New York and I hope it will be adopted; but I understood a similar proposition to have been ruled out of order as in direct antagonism to some standing rule.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair ruled that it could be submitted in order; but the rule cannot be affected, except on the usual notice.

Mr. STEVENSON. Will this be regarded as notice?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. This is a notice.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that when the Senate adjourns, it be until to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

Mr. COCKRELL. I give notice that I shall move to amend the resolution of the Senator from Vermont by striking out "thirty" and inserting "twenty;" so that the time limited shall be twenty minutes.

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the question on my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The notice of the Senator from Missouri is not now in order. The Senator from Kansas moves that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock a. m.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and thirty-seven minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, July 7, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain Rev. J. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. HOAR. I ask unanimous consent that the resolution of the Senate for printing the report of the Commissioner of Education be taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

The resolution was as follows:

Resolved by the Senate, (the House of Representatives concurring.) That 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1875 be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

There was no objection, and the resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SCALES. I ask unanimous consent to offer a resolution.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I must call for the regular order, so that the morning hour may begin. I want to get at the Pacific Railroad bill as soon as possible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. As the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] insists on the regular order, the Chair cannot recognize any requests for unanimous consent.

Mr. SPRINGER. The regular order this morning is the unfinished business of last Friday, which takes precedence of the morning hour. That unfinished business was a bill granting a pension to Daniel Clary. It can be disposed of in a moment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will not object to that.

Mr. SCALES. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw his objection to allowing me to offer a resolution.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I would do so if there were not so many gentlemen making similar requests.

DANIEL CLARY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the unfinished business of last Friday, the bill (H. R. No. 3143) granting a pension to Daniel Clary. The question is on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Daniel Clary, a private in Company F, Fourth Illinois Volunteers, in the Mexican war, and to pay to him a pension, to take effect from and after the 1st day of January, 1873.

Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to ask whether I heard the Clerk correctly. From what time does this pension date?

Mr. SPRINGER. January 1, 1873.

Mr. RUSK. Has this bill been before the Committee on Invalid Pensions?

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask for the reading of the report accompanying the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3134) granting a pension to Daniel Clary, have had the same under consideration, and submit the following report:

It appears from the evidence submitted to the committee that said Daniel Clary was regularly mustered into the service of the United States as a private soldier in Company H, Fourth Illinois Volunteers, on the 15th day of June, 1846, and was honorably discharged the 9th day of May, 1847. It further appears from the evidence that he was a sound man when he enlisted and up to December thereafter, when his eyes became much inflamed, caused from cold settling in them, and which have continued sore and inflamed, more or less, ever since, until he has become totally and incurably blind. There is no doubt of his disease of the eyes having been contracted in the service in Mexico and in the line of duty. The evidence is clear of these facts. He applied for a pension under the general law in September, 1862, and soon thereafter filed affidavits fully establishing every fact necessary to sustain his application, yet his application was rejected by the Commissioner of Pensions. The committee are satisfied that the applicant is justly entitled to a pension, and report back said bill and recommend that the same do pass.

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. SPRINGER. I believe I have the floor; but I will yield five minutes to my colleague, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. RUSK. How does this bill come before the House? By unanimous consent?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No, sir; it is the unfinished business coming over from last Friday.

Mr. HURLBUT. The bill is properly before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is entirely in order at this time.

Mr. RUSK. I wish to state that there was not unanimous consent to bring the bill before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It did not require unanimous consent; it is the unfinished business of last Friday.

Mr. RUSK. I objected last Friday to this bill coming up.

Mr. SPRINGER. If the gentleman desires to move an amendment I will yield to him for that purpose.

Mr. HURLBUT. I wish to move an amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I rise to a point of order. The order of the House was that there should be a morning hour this morning and that after the morning hour the Pacific Railroad bill should come up.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is very true, and there will be a morning hour; but under the rules it does not begin until the unfinished business is completed. This bill was pending at the adjournment last Friday; therefore it is now first in order, and is properly before the House at this time.

Mr. HURLBUT. I regret to be compelled to offer the amendment which I believe should be made to this bill. I do it in deference to the clearly established opinion of the House, settled in a dozen or more different cases. I have tried in a great many cases of wounded soldiers and officers to have the pension date back; but it has been steadily and uniformly refused ever since I have been in Congress. I believe that the correct principle beyond all doubt is that a pension should date back to the time of the disability; but both Houses of Congress have refused to recognize that principle. In this case, if my colleague will consent that the bill should be so amended as to make the pension take effect from and after the passage of the act, I will withdraw any objection and will not offer the amendment I propose to submit.

Mr. FORT. I hope the modification suggested by my colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] will not be made. This is the case of an old blind soldier of the war with Mexico; and if a special law is ever proper in any case it is in this case. It is only proposed that the pension shall date back a few years.

Mr. HURLBUT. I desire to offer an amendment to test the sense of the House upon this question and to make a distinct precedent that shall apply to all similar cases. I wish it distinctly understood that I have no objection to this particular bill. I move to amend by striking out so much of the bill as makes the pension date from January 1, 1873, and to make it read "from and after the passage of this act."

Mr. SPRINGER. I dislike very much to consume the time of the House upon a matter of so little public importance as a bill granting a pension to an individual, particularly when the matter in controversy is so slight as whether the pension shall begin from the date at which it would have begun had the decision of the Department been in accordance with the facts or whether it shall begin from the passage of the bill. It is a difference——

Mr. HURLBUT. Of three years.

Mr. SPRINGER. It is a difference of three years. The only reason assigned by the gentleman from Illinois, my colleague, is that it sets a bad precedent or that it violates a precedent already established. The question with this pensioner is this, whether he is to be deprived of his rights by a bad precedent or to be remitted to the rights he should have by reason of the justice of his case.

Mr. HOLMAN. Let me ask the gentleman from Illinois a single question?

Mr. SPRINGER. Certainly.

Mr. HOLMAN. Ought not the law on a subject like this to be uniform? Ought not the Government to treat all who are entitled to this bounty from the public Treasury in the same way? Ought not all to be placed on the same footing? Is it not manifestly wrong to single out one case and apply to that a more favorable rule than we apply to the great body of those who are entitled to make the same claim upon the Government? It has been the uniform rule upon which we have acted for several years in reference to granting pensions that they should take effect from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. SPRINGER. That is correct; but let me state the reason why the rule in this case should be otherwise.

Mr. RUSK. I will state for the gentleman's benefit that the uniform rule for the last Congress and for this—the rule established by the Committee on Invalid Pensions—is to date all these pension cases from and after the passage of the act. That committee I will say have unanimously agreed to a bill granting all arrears of pension, covering all these cases by a general law, and we have been trying for the last two months to get it before the House, but so far have failed to do so.

Mr. FORT. The general law does not cover all cases or else these applications would never have to be made to Congress. In regard to this particular case the general law is faulty. It is for an old Mexican soldier, who has been compelled to bring his case to Congress, and I hope there will be no amendment to the bill.

Mr. RUSK. This is no more meritorious than many other cases.

Mr. SPRINGER. The reason for this special case is this: This pensioner applied for a pension in 1872 and furnished the necessary evidence, as this committee have found, and he should be allowed a pension dating from that time. For some mysterious reason, which the committee deem past finding out on their part, his application was rejected. He had no friends. He is totally blind; is a beggar upon the streets and has been deprived by reason of the fact that he had no friends, no one to press his case, of his right to this pension from the time of his disability up to this time. I take it that it is simple justice to him by reason of the fact that the Department failed to recognize the merits of his case at the time the application was made, and made upon a meritorious basis and upon sufficient evidence to entitle him to a pension—I say I think it is no more than justice, no more than right he should have his pension from the time of the disability. If the House, however, thinks otherwise I will not press it.

Mr. RICE. The rule is applied in this case as in every other case of a like character. The rule is uniform that where the pension has been allowed by the Committee on Invalid Pensions it shall date from and after the passage of the act. The principle involved in this is the same as that involved in every other case which has had merit. This is no more than any other meritorious case and should not be excepted from the general rule.

Mr. SPRINGER. There is more principle involved in doing justice than following a bad precedent.

Mr. RUSK. You cannot discriminate, and this would be an unjust discrimination.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. SPRINGER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MORNING HOUR.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour now begins at thirty-four minutes past twelve o'clock; and this being Friday, reports of a private nature are in order, the call resting with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

SETTLERS, WIND RIVER VALLEY.

Mr. STEELE. I am directed by the Committee on Indian Affairs to report back a bill (H. R. No. 2419) for the relief of certain settlers in the Wind River Valley, Wyoming Territory, with an amendment, and I ask that the bill be put on its passage at this time.

The bill and amendment were read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I make the point of order the bill makes an appropriation, and must have its first consideration in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. I hope the gentleman from Iowa will withhold his objection until I can make a brief explanation of the bill. After I have explained its provisions I do not think there will be any objection to it.

Mr. WILSON of Iowa. We must either insist on an enforcement of the rule in regard to every gentleman or abolish it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. STEELE. I have a report to submit with the bill which I ask may be printed.

The bill and amendment were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

SPENCER & MEAD.

Mr. BOONE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3854) for the relief of Joab Spencer and James R. DENTISTS IN THE ARMY.

Mr. COOK, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of George A. Miller, dental surgeon, for the passage of a law relative to the employment of dentists in the Army, and that it be laid upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

CHRISTOPHER W. ROBERTSON.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, moved that it be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3070) for the relief of Christopher W. Robertson, and that the same be laid upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

JAMES EVELETTE.

Mr. COOK also, from the same committee, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of James Evelette, for compensation as disbursing agent for the defenses of Washington, and as agent for the Engineer Department, and that the same be laid upon the table; which motion was agreed to.

DENTAL SURGEONS.

Mr. COOK, from the same committee, reported back adversely the petition of Dr. Alfred C. Post, Willard Parker, Louis Sayre, and others, asking for the passage of an act providing for the appointment of dental surgeons in the Army and Navy; which was laid on the table, and the report ordered to be printed.

LIEUTENANT HENRY ROMEYN.

Mr. HURLBUT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, moved that committee be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3242) for the relief of Lieutenant Henry Romeyn, Fifth United States Cavalry, and that the same be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION IN THE UNITED STATES ARMY.

Mr. HURLBUT also, from the same committee, moved it be discharged from the further consideration of the following cases, and that they be laid on the table; which motion was agreed to:

Petition of George McDermott, first lieutenant of Fifth Infantry, setting forth that a number of his juniors have been promoted over him, contrary to law, and asking for relief.

Petition of C. H. Smith, colonel Nineteenth Infantry, and others, asking for legislation declaratory of the rule of promotion in the line of the Army.

GEORGE T. OLMSTED, JR.

Mr. STRAIT, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported, as a substitute for House bill No. 3165, a bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of George T. Olmsted, jr.; which was read a first and second time.

The bill reported as a substitute was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the President be, and hereby is, authorized to re-appoint George T. Olmsted, jr., late a captain of the Second Regiment of Artillery, United States Army, a captain in the Army, and to duly commission him as the same.

SEC. 2. That nothing in this act contained shall be so construed as to authorize said Olmsted to receive any pay or allowances for any time that he has not been in the actual service of the United States.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. STRAIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the same committee, reported back, with an adverse recommendation, the bill (S. No. 366) to fix the date of entry into the military service of Colonel and Brevet Major-General Benjamin H. Grierson, United States Army, and to correct his record on the Army Register; and the same was laid upon the table and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

Mr. TERRY, from the same committee, reported back, with adverse recommendations, bills of the following titles; and the same were severally laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The bill (H. R. No. 2807) for the relief of Richard H. Fouts;

The bill (H. R. No. 2383) for the disposition of the arsenal grounds and buildings at Little Rock, Arkansas, and for other purposes; and

The bill (H. R. No. 174) for the relief of John S. Wood, late first lieutenant, Seventh Pennsylvania Cavalry.

WILLIAM H. FRENCH, JR.

Mr. TERRY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3856,) as a substitute for House bill No. 1630, for the relief of William H. French, jr., United States Army, late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota; which was read a first and second time.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the proper accounting officer of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to adjust and settle the property accounts of William H. French, jr., late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota Territory; and if it shall be made clearly to appear that John A. Morrow, who was a contractor for furnishing supplies of beef-cattle to the Indian agencies, has delivered to Henry F. Livingston, agent at Crow Creek, beef-cattle in lieu of 422,100 pounds which he delivered to William H. French on the 9th November, 1870, at Crow Creek, and for which said Morrow afterward got receipts from said Livingston, and collected from the Government on both, then said accounting officer shall be authorized to give said French credit in his settlement accordingly.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. TERRY. There is no written report. Captain French was the Indian agent at Crow Creek. A few days before his term of service expired he received and receipted for a large number of cattle. It seems that the incoming agent also gave his receipt for the same cattle which were delivered at the Indian agency. The Government paid on each of these receipts and French was charged in his account for the cattle for which he gave the receipt. Afterward the contractor, who had thus been twice paid, delivered to the Indian agency cattle in lieu of those for which French had been charged. It clearly appears now from the records of the Department that French is entitled to credit for the amount of cattle he had been charged with, and this bill simply authorizes the Department to give him the proper credit.

Mr. HOLMAN. I understand the gentleman from Virginia to say that in consequence of French giving his receipt and his successor as Indian agent giving his receipt a few days afterward the Government paid this amount twice?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir; and now since that was done this contractor, who was thus paid for the same amount of cattle twice, has delivered to the agency the same number of cattle in lieu of those for which French was charged. The records of the Department show that this was done.

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill has the approval of the Department?

Mr. TERRY. Yes, sir; there is no doubt of its being correct.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CAMP LOWELL, MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. TERRY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3857) as a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 2788) for the relief of certain settlers on the Camp Lowell military reservation, Territory of Arizona; which was read a first and second time.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think the bill had better go to the Committee of the Whole, in order to put us all upon an equality in regard to these private bills.

Mr. TERRY. I will say to the gentleman that this bill is strictly correct.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I would trust my friend from Virginia as much as any gentleman in the House, but I think it better that the bill should take the general course.

The bill was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and ordered to be printed.

FORT DODGE MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. TERRY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a substitute for the bill (H. R. No. 1540) authorizing the Secretary of War to sell a portion of the Fort Dodge military reservation in Kansas to the Dodge City Town Company.

The substitute was read.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is there a report in this case?

Mr. HOLMAN. Unless there is a report accompanying this bill I must object to its present consideration.

Mr. TERRY. I will state that there is a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury explaining this matter and showing that this bill ought to be passed.

Mr. HOLMAN. This seems to be a bill to sell real estate belonging to the Government.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is not this a public bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to think that it is, if the gentleman makes objection to its consideration.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. It is an ungracious task to make objection to a bill reported by my friend from Virginia, but still I think that this is a public bill.

Mr. TERRY. It is not a public bill; it is a private bill, and it makes no appropriation of money, but authorizes the sale of certain portions of the reservation.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think this is a public bill, and this is private-bill day.

Mr. BANNING. This is a very important bill, and it ought to be passed.

Mr. TERRY. This land is of no importance to the Government, but it is of importance to the people of that locality.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I think my friend from Virginia will say that his bill ought to go on the Private Calendar where we can discuss it, and that that is the safest place to which we can refer it. I think I shall have to insist that this is a public bill, and I believe that the rule holds that a bill proposing to sell public property is a public bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If objection is made that the bill makes an appropriation of public property it must go to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and if the objection is made that this is a public bill, it will have to go to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. TERRY. I must then withdraw the bill, for I do not want it to go to the tomb of the Capulets.

LAND AT KEY WEST, FLORIDA.

Mr. TERRY also, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase for the use of the United States a parcel of land at Key West, Florida, now the property of Walter C. Maloney and wife.

Mr. DUNNELL. That is not a private bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made that this is not a private bill.

Mr. TERRY. I remember very well that when I tried to get this bill through at the last session of Congress on a call for bills of a public nature objection was made that it was a private bill.

Mr. HOAR. The gentleman has the right to report a private bill on a public bill day, and objection could not have been taken and sustained.

Mr. DUNNELL. I withdraw my objection.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to purchase for the use of the United States, at a price which shall be agreed upon between him and the owners, and not to exceed a reasonable sum, a certain parcel or tract of land belonging to W. C. Maloney and wife, lying and situate on the island of Key West, Florida, and adjoining the military reservation on said island: Provided, That the title of said parties to said property shall be found to be in all respects good and valid in law and equity.

SEC. 2. That if the Secretary of War and the owners of said property shall be unable to agree upon a price to be paid by the United States for said land, or if for any reason the United States shall fail to acquire the title to the same within a reasonable time after the passage of this act, then it shall be the duty of the Secretary of War to cause the possession of said property, or such part of it as is now or may be occupied by the United States, to be restored to the owners thereof.

Mr. HOLMAN. I reserve the point of order on that bill until the object of the bill and of the purchase proposed in it is explained. There is nothing on the face of the bill explaining the object of the purchase.

Mr. TERRY. There is a report of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs which I ask to have read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase for the use of the United States a parcel of land at Key West, Florida, have considered the same, and submit the following report:

This bill authorizes the Secretary of War to purchase a tract of land on the island of Key West, Florida, adjoining the military reservation.

Walter C. Maloney, jr., addressed a letter to Senator C. W. JONES touching this matter, in words as follows, to wit:

KEY WEST, FLORIDA, November 6, 1875.

DEAR SIR: Presuming upon your kind offers, I herewith inclose a map of the island of Key West, which, upon examination, will show you the cemetery laid down in red lines, my wife's portion of the same being one hundred and thirty by one hundred and seventeen feet. The street which you will find running through said cemetery is only an imaginary street, it being owned by my wife Euphemia, there being a great many officers and soldiers buried on the same.

Some years ago I offered to sell to the Government five acres contiguous to said cemetery for the sum of $1,000, and a bill passed the House of Representatives (House bill No. 4005) on the 19th of February, 1873, authorizing the Secretary of War to purchase the same for that sum. I am not now willing to sell at that price, but shall demand according to the rate which lands in the immediate vicinity have been selling; for instance, square 55, being about four hundred feet square, was divided, as shown by the map, and sold under execution at my instigation under foreclosure of mortgage, and brought $3,360. Thus you will perceive that lands must have rapidly increased in value since my said offer was made. The Government has also, on another portion of my land, erected privies, which are used by the troops, and which, thus far, I have been unable to have removed, although I have repeatedly requested it.

You will, therefore, oblige me very much by giving this matter your attention, as eighteen or twenty years' occupancy by the Governments is sufficient time to await their pleasure. My wishes in the matter are, first, immediate and unobstructed possession of my property. If that is refused upon the ground of military necessity, then that the value of such quantity of land as is desired be ascertained according to our State statute, (vide acts 1845, chapter 25, section 2, pamphlet 43,) or I will agree to submit the value to arbitration, the United States choosing one, I one, and those two an umpire, or third arbitrator; or I will sell such portion as is inclosed and marked as aforesaid for $400; or, if four or five acres are desired, will sell the whole at the rates square 55 sold for, as aforesaid. If all these propositions are rejected, please procure from the Secretary of War an order upon the post-commander to turn over to me said property, and to remove all obstructions therefrom, especially the privies and dead bodies buried thereon, as they will be rather poor and unwelcome associates, and have seriously affected the value of my property heretofore.

I hope I have not worried you, and that my requests aforesaid will not be construed as impertinent; but feeling confident of your ability to aid me, I have made bold to tax your good nature, hoping that it may lie in my power to some day reciprocate.

My father joins me in kind regards.

Your obedient servant,

W. C. MALONEY, Jr.

Hon. CHARLES W. JONES,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

December 18, 1872, General Hardie, inspector-general, made a report, of which the following is an extract, to wit:

[Extract from General Hardie's report, dated New Orleans, December 18, 1872.]

"A small piece of ground, outside the limits of the United States property at the barracks, appears to have been used during the war, though private property, for cemeterial purposes, it lying immediately outside the cemetery.

"Adjacent is another parcel of land, private property, used for the men's sink. The garrison limits cannot be contracted by the withdrawal of the bodies interred in the private property referred to, nor should the sinks be brought into the garrison limits. A plat, exhibited to the department commander and furnished the inspector-general at Washington with a copy of this report, exhibits the narrowness of the limits. The unhealthiness of the climate in the summer season forbids the propinquity of causes deranging to health.

"Five acres of land, which can be bought at $200 per acre, will furnish ground to include the cemetery site and other necessary land; and it is recommended that an application be made by the department commander to the Secretary of War to have the necessary appropriation for the purpose applied for."

This was accompanied by the following letter of the Secretary of War, January 13, 1873:

WAR DEPARTMENT, January 13, 1873.

The Secretary of War has the honor to submit to the House of Representatives for its consideration, with a view to the necessary legislation to carry it into effect, an extract from a report of Inspector-General James A. Hardie, of an inspection of the post of Key West, Florida, in which he recommends the purchase of five acres of land for the enlargement of the post, which is now insufficient for the wants of the garrison.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

February 3, 1874, the Secretary of War wrote a letter touching this land, as follows, to wit:

WAR DEPARTMENT, February 3, 1874.

The Secretary of War has the honor to recommend to the House of Representatives legislation by Congress authorizing the purchase of a piece of land adjoining the military post at Key West, Florida, embracing within its area five acres, the same being contiguous to and south of the reservation, including therein the private property taken in the year 1862 for the enlargement of the said military post, in extent being three hundred feet deep and seven hundred and fourteen feet long, or thereabouts, said land claimed and owned by one William C. Maloney, and that a sum not to exceed $1,000 be appropriated to pay therefor.

In this connection, attention is invited to letter from this Department, dated January 13, 1873, submitting to the House an extract from a report of Inspector-General James A. Hardie, of an inspection of the post of Key West, Florida, in which he recommended the purchase of the land referred to; also, to House bill 4005, third session Forty-second Congress, authorizing the purchase of the property, which passed the House February 19, 1873.

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

January 26, 1876, the Secretary of War wrote the following letter, to wit:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, D. C., January 26, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to forward to you a copy of a letter of Mr. W. C. Maloney, of Key West, Florida, addressed to you on the 6th November, 1875, relative to certain lands owned by his wife, and occupied by the United States for military purposes.

Efforts have been made by this Department to obtain authority to purchase the land referred to by Mr. Maloney, as will be seen by the copies of letters herewith, addressed to the House of Representatives.

You will perceive by the papers herewith that a bill (H. R. 4005) passed the House at the third session of the Forty-second Congress, and was referred to the Military Committee in the Senate February 21, 1873, but for want of time, probably, was never reported.

At the price now asked, this land will cost about $4,620. It is, however, important for the Government to own this property, and I would recommend its purchase at the price named.

Your co-operation is respectfully requested.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

WM. W. BELKNAP,
Secretary of War.

Hon. CHARLES W. JONES,
United States Senate.

The map forwarded by Mr. Maloney, marked 415–1, War Department, 1876, is inclosed herewith.

The Government has for years been using a portion of this parcel of land for grave-yard and sinks. The owners are entitled either to the possession of this parcel held by the Government or to a reasonable price or value for the same.

Your committee therefore recommend the accompanying bill as a substitute, and recommend the passage of the same.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. TERRY moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDNANCE STORES FOR KANSAS TERRITORY.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (H. R. No. 2813) relieving the State of Kansas from charges on account of ordnance furnished to Kansas Territory.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The preamble states that it appears from the books of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department that the State of Kansas stands charged with $11,425 for arms issued to the Territory of Kansas; and that said arms were used by Government officials in maintaining the authority of the United States, and were never turned over to the State of Kansas.

The bill directs the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department to cause the State of Kansas to be credited on its ordnance account with the amounts now charged against it for arms and ordnance stores issued to the Territory of Kansas upon the return to the United States, by the State of Kansas, of all such arms and other ordnance stores as may have come into its possession as the successor of said Territory.

Mr. HOLMAN. I believe this bill is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GOODIN. I trust the gentleman will hear an explanation of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. Is there a report accompanying the bill?

Mr. GOODIN. There is a report, but I can state briefly the purpose and necessity of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I will reserve my point of order on the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS] is entitled to the floor, having reported the bill.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS. I yield to the gentleman from Kansas, [Mr. GOODIN.]

Mr. GOODIN. During the troubles in Kansas Territory, which have become a part of the history of the country and are well known to every member of this House, it was thought necessary, in order to maintain the Federal authority therein, for the then governor of the Territory to apply to the United States Government for arms. I trust the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] will listen to this explanation. Certain arms were then furnished to the governor of the Territory, to the amount of $11,425. Those arms were placed in the hands of the citizens of the Territory during the troubles which existed at that early period.

When the State government was established but one hundred and seventy stand of arms came into the possession of the State authorities. The greatest possible efforts have been made to obtain all the arms, but as I have said only the number named have ever been recovered by the State. The Ordnance Bureau of the War Department has charged up against the State of Kansas the arms furnished the governor of the Territory of Kansas for the maintenance of United States laws. Whenever the State of Kansas, through its executive, makes application to the Government of the United States for arms to the amount which the State deems to be its quota, we are answered that there is a charge against the State of Kansas for the arms furnished to the Territory of Kansas. The charge is made against the State as the successor of the Territory, and it must be upon the implied assumption that these arms which were delivered into the hands of the territorial governor passed into the possession of the successor of the Territory, which is the State of Kansas. As a matter of fact, however, all the records disclose that only one hundred and seventy stand of arms ever came into the possession of the State authorities, and the object of my bill is to relieve the State from the charges for arms above this amount.

The bill simply provides that the Chief of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department shall credit to the State of Kansas the arms furnished to the Territory of Kansas. It seems to me that if the Government of the United States, in order to maintain peace and quiet in the Territory and to enforce its own laws during that stormy, turbulent period, found it necessary to furnish arms to the governor of the Territory, there is no good reason why they should be charged upon the books of the Ordnance Bureau of the War Department against the State, when the State has never had possession, control, or use of those arms.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. GOODIN. Certainly, with pleasure.

Mr. BANNING. These arms were all issued to the Territory of Kansas prior to its becoming a State, were they not?

Mr. GOODIN. They were.

Mr. BANNING. All of them?

Mr. GOODIN. Certainly; all of them.

Mr. BANNING. And the argument of the gentleman is that they should not be charged against the State.

Mr. GOODIN. I think the arms furnished to the Territory ought not properly to be charged against the State; but the Ordnance Bureau says it has been the custom where arms have been furnished to the executive of a Territory, and that Territory is afterward admitted as a State, to charge them against the State as the successor of the Territory. But, as I have said, it must be upon the assumption that the State is successor of the Territory and received the arms.

Mr. HOLMAN. I withdraw my point of order.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RANK OF THE PAYMASTER-GENERAL.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of Paymaster-General of the Army.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The bill provides that from and after the passage of the act the rank of Paymaster-General of the United States Army shall be brigadier-general; but no pay or allowance shall be made to said officer other than from the date of appointment under the act.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. MILLS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 34) to equalize the pay of certain officers;

A bill (H. R. No. 903) to equalize the pay of the officers of the Navy and Army;

A bill (H. R. No. 1616) for the relief of Robert L. May, late of the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 1848) authorizing the restoration of Charles E. Boggs to the active list;

A bill (H. R. No. 2003) for the restoration of Henry E. Rhoades to the active list in the United States Navy;

A bill (H. R. No. 2011) to authorize the President to restore John Roop, late engineer in the Navy, to the active list of the Engineer Corps in the Navy;

The petition of E. B. Boutwell, late of the United States Navy; and

The memorial of Assistant-Surgeon James Phillips, of the United States Navy, praying that his commission may be made to bear date from April 21, 1862.

CIVIL ENGINEERS IN THE NAVY.

Mr. MILLS also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 1574) to provide for the repeal of all laws authorizing the appointment of civil engineers in the Navy, &c.

The bill was read. It provides that all laws authorizing the appointment of civil engineers in the Navy be repealed; and that on and after the 1st day of July, 1876, all such offices shall be discontinued and the persons now holding the same shall be mustered out of the service.

Mr. MILLS. This is the unanimous report of the committee.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MILLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. WILLIS, from the same committee, reported back adversely the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 85) authorizing corrections to be made in errors in prize lists;

A bill (H. R. No. 1835) to provide for reclaiming and improving the swamp and overflowed lands connected with the United States navy-yard, Brooklyn, Long Island;

A bill (H. R. No. 3219) for the relief of Jacob J. Hunker;

Remonstrance of citizens of Savannah, Georgia, against the establishment of a naval station at Port Royal; and Memorial of citizens of Brunswick, Georgia, for the establisment of a naval station at that place.

Mr. WILLIS. I will state that as to the last two cases the committee have desired to be discharged from their further consideration because the subject, by an act already passed, has been referred to a commission.

WILLIAM WHEELER HUBBELL.

Mr. WILLIS also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the bill (H. R. No. 2731) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, and to make just compensation for the past making or use or vending of his patent explosive shell, fuses, and percussion exploders by the United States; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports of the majority and minority of the committee ordered to be printed.

PROFESSOR ORTON'S SURVEY.

Mr. WILLIS also, from the same committee, reported back, with a recommendation that it pass, the joint resolution (H. R. No. 54) relative to Professor Orton's geographical and scientific survey; which was referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying report ordered to be printed.

ALBEMARLE AND CHESAPEAKE CANAL COMPANY.

Mr. WILLIS. The Committee on Naval Affairs have directed me to report back with a favorable recommendation the bill (S. No. 464) for the relief of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company. I ask that this bill be put on its passage now. It passed the Senate unanimously, and has the unanimous approval of the Committee on Naval Affairs of this House.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Navy to investigate the claim of the Albemarle and Chesapeake Canal Company for tolls on vessels transporting naval supplies, and to award such sum as he may find equitably due, not to exceed the sum of $3,742.20; such award being in full payment of all claims of the company against the Government.

Mr. FORT. This bill should go to the Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point being made, the bill will be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I believe the morning hour has expired.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired, and under the order of the House made yesterday the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is entitled to the floor for the consideration of the bill relative to the Pacific Railroad Companies.

Mr. BRIGHT. Pending that, I raise the point that this is private-bill day, "objection day;" and I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. By order of the House the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] was made the special order for to-day after the morning hour. It conflicts, however, with the standing order of the House, the consideration in Committee of the Whole of bills on the Private Calendar. It is competent for the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to raise the question of consideration upon the bill of the gentleman from Ohio. The question is, Will the House at this time consider that bill?

Mr. HOLMAN. As the House by unanimous consent ordered that the bill coming over as unfinished business should be proceeded with after the morning hour, I submit that it supersedes entirely the general order; and it is not competent to raise the question of consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The mere fact that the House made the order by unanimous consent has no more force than if the order had been made under a suspension of the rules; and the rules—and the rule with regard to the question of consideration is that it is competent to raise that question upon a report, even though it involves a question of privilege. It is certainly competent, the consideration of the Private Calendar being the regular order under the rules of the House, for the gentleman from Tennessee to raise the question of consideration upon the bill of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANDALL. The effect of that is to give preference to paying out money by the United States Government rather than getting it in.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is for the House to decide, not for the Chair.

Mr. RANDALL. I am aware of that; I only wanted the House to understand the question.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The question is whether we shall save money or lose it; whether we shall save $150,000,000 by the passage of this Pacific Railroad bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is whether the House will at this time consider the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (H. R. No. 3672) an act to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein named, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 65, noes 62.

Mr. BRIGHT. I demand tellers.

Mr. RANDALL. No; let us have the yeas and nays. We might as well settle the question now.

Mr. RUSK. I should like to ask a question. Will not this special order come up to-morrow?

Mr. RANDALL. No, sir.

Mr. RUSK. Why will it not come up to-morrow?

Mr. RANDALL. By not taking up the bill to-day it will be entirely thrown out of its place and will not come up to-morrow.

Mr. RUSK. As I understand it it does not lose its place.

Mr. RANDALL. It is an effort to defeat the measure. I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. RUSK. I should like to ask the chairman whether this does not come up to-morrow.

Mr. BRIGHT. So far as I am concerned it is not an effort on my part to defeat the bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The result is the same.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. There are a great many worthy and deserving bills upon the Private Calendar.

Mr. HOLMAN. Regular order.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. There are a great many worthy and deserving bills on the Private Calendar, which can only be considered on Friday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will be kind enough to resume their seats. The pending question is not debatable. The order by which the bill of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] comes up to-day is fixed for this day only and will not go over until to-morrow.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If the House refuses to consider the bill of the gentleman from Ohio to-day, will it not come up to-morrow as the pending special order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not. Its consideration was fixed for to-day, and the time it was to occupy in debate was fixed at two hours.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it not the standing order of the House until disposed of?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not a continuing order. It was made simply for to-day, and to continue two hours after the morning hour and no longer.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Is it not a special order?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is a special order, but not a continuing order.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Was it not a special order when it was called up before the House. If it should be postponed, then in order to go to the Private Calendar, this being objection day, will it not continue as the special order and come up to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Would it be in order to make it a special order for to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill was ordered to be printed and recommitted, and the gentleman from Ohio entered a motion to reconsider, which yesterday he called up.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. Then, as I understand the Chair, the consideration of the bill was fixed for to-day only.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is all.

Mr. LUTTRELL. Will it be in order to move to postpone the consideration of the special order until to-morrow after the morning hour and to make it a special order for that time?

Mr. RANDALL. That requires unanimous consent.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I make the motion that the bill be postponed until after the morning hour.

Mr. HOLMAN. That motion is not in order, as the House is now dividing, the yeas and nays having been ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now before the House is whether it will proceed with the consideration of the special order for this time or go to some other business.

The question was taken, and decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 88, not voting 105; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adams, Anderson, John H. Baker, William H. Baker, Bell, Bradford, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Cabell, John H. Caldwell, Campbell, Cannon, Caulfield, Chittenden, John B. So the House agreed to consider the motion to reconsider called up by Mr. LAWRENCE.

During the roll-call the following announcements were made:

Mr. COX. My colleague from New York, Mr. HEWITT, is absent. He is paired on this bill with the gentleman from Ohio, Mr. FOSTER, but on this vote both gentlemen would vote the same way.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. My colleague, Mr. SAMPSON, is detained at his room by sickness.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 984) to provide for the sale of the Fort Kearney military reservation, in the State of Nebraska; in which the concurrence of the House was requested.

ORDER OF BUSINESS TO-MORROW.

Mr. BRIGHT. I hope the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] will permit me to ask that by unanimous consent the House shall to-morrow go into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and that it be considered as objection day.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Tennessee intend that this order shall take effect immediately after the reading of the Journal?

Mr. REAGAN. We want the morning hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. Let it be after the morning hour.

Mr. HUNTON. I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. Suppose the bill now under consideration should not pass to-day, would the order proposed by the gentleman from Tennessee supersede the consideration of that bill to-morrow?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the bill now under consideration does not pass to-day, it will not interfere with the morning hour to-morrow. It will be the pending business after the reading of the Journal.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman who has charge of the bill, if it is not disposed of to-day, can call the previous question on it and it will then go over as unfinished business to come up after the reading of the Journal.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unquestionably. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT,] that to-morrow the House shall resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the Private Calender, and that it be considered as objection day?

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

RETURN OF BILL FROM THE SENATE.

Mr. FOSTER. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] yields to me to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Clerk be directed to request the return from the Senate of the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John B. King and of L. B. Cutler.

In explanation of that resolution I have to say that the Clerk informs me that in enrolling the bill the amendment adopted by the House was omitted.

The resolution was agreed to.

PACIFIC RAILROADS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The House resumes the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein named, the pending question being on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LAWRENCE. We are now probably within a few days of the close of this session of Congress, and I am admonished by that fact that I ought not unnecessarily to consume one moment of the time of this House. This bill is one of too much importance to be allowed to rest without action before the House shall adjourn. If this bill or some equivalent measure shall become a law, it will save $150,000,000 to the Government; and without it that vast sum will be totally lost to the Treasury. It will be my purpose, in the few remarks I shall make, to demonstrate this to the House and to show the necessity and the justice of the measure now before us.

A brief recurrence to the history of the Pacific railroads may be necessary to enable the House to understand properly the subject on which we are called now to vote. Under the act of July 1, 1862, the Union Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated, and by that and subsequent acts it was authorized to construct a railroad from Council Bluffs, in Iowa, to a point five miles west of Ogden, in the Territory of Utah, a distance of 1,085.88 miles. By the same laws the Central Pacific Railroad Company, a California corporation, was authorized to construct a road from the western terminus of the Union Pacific Road to the city of Sacramento, and by another law, or the same law, it was authorized to extend the road to San José, a distance of 123.16 miles, making the Central Pacific Road 860.66 miles in length.

The act of July 1, 1862, for the purpose of enabling these companies and other connecting companies, or companies designed to construct connecting roads to make their lines of road and telegraph, granted to these several companies ten sections per mile along the entire lines of road. This was a pure gift to the companies, for which the Government neither asked nor received any equivalent, any return whatever.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Ten sections on each side.

Mr. REAGAN. Was it not twenty sections?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The original act of 1862 gave ten sections per mile. That amount was doubled by the act of July 2, 1864. This is a subject I have studied somewhat, and I am tolerably familiar with these statutes, though I may not always be accurate.

For the purpose, too, of enabling these companies to construct these lines of road and telegraph, the Government by the original act of 1862 made a loan of credit to each company, or in other words, granted them bonds known as subsidy bonds; loaned them subsidy bonds payable thirty years after date, with interest at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum in currency. In order to secure the repayment of these subsidy bonds and the interest as it would accrue, the original act of 1862 gave the Government a first mortgage or lien upon the entire lines of road and telegraph. And at the time this act was passed it seems to have been understood by Congress that the railroad companies were to pay the interest as it accrued upon these subsidy bonds. The Attorney-General, in an opinion of December 15, 1870, decided that the companies were bound to pay the interest as it accrued upon these subsidy bonds. So far, then, all seemed very plain, and all very well. There was an absolute gift of lands to the companies. The subsidy bonds issued to them to enable them to make the roads were not a gift, but were simply a loan of credit. The companies at the maturity of the bonds thirty years from their date were bound to pay their principal, and according to the understanding of Congress they were bound to pay the interest as it accrued. So the Attorney-General held in the opinion to which I have referred.

It has recently been decided, however, at the last term of the Supreme Court that the railroad companies were not bound to pay the interest as it accrued and that they are by the existing law of the land not bound to pay it until the maturity of the subsidy bonds about the 1st of January, 1898—twenty-two years hence—except as the interest may be paid by the application, first, of compensation for half the services rendered by these companies to the Government in carrying mails, freights, and telegraphic messages; and secondly, by the application of 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the companies, the earnings which they make in their general business. The act of July 2, 1864, changed the original act of 1862 in many very material points. It was represented to Congress that to enable these companies to construct their respective railroads they required more aid than the subsidy bonds would give them, and they asked the permission of Congress to mortgage their roads for a sum in bonds to be issued by the companies equal to the amount of the subsidy bonds, and that this mortgage should be prior to that of the Government. The act of July 2, 1864, was accordingly passed granting all the companies asked.

The act of July 2, 1864, doubled the land grant and made other valuable changes; changes valuable to the companies under these acts of Congress. There have been issued to the several Pacific Railroad Companies subsidy bonds the principal sum of which aggregates $64,623,512. I have in my hand a table showing the amount of the subsidy bonds issued to the companies, taken from the public-debt statement of June 30, current year. From this public-debt statement it appears further that the Government has again and again, year after year, been paying an annual interest upon these bonds of nearly $4,000,000, until the amount advanced from the Treasury for these companies is $23,289,021.81, after deducting the half compensation for services rendered by the companies to the Government. I submit the following table:

Bonds issued to the Pacific railway companies payable thirty years after date. Interest payable in lawful money at 6 per cent.

Name of railway.	Principal outstanding.	Interest accrued and not yet paid.	Interest paid by the United States.	Interest repaid by transportation of mails, &c.	Balance of interest paid by the United States.
Central Pacific	$25,885,120 00	$776,553 60	$11,804,251 27	$1,231,213 76	$10,573,037 51
Kansas Pacific	6,303,000 00	189,090 00	3,292,943 09	1,448,327 39	1,844,655 70
Union Pacific	27,236,512 00	817,095 36	12,701,420 01	4,079,704 77	8,621,715 24
Central branch, Union Pacific	1,600,000 00	48,000 00	829,808 26	44,408 05	785,400 21
Western Pacific	1,970,560 00	59,116 80	781,496 94	9,367 00	772,129 94

Now, Mr. Speaker, this process of paying interest is going on against the Government, and what will be the result? Why, sir, at the maturity of the subsidy bonds twenty-two years hence the amount of interest alone advanced by the Government with the interest compounded on the advances of the interest, if there were no credit for half service and 5 per cent. of the net earnings, would amount to the enormous sum of $316,112,571. The simple interest alone, without compounding it, amounts to $116,322,321.16. But the Government will be reimbursed to some extent from 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services, and there will not be due at the maturity of the subsidy bonds the whole amount of this $116,000,000 of interest or advance of interest. The 5 per cent. of net earnings of these companies to which to the Government is entitled and the compensation for half services which the Government is entitled, apply as credits on current interest advanced by the Treasury Department. This will reach about $440,000 a year for the Central Pacific Company and about an equal sum for the Union Pacific Company. After applying these credits there will remain of principal and interest not re-imbursed on the 1st of January, 1898, about $150,000,000.

What shall be done as to this $150,000,000? The chief purpose of this bill is to require these companies to pay into the Treasury semi-annually a fixed sum of money, which shall be invested by the Secretary of the Treasury in Government bonds, on the most advantageous terms possible, to accumulate on interest for the benefit of these companies until the 1st of January, 1898, and to provide that the amount so accumulated shall then be applied to liquidate the principal and interest of the subsidy bonds. That is the purpose of the bill.

I have prepared a short table showing the amount of money which it would be necessary for these several Pacific railroad companies to pay into the Treasury semi-annually to liquidate the interest unreimbursed and the principal of subsidy bonds due on the 1st of January, 1898. It would require to be paid semi-annually by the Central Pacific company $930,742, and by the Union Pacific company $994,731. The table is as follows:

Names of companies.	Amount of sinking fund required to pay off the principal at maturity, payable half-yearly from July 1, 1876, interest re-invested; at 5 per cent.	Amount of sinking fund required to pay off simple interest, payable half-yearly, from July 1, 1876, interest re-invested; at 5 per cent.	Total to be paid semi-annually.
Kansas Pacific	87,327	157,190	244,517
Union Pacific	355,261	639,470	994,731
Central branch, Union Pacific	22,299	40,138	62,437
Sioux City and Pacific	20,723	37,302	58,025

The sums indicated in this table are the sums which should be paid inclusive of the 5 per cent. of the net earnings and the half service, in order to meet at maturity the interest and the principal of the subsidy bonds. If I could have my wish upon this subject I would require these companies to pay that sum.

The Judiciary Committee, however, after the most mature consideration, have not deemed it proper now to require the companies to pay that sufficient sum. In the bill now before the House the committee require a much less sum.

By this bill the Union Pacific Company is required to pay $375,000 semi-annually for a period of ten years, the Central Pacific Company, $284,105 for a period of ten years semi-annually, and after that period these sums are to be increased. After applying 5 per cent. of the net earnings and the half service, according to the provisions of this bill, the deficiency for the Union Pacific Company will be $334,731 and for the Central Pacific Company $421,730 semi-annually. I have thrown this statement as to these two companies into the form of a table, as follows:

	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Sinking fund required by bill for first ten years, payable semi-annually	$375,000	$284,105
Add for 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services, semi-annually	225,000	225,000
Total payments, semi-annual	600,000	509,105
The requisite amount to pay subsidy bonds and interest at maturity	994,731	930,742
Semi-annual deficiency during first ten years	334,731	421,637

That is, if we require the payment of a sufficient sum, these two companies, which are the principal companies, would be required to pay the sums I have just stated in addition to the sums required by this bill.

This is the provision made by this bill to meet the $150,000,000 which will remain owing and due to the Government on the 1st day of January, 1898, not re-imbursed in the modes provided by existing law. The bill does not provide for the payment of a sufficient sum, but so far as it goes it is well, and, though it does not go so far as I would desire, I am for this bill, because it is just and because it secures a portion of what ought to be paid by these companies into the United States Treasury; and at some future day Congress can provide that the amount shall be increased, when possibly money may be borrowed at a lower rate of interest. And thus the Government may finally be re-imbursed for the vast sums of money which, under existing law, it is required to advance for these companies.

Mr. KASSON. If it does not interrupt the gentleman at the wrong point——

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not.

Mr. KASSON. I wish to ask him to state what was the principle decided by the Supreme Court of the United States not long since, in some cases like this, as to the right of Congress to impair the obligation implied in the original charter. Several gentlemen have expressed doubts whether there was not in this bill a principle in contravention of that decision of the Supreme Court. If the gentleman can state it in brief, I would like him to state what was the principle, in that respect, settled by the Supreme Court, treating the charter as an original contract, and treating this bill as imposing an obligation on these companies in contradiction of the obligation contained in the original charter.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That reaches the question of the power of Congress to require this sinking fund. I will discuss that question before I get through.

Mr. KASSON. Very well; at the proper time.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, at the proper time. It is perfectly right that the gentleman should call my attention to that point. I will say, however, for his information, that the Supreme Court of the United States has made no decision at all upon the question as to the power of Congress to change these Pacific railroad acts. The Supreme Court decided, in January last, I think, at all events during the last term of the court, a case known as "the interest case," the case of The United States vs. The Union Pacific Railroad Company, and it will be found commencing on page 180 of House Report No. 440, which I had the honor to submit to this House on the 25th of April last, on the subject of a sinking fund for the several Pacific railroad companies. There is nothing in that decision, not one word or one letter, that militates against the power of Congress to require the creation of this sinking fund. And before I get through I trust I shall be able to satisfy my learned friend from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] that this bill is authorized not only by the acts of 1862 and of 1864, but by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and of other of the highest courts of this country.

Mr. KASSON. If that principle will be stated by the gentleman in due time, let that suffice for the present. But on the subject of the sinking fund, allow me to inquire whether this bill authorizes the same rate of interest on the funds paid into this sinking fund that is due to the United States on the bonds granted as subsidy?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will state how that is.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. At the same time I would like the gentleman to state whether or not this bill interferes in any way with the principle laid down in the decision of the Dartmouth College case.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The Dartmouth College case was decided under a law which did not reserve to the legislative authority any power to change the original charter; whereas we are acting under a law which does reserve to Congress that right. That also will be discussed when I come to consider the question to which I refer.

This bill requires the Secretary of the Treasury to invest the money which shall be paid into this sinking fund by these companies to the best practical advantage. And it authorizes these companies to pay into the sinking fund any bonds of the United States or greenbacks or any evidences of Government indebtedness; the subsidy bonds, if you please. And if the railroad companies shall choose to pay into this sinking fund the subsidy bonds, then they will get 6 per cent. interest, precisely the rate the Government pays on those bonds. This bill gives them that privilege. If they choose they can invest in Government subsidy bonds and pay them into this sinking fund; and in that way they can regulate the rate of interest they will get.

Mr. KASSON. I believe there is no provision in this bill permitting these companies to pay into this sinking fund their own first-mortgage bonds?

Mr. LAWRENCE. No, there is not. But I will say this: This sinking fund will be practically for the benefit of the holders of the first-mortgage bonds, so that it amounts to the same thing.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman mistakes my point. If they were allowed to purchase their own first-mortgage bonds, to that extent putting the Government where it was intended originally to be, the first mortgagee, they could get them very nearly at par. If, however, they buy United States 5 per cent. bonds, they will have to pay about 120 for them.

Mr. LAWRENCE. There would not be much objection to their paying their first-mortgage bonds into this sinking fund. But the companies have proposed no such thing. They resist every step taken to require a sinking fund, and have here to-day a powerful lobby against this bill.

Mr. KASSON. I allude to it only because it is desirable to obtain a practicable bill, and one that will not conflict with the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am not afraid about the decision of the Supreme Court. There would not be much objection, I think, to that proposition; but it was not considered by the committee, or not deemed advisable at all events, and so it is not incorporated in the bill.

Allow me to say at this point that if this bill should pass and if the companies shall through this sinking fund or otherwise ultimately pay all of the subsidy bonds with their interest, the Government will have given to these companies without any interest on its advances of interest, more than $100,000,000. This bill does not ask that the Government be re-imbursed for this, as possibly it might do, though I will not say what might be the law on that subject; but I advert to this for the purpose of showing that we are dealing with these companies in no spirit of illiberality. We are making to them a gift of more than $100,000,000, in addition to the lands, by way of interest on the Government advances of interest which is never to be re-imbursed, which this bill does not ask to be re-imbursed. Whether Congress shall hereafter require it or not, I do not now undertake to say; but I do say that this bill does not require it. Now, these companies are left in the position of receiving besides their land grants an absolute money gift of more than $100,000,000; a sum sufficient, if economically expended, to construct the entire road from Omaha to Sacramento. And this we are doing without asking any recompense whatever.

Mr. RIDDLE. Are the companies willing to accept the provisions of this bill?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly not, as their lobby here against it sufficiently proves. I never knew these companies to be willing to accept anything, unless it was something to their advantage, regardless of the question whether there was a mixture of advantage anywhere else.

Mr. RIDDLE. Have they been making propositions?

Mr. LAWRENCE. They have been making propositions; but those propositions (which I discussed in a speech made on the 14th of June last) are new demands upon the Treasury, new schemes for taking money from the Treasury, instead of paying it back. That is my understanding and construction of those propositions. If gentlemen desire to see my views on that subject they will find them in the speech to which I have referred, which is much fuller in its statements than the speech I am now making.

The three inquiries naturally arising in connection with this bill are: First, is this provision for a sinking fund necessary? Secondly, is it reasonable? Thirdly, has Congress power to require it?

And now a few words as to each of these questions.

Is it necessary? The president of the Union Pacific Railroad Company in a letter to the Secretary of the Treasury, dated February 9, 1875, uses the language which I ask the Clerk to read. I beg gentlemen to hear it. I like to quote these gentlemen, because they understand this subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

The bonds are accumulating an interest account, also uncollectible until the principal is due. The principal and interest when due will amount to the very large aggregate of over $77,000,000, though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

At the same time, it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages and run the road on Government account, a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting farther and farther from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both.

On page 287 of this House report No. 440 to which I have referred will be found a statement of the chairman of the Senate Committee on Railroads, that the cost of constructing the Union Pacific Railroad is estimated at from $39,000,000 up to about $71,000,000. I have no doubt that this road honestly constructed could have been built for $50,000,000. Suppose no sinking fund is provided, what is to be the condition of things on the 1st of January, 1898? After crediting to the Union Pacific company their 5 per cent. of net earnings and half services to the Government, this company will owe on its—

First mortgage	$27, 232, 000
Subsidy bond mortgage	27, 236, 000
Interest not re-imbursed to the United States	38, 225, 721
Total	92, 693, 721

In other words, the company will owe nearly twice what the whole road is worth.

Besides, its land-grant debt is $7,812,000, and its sinking fund about $14,299,000, making an additional debt of $22,111,000. But assuming that the land-grant mortgage and the sinking-fund mortgage should be paid, it would still leave a debt of over $92,000,000, when the road is not worth $70,000,000.

Sir, the first mortgage will be foreclosed. The holders of the first-mortgage bonds will buy in the road; for there will be no competition when it comes to be bid in. The few men who manage these roads will have these bonds in their hands. Then they will buy in the roads, and the Government will lose its principal and its interest on these subsidy bonds. All will be gone. Unless we secure it now it will be irretrievably lost.

Sir, can we rely on the honor of these corporations? I have not a word to utter against them. I believe in corporations. I am in favor of them. I would require them by law to do what is right, in order that we may stand by them. But it is not to be forgotten that we have had some experience with this Union Pacific Company. The gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. HOAR,] in a report which was made to this House on the 20th of February, 1873, told us what had been the result with regard to this company up to that time, and how far we could rely upon the integrity of the men who manage it. I ask the Clerk to read an extract from his report.

The Clerk read as follows:

In a report made to the House on the 20th February, 1873, by a committee thereof, it was said of the Union Pacific Company—

"That the moneys borrowed by the corporation, under a power given them only to meet the necessities of the construction and endowment of the road, have been distributed in dividends among the corporators; that the stock was issued not to men who paid for it at par in money, but who paid for it at not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making; that of the Government directors, some of them have neglected their duties, and others have been interested in the transactions by which the provisions of the organic law have been evaded; that at least one of the commissioners appointed by the President has been directly bribed to betray his trust by the gift of $25,000; that the chief engineer of the road was largely interested in the contracts for its construction; and that there has been an attempt to prevent the exercise of the reserved power in Congress by inducing influential members of Congress to become interested in the profits of the transaction. So that of the safeguards above enumerated none seems to be left but the sense of public duty of the corporators."

Mr. LAWRENCE. Mr. Speaker, the closing sentence which has been read is sublime in the depths of its irony! Sir, we cannot rely then on the mere, sole pleasure of the men who manage this corporation to provide for the payment of this indebtedness, for they do not pretend that they are setting apart one dollar to meet it when it comes to be due. They do not deny that they are dividing out in dividends among their stockholders the earnings of the road without setting apart one dollar to meet this indebtedness when it comes due. Why is that? If they intend to pay this debt when it becomes due they must provide the means of paying it. If they intend to provide the means this bill requires them to do just that and imposes nothing upon them but what they ought to do. If they do not intend to do that, this bill ought to pass and compel them to do what is necessary to secure the Government against loss. I need not refer to the value of the other roads and the amount of mortgages on them. They are in about the same condition as the Union Pacific, and that is enough.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is a reasonable one. I have already shown, in the remarks I made on the 14th of June as they are reported in the RECORD, that these companies can pay this money required by this bill and still make reasonable dividends to their stockholders. I do not deem it necessary to repeat the argument or to recite the facts and figures which I there gave. I only repeat the fact, which any gentleman can see, that these companies can make reasonable dividends to their stockholders and meet the sinking fund required by this bill.

But I do not place the right of Congress to create this sinking fund upon any question of that kind. It is the right of the creditors of a corporation to be paid first of all, and no corporation has the right to make dividends to the prejudice of its creditors. That is one of the first and elementary principles of law known by every student of the law of corporations and about which no lawyer ever entertained a doubt.

I do not wish, Mr. Speaker, unnecessarily to consume time, but that brings us up to the question, to which I invite the attention of the gentleman from Iowa, [Mr. KASSON,] of the power of Congress to provide this sinking fund. What is our power? I had occasion to argue that question in the report submitted to the House on the 25th of April at considerable length, and I refer gentlemen who wish to see a fuller discussion of that subject than I propose to make now to the report itself, where I have collected, I think, more than half a hundred authorities and decisions of courts on that question—nearly all the decisions made by the courts of the United States.

Let me call the attention of the House again to the fact that in the original act of 1862 only ten sections of land per mile were granted to these companies. By the act of 1864 the land grant was doubled. By the act of 1862 the Government held for the repayment of the subsidy bonds and interest advanced a first mortgage on the road. By the act of 1864 that mortgage was released, and these companies were authorized to issue their bonds, to be secured by a first mortgage on the roads equal in amount to the subsidy bonds.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Postponed; not released.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Postponed, not released; my friend is correct, and the Government mortgage was made second to that of the bonds which were issued by the companies. The original act of 1862 required these companies to pay to the Government, as a credit upon the advances of interest, all the earnings for their services to the Government and 5 per cent. of their net earnings each year after the roads should be completed. The act of 1864 released these companies from applying all their earnings for service to the Government to repayment of advance of interest, and required only one-half to be so applied.

But Congress did something more. While they were surrendering the great security of a first mortgage, while they were surrendering the right to apply all the earnings for services to the Government, they provided in the twenty-second and last section, act of 1864, as follows:

> That Congress may at any time alter, amend, or repeal this act.

That is, while by this act Congress released one-half of the compensation for services rendered by the companies to the Government they said in effect, "If we find when these roads are completed that the means provided by existing law to pay the principal and interest of the subsidy bonds will not be enough, we will reserve the right to alter the contract and require such payments as will be sufficient."

Mr. BRIGHT. Did they accept the act of Congress?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes; of course they did, for there were "millions in it" for the companies. The sixth section of the act of 1862 declares these land grants and subsidy bonds are given to these companies upon the "condition" that said companies shall pay said bonds at maturity. And again:

> Said company may also pay the United States wholly or in part, in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par; and after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net revenues of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof.

Mark the words, "at least" 5 per cent. shall be applied to the payment thereof! That is coupled with the power in the act of 1864, to alter the contract so as to enlarge the demand which the Government may make on the companies.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio a question, whether the power embodied in this twenty-second section to alter, amend, or change the charter in his judgment confers any authority upon Congress to change the status of the corporation as it exists at the time Congress may see fit to so alter and amend?

Mr. LAWRENCE. The status?

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. Their contract rights.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It authorizes Congress to change the contract with the companies so as to require them to pay more than the original law required if they accepted it, as they did. Congress cannot change the status of a company so as to divest a vested right.

Now, Mr. Speaker, this question has been before the courts in quite a number of cases. In the case of Miller against the State, 15 Wallace, 478, a railroad company was organized under a law authorizing its creation, with thirteen directors to be elected by the stockholders. A subsequent statute gave the city of Rochester, which had become a stockholder, the power to appoint seven directors, leaving the other stockholders to elect six. The question arose whether the Legislature had the power to provide that mode of electing the directors. The court held that this was an authorized exercise of power under the reservation in the law of the right to alter or amend. Judge Clifford, in pronouncing the opinion of the Supreme Court, said that the reserved power may be exercised to almost any extent to carry into effect the original purpose of the grant, or to secure the due administration of its affairs (the affairs of the company) so as to protect the rights of the stockholders and creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets. That is it. That covers the entire authority exercised, or proposed to be exercised in this bill. Judge Clifford says this power to alter or amend can be exercised almost to any extent to carry into effect the original purpose of the grant. What was the original purpose of the grant to the Pacific Railroad companies? It was to secure to the United States the re-imbursement of the interest which should be advanced upon the subsidy bonds, and the repayment of the principal of those bonds. Well, says Justice Clifford, Congress can exercise the reserved power to alter to any extent to effect that object. That is precisely what this bill proposes to do.

How shall Congress exercise that power? Why, says Justice Clifford, that power may be exercised for the proper disposition of the assets. Yes, sir, this bill proposes to deal with the assets of the company, to make a proper disposition of them to secure the repayment of this interest and the principal of these subsidy bonds.

Mr. Justice Clifford says that under this reserved power to alter, authority may be exercised almost to any extent to protect the rights of the creditors. The Government is the creditor, and we propose simply to take the assets of these companies and give them a particular direction, for the purpose of doing what these companies agreed to do. It would be marvelous law indeed if we required these companies to do a given thing, and there was no power under the sun to enforce the observance of that duty which they had agreed to perform! Why, sir, to say they shall do a thing, and then leave it in their discretion whether to perform it or not, is simply to issue a brutum fulmen, simply to say a thing shall be done, and then leave the companies not to do it. That would not only be bad law, but bad morals.

I have in this report, (House Report No. 440,) as I have already remarked, collected a number of authorities, and I call the attention of the House to a Massachusetts case. In Massachusetts the Legislature incorporated two railroad companies, and in the act incorporating them the right to alter and amend the charter was reserved. Subsequently the Legislature required the companies to extend their lines of road into a city and construct a union depot, at a cost of several hundred thousand dollars. The companies resisted, and said, although the Legislature had power to amend or alter their charters, they could not impose upon them a duty which required the payment of money away beyond the original purpose contemplated by the charter. The supreme court of that State held that, under the reserved power to alter or amend, the Legislature had the right to impose a new duty upon the companies to carry out the original design of their creation; that is, to accommodate the traveling public and to carry goods; that this depot was necessary for that purpose, and that under the power to carry out the original design of the company the Legislature could impose upon these companies the duty of extending their road, even although they were required to exercise the right of eminent domain to carry out that purpose. So the law was sustained. And that is a much stronger case than that covered by this bill. Here we simply require the payment of a debt which the companies have agreed to pay and at the time when they agreed to pay it.

My learned colleague, [Mr. HURD,] in his minority views accompanying the report of the committee on this bill, urges with great force his objections to the bill. I have already replied to these in my remarks on the 14th of June.

He insists that this bill may impair the right of stockholders to dividends. I have already shown he is mistaken in this as a matter of fact. But as a matter of law stockholders have no right to dividends to the prejudice of creditors. This is well settled in every book on the law of corporations.

My colleague [Mr. HURD] insists that this sinking fund may disable the companies from maintaining their roads. In this, as I have shown in my remarks on the 14th of June, he is mistaken as a matter of fact. The same argument could be employed to prove that Congress could not tax one of these railroad companies. But it would be answered by the case of Tomlinson vs. Jesup, 15 Wallace, page 454, in which the court said the reservation of a power to alter the charter "places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived" from the charter, and that a tax could be levied.

The same argument could be employed to prove that Congress could not require a change of grade or the erection of a depot by any of these companies. But the courts have said that both could be required by legislative authority, as may be seen by reference to Worcester vs. Norwich Railroad Company, 109 Massachusetts Reports, page 103, and Commonwealth vs. Eastern Railroad Company, 103 Massachusetts Reports, page 254, and Fitchburgh Railroad Company vs. Grand Junction Railroad Company, 4 Allen, page 198, and numerous other authorities referred to in the report, page 440, of the Judiciary Committee on this bill.

Now, I will not multiply these authorities, for it seems to me they are perfectly clear and perfectly conclusive upon this subject; and if any gentleman desires to look at them more fully he can do so by looking into this report and consulting the books to which it refers.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question. As I understand it, the amount which this bill provides shall be paid into the Treasury will not fully re-imburse the Government?

Mr. LAWRENCE. It will not.

Mr. JAMES B. REILLY. What is the objection to fixing an amount at this time that will fully re-imburse the Government?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I cannot see any; but I defer to the judgment of the majority of the Judiciary Committee, who thought it better not to require the full amount now. And I always acquiesce in the judgment of the gentlemen with whom I am associated when they differ with me in sufficient numerical force, and of course for that reason I yielded to their judgment. I can only say that this is right so far as it goes; but in the future, when the profits of these roads shall increase, when money probably can be borrowed at a lower rate of interest, the amount can be increased. We have started in the right direction, and we ought not to vote down this bill simply because it does not accomplish all we would desire.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. May I ask the gentleman from Ohio a question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Certainly.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. The bill in the last clause of section 5 says:

But nothing herein shall require said 5 per cent. of net earnings or said one-half of the compensation for services rendered for the Government to be invested as herein mentioned.

Why should not that be invested in the same manner as the moneys referred to in the previous portion of the section?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I will state the reason. It is because we have the right to credit that on the advances of interest now. The Government is entitled to credit the 5 per cent. of net earnings and half compensation for services as part payment on current advances of interest on the subsidy bonds, and we are not bound to accumulate that at interest and give the companies the benefit of it. The act of 1862 and of 1864 gives the Government this right.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. Why not do this in your bill?

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is done by the existing law. The act of 1864 provides for that.

Mr. W. B. WILLIAMS. The act of 1864 provides for that as a sinking fund, and you are providing an additional sinking fund.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The act of 1864 provides that 5 per cent. of the net earnings and half of the compensation for the services rendered by these companies to the Government shall be applied right at the time the services are rendered, and 5 per cent. paid in liquidation of the interest advanced by the Government, so far as it will go. There is no necessity for investing that 5 per cent. or half services, because it is credited at once, and the amounts will be made up accordingly; whereas as to the residue of the interest not so re-imbursed it is not proposed in this bill now to exact payment until the maturity of the subsidy bonds. And for that reason this sinking fund is to be paid in and invested, and accumulate interest until the maturity of the subsidy bonds, and then applied; the result of which is that the companies get the benefit of the interest on the sinking fund, while the Government gets no interest on its advance of interest; making a difference of a hundred millions and more in favor of these companies. This is done to conform to what it is claimed the Supreme Court decided in the so-called "interest case" at the recent term of the court.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman answer me one question?

Mr. LAWRENCE. Yes, sir.

Mr. PAGE. How much money in all did the Government give to these two roads? What was the original amount?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I can tell you that. The Government gave or made a loan of credit of subsidy bonds to the Central Pacific Company to the amount of $25,885,120; to the Union Pacific Company, $27,236,512.

Mr. PAGE. About $60,000,000 altogether.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Then there were other companies which received smaller amounts; and the total was $64,623,512.

Now, I have gone over, as fully as I could in the time I have taken, the one principal purpose of this bill, and I trust that it will pass the House by the decided majority which its justice and merits deserve. It is simply a question whether we will secure the repayment to the Government of $150,000,000 justly owing by these companies, or whether that vast sum shall be lost.

Mr. HURD obtained the floor.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] allow me, before he proceeds, to ask for a little information from the gentleman who has just spoken?

Mr. HURD. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. I was waiting for the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] to come to the details of the bill as I supposed he would do, and therefore I did not interrupt him. I notice that section 8 of the bill provides—

That no director or officer of any company hereinbefore mentioned or referred to shall hereafter be interested, directly or indirectly, in any contract therewith, except for his lawful compensation as such officer.

And if he is, he is to be punished by a possible fine of $10,000 and a year's imprisonment. Does not that go much beyond what the committee desires? If an officer of the company has occasion to ship a single box of any kind of freight from San Francisco to New York, he would be liable, under this provision, to a fine of $10,000 and a year's imprisonment; that is, if he agrees to pay freight on it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. That possibly may not be a contract within the meaning of this section.

Mr. KASSON. I think it is.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This is taken word for word from the act of March 3, 1873, which Congress passed just after the Credit Mobilier exposé. The only difference is that this section applies it to all the companies, whereas in that act it was confined to one company. This will be seen by reference to the act found on page 167 of the Report No. 440 of the Judiciary Committee on this bill.

Mr. KASSON. That makes no difference in the view I take. If the literal terms of the act are to be taken, it punishes with fine and imprisonment any officer of the road who makes a contract for freight.

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, certainly it does not apply to any such case as that suggested by the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. If strictly construed it prohibits him from being interested in any contract of any kind, and subjects him to imprisonment and fine.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand, I think, now the purpose and effect of the provision. If a railroad president can make contracts for carrying freight, he can buy coal mines and forests and produce, and secure advantages over all others. If he wants a single box carried he can have it done without freight charges. But he should not be permitted to secure advantages over other parties in carrying freights, either as to price or time of carrying. If so, he can drive all competition away. And the only remedy is to cut him off from all such contracts. Another purpose is to prevent him from being a contractor through a Credit Mobilier corporation or otherwise.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to inquire whether the debate upon this bill is to be confined entirely to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, we shall have an hour after the previous question is seconded. I might occupy much more time in this discussion and explain in detail all the provisions of the bill; but it seems to me unnecessary. I rely on the inherent justice and manifest necessity for and propriety of the measure.

Mr. HURD. Mr. Speaker, I regret that I have been compelled to differ from the majority of the Judiciary Committee of this House in the report they have made upon the subject of the Union Pacific and Central Pacific Railroads. I regret it the more because of the high respect in which I have always held as a lawyer my colleague who has just addressed the House; but, notwithstanding the regret, I feel obliged by a sense of duty to maintain before this House in this discussion the views which have led me to a decision entirely different from theirs. I desire to say to this House that not only are there involved in this discussion questions of millions and millions of dollars, but the question of the honor of the Government, questions of its rights and duties and powers with reference to whom and with whom its has made contracts, and that in the determination of these questions we are to set the precedent by which powers in all future Congresses may be regulated.

The history of these railroads must be familiar to nearly every member of the House. By acts of Congress individuals were given certain powers, involving rights of way, involving the exercise of the right of eminent domain; certain privileges were conferred in the way of bonds and loans of the Government credit for the construction of these railroads. In addition to this there was a large contribution of individual capital made to these railroad enterprises.

When the railroads were completed they constituted a line from the one hundredth meridian of longitude in Nebraska to the Pacific Ocean. The Government has since exercised control over them, so far as the law fixed the exercise of such control and determined and ascertained its power.

The question that is involved in this discussion is what were the terms of the contract entered into between the Government and these companies? The terms can be ascertained only by reference to the provisions of the statutes themselves. By the law of 1862, it was provided particularly and especially that after these roads had been completed the Government should have power to retain at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads and also the whole of the compensation paid by the Government to the companies for services.

Afterward, in 1864, this law was changed chiefly in this, that only one-half of the compensation to be paid to the companies should be set aside for the security of the ultimate payment of these bonds. No person ever disputed that these bonds were loaned to the company; they were to be repaid to the Government at maturity. There was no dispute as to the time that the obligations were to run for a certain period of time, for payment was specifically stated on the face of the bonds themselves. There was a dispute, however, as to the maturity of the interest. It was maintained that the interest was to be paid semi-annually by the companies until the maturity of the bonds. The Attorney-General of the United States gave an opinion in favor of that view. But the question was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and that tribunal, the highest judicial tribunal of this country, decided that the interest was not payable by the companies until the bonds had matured. Since this decision there should be no doubt on the part of the General Government that it had no right to ask the payment of the principal or the interest until the maturity of the bonds, and the companies had the right to refuse the payment of any sum until the bonds had matured, as the contract stipulated. There was a time for the payment of the principal debt; there was a time for the payment of the interest; there was a fund to be annually paid which was to insure the payment to the Government of the whole sums specified by law. Nothing could be plainer than this.

If judicial decision were necessary, judicial decision has been given. If legislative action were needed, legislative action has been had so that the contract between the Government and the companies was clearly understood. To fix any other time for payment without consent of the companies is a breach of the obligation; to demand any other security is an exercise of unwarranted power. At the beginning of the session my colleague who has just addressed the House introduced a bill providing for a sinking fund, compelling these railroad companies to pay a large amount of money, between one or two million of dollars a year, for the ultimate discharge of this debt which has been contracted.

There can be no doubt as to the effect of the provisions of this law. These provisions impair the obligations of the original contract, because they make a sinking fund where there never was a sinking fund before, or else they impose new duties on the companies in increasing the sinking fund which had been previously established. This law changes the time of payment of the interest from 1900 to each year between that period and now. It affects the vested rights of parties who are interested in these contracts and violates the plighted faith of the Government. It interferes with the obligations of the companies; it diminishes the value of the stock of the parties who have invested in them. The rights of the companies are jeopardized, because the law devolves upon them the duty of keeping their rolling-stock and tracks in order. This law imposes upon them an obligation which, if first performed, will render it impossible for the companies to discharge that duty and retain their franchises. It is easy to impose upon them an obligation which it will be impossible for them to perform in this regard. This law diminishes the security not only of the stockholders, but of the first bondholders. It impairs their rights and powers because it diminishes the value of the ultimate security for their payment.

I say, therefore, that the bill interferes with vested rights; it changes the time of the payment of the debt, so that it becomes due presently when it is not really due until the year 1900. It destroys the obligation of the contracts made with the companies and the original corporators of the company. The question which now presents itself is, has Congress the power to enact such legislation; if so, if Congress professes power, whence has it derived it? I say in the first place that you cannot derive it from the general powers granted to Congress for purposes of legislation; and it might be well to consider at this point this principal provision of the Constitution upon this subject. We only have the grant of legislative power that is contained in our Constitution, which is that the legislative powers herein granted shall be exercised by the Congress of the United States.

But supposing there was no limitation or restriction upon the legislative power; even in that case, I ask you, can you impair the obligation of contracts or destroy vested rights? It is very apparent that it cannot be done, because, in the first place, it is beyond the province of legislative power. The legislative power is not to deal with private individuals or private rights or pieces of property. It deals with general obligations, general duties, and general rights. Then the application of these in their generality to individual cases is reserved to the judicial power of the country. In the next place, I say that the legislative power cannot be so exercised, because in face of all the precedents and of all the authorities I defy the gentleman to cite one where the individual rights, or the value of property acquired by the individual has been permitted to be taken away by legislative authority without just compensation.

If it is your intention by legislative power to confiscate these roads, then let a tribunal be constituted to determine the value of the roads and of the stock held by individals, and then let the Government take possession of the roads and run them. But if you intend simply to exercise your constitutional power and to carry out the original contract, then I invite your attention to authorities upon this point numerous and clear. In Taylor vs. Porter, 4 Hill, 140, it is said:

> If there was not one word of qualification in the whole instrument, I should feel great difficulty in bringing myself to the conclusion that the clause under consideration had clothed the Legislature with despotic power; and such is the extent of their authority, if they can take the property of A, either with or without compensation, and give it to B. The legislative power of this State does not reach to such an unwarrantable extent. Neither life, liberty, nor property, except when forfeited by crime, or when the latter is taken for public use, falls within the scope of the power.

The supreme court of South Carolina in 1792 set aside an act of the colonial legislature which took away the freehold of one man and gave it to another without compensation, although the act was not prohibited by any express constitutional provision. They declared the act to be void as being against common right. (Bowman vs. Middleton, 1 Bay, 252.)

In Briggs vs. Hubbard, 19 Vermont, 91, it was said:

> Every law that takes away or impairs rights vested agreeably to existing laws is retrospective; to say the least of such laws, they are generally unjust, and neither accord with sound legislation nor the fundamental principles of the social compact.

In Rich vs. Flanders, 39 New Hampshire, 335, it is said:

> And Kent, in his commentaries, as we have before seen, states that a retrospective statute affecting and changing vested rights "is very generally considered in this country as unconstitutional and void," though the fact is otherwise in regard to remedial statutes. He does not make any distinction between the different States whose constitutions might differ in their provisions upon that subject, and probably for the best of reasons, that he could find no such difference. Indeed, the statement in our bill of rights, section 23, is but an assertion of a general principle, which was understood to be of universal application in all free governments; a principle which should be, and it is believed has been, applied in all of the States of this Union, without regard to the particular form of their constitution.
> Woodbury, J., in Merril vs. Sherburn, in alluding to the prohibition contained in section 23 of our bill of rights, speaks of them as "fundamental axioms of legislation." And Richardson, C. J., in Woad vs. Winnich, in speaking of retrospective laws, such as divest vested rights, says:
> "Retrospective laws of that kind deserve to be denounced, as they are denounced in our constitution, as highly injurious, oppressive, and unjust. They have been denounced by the most sound and intelligent jurists and statesmen in every age."

In Gardner vs. Village of Newburgh, 2 Johnson, 161, Ct. Chancellor Kent held—

> That, though the Legislature has power to take private property for useful and necessary public purposes, it is bound to provide a fair compensation to the individual whose property is taken, and until a just indemnity is afforded to the party the power cannot legally be exercised. This was when there was no constitutional provision upon the subject of appropriating property for the public use.
> My conclusion is that, upon principle as well as upon authority, a legislative act, whether it be a positive enactment or a repealing statute, which takes away the vested rights of property of individuals for any purpose (except where property is taken for public use and upon a just compensation) is to be adjudged invalid, as being above the power and beyond the scope of legislative authority. (People vs. Westchester, 4 Barbour, page 75.)

That was where in the State of New York there was no provision in its constitution relating to vested rights or relating to the obligation of contracts.

In Fletcher vs. Peck, 6 Cranch, 133, Chief Justice Marshall said:

> Where, then, a law is in its nature a contract—

Here there can be no doubt about this being a contract, for the Supreme Court has said there was a contract. By no act of the legislative authority, and certainly by no act of the judicial authority, can these companies be compelled to pay interest before the maturity of the bonds.

> Where, then, a law is in its nature a contract, when absolute rights have vested under that contract, a repeal of the law cannot divest those rights, and the act of annulling them, if legitimate, is rendered so by a power applicable to the case of every individual in the community.
> It may well be doubted whether the nature of society and of government does not prescribe some limits to the legislative power, and if any be prescribed where are they to be found, if the property of an individual, fairly and honestly acquired, may be seized without compensation.
> To the Legislature all legislative power is granted, but the question whether the act of transferring the property of an individual to the public be in the nature of a legislative power is well worthy of serious reflection.
> It is the peculiar province of the Legislature to prescribe general rules for the government of society; the application of these rules to individuals in society would seem to be the duty of other departments. How far the power of giving the law may involve every other power in cases where the Constitution is silent never has been and perhaps never can be definitely stated.
> The validity of this rescinding act, then, might well be doubted, were Georgia a single, sovereign power.

That related to the State of Georgia, where there was no provision in its constitution in reference to the obligation of contracts, where they had all the legislative power that any Legislature could exercise in the just order of civilized society.

I say, then, that if there were no provision in the Constitution of the United States upon the subject, that what has been proposed by the bill introduced by my colleague from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] could not be sustained upon principle, for it is beyond common right and without the sphere of legitimate legislative authority. It impairs vested rights; it affects the value of property actually and honestly acquired. In doing that it denies that underlying principle, as Mr. Story calls it, which protects the rights of personal liberty and private property, and holds them as sacred.

But is there anything in the Constitution of the United States which confers power upon the legislative authority to impair the obligation of contracts or to divest vested rights? There is only one instance in which it is provided for by that instrument; that is where bankrupt laws are permitttted to be passed. It has been held that there the power is absolute to affect the obligation of contracts and to divest vested rights. But I say that the Constitution of the United States creates a Government of limited powers, and the measure and extent of those powers are to be found in the terms and phrases of the limitation and the delegation. If it be in one case expressly delegated that the obligation of contracts can be impaired, then I maintain the inevitable inference is that it was not intended, if you give a strict construction to the Constitution that the obligation of contracts could be affected in any other case.

But we are not left without judicial authority upon that point. In Griffin vs. Wilcox, 21 Indiana, 370, it was held that Congress had no power to pass a law depriving a person of a right of action against another who had arrested and imprisoned him without due process of law, upon the ground that a right of action was property of which he could not be deprived by the legislative authority.

In Hubbard vs. Brainerd, 35 Connecticut, 563, it was decided that Congress could not take away a vested right to sue for and recover back an illegal tax which had been paid under protest to a collector of the national revenue.

In Kentucky the same doctrine was held as to the power of Congress in Norris vs. Donivan, 4 Metcalf, 355. See also Cooley's Constitutional Limitations, 362, 645.

In Duer on Constitutional Jurisprudence, page 357, the distinguished author says:

A similar restriction with regard to the bills of attainder and ex posto facto laws is imposed by the Constitution on Congress as well as upon the State Legislatures; but not with regard to laws impairing the obligation of contracts, which are also retrospective in their operations, and equally inconsistent with sound legislation and the fundamental principles of the social compact. * * * The power possessed by a State Legislature, to which everything not expressly reserved is granted, and the temptation to abuse that power render express restrictions, if not absolutely necessary, at least prudent and useful; but the national Legislature has no power to interfere with contracts, except when it is expressly given to it. * * * But Congress is expressly invested with this power in regard to bankruptcy as an enumerated and not as an implied power, and in no other form can it impair the obligation of a contract.

In Hepburn vs. Griswold, 8 Wallace, 622, Chief Justice Chase discussed this question; and I refer to his language in connection with the particular point which has been suggested in the argument that because there is a restriction upon the States in regard to impairing the obligation of contracts, there is no restriction as to the Federal Government. In this case the Chief Justice said:

Among the great cardinal principles of that instrument, no one is more conspicuous or more venerable than the establishment of justice. And what was intended by the establishment of justice in the minds of the people who ordained it is happily not matter of disputation. It is not left to inference or conjecture, especially in its relation to contracts. * * * The same principle found more condensed expression in that most valuable provision of the Constitution of the United States, ever recognized as an efficient safeguard against injustice, that "no State shall pass any law impairing the obligation of contracts."

It is true that this prohibition is not applied in terms to the Government of the United States. Congress has express power to enact bankrupt laws, and we do not say that a law made in the execution of any other express power, which incidentally only impairs the obligation of a contract, can be held to be unconstitutional for that reason.

But we think it clear that those who framed and those who adopted the Constitution intended that the spirit of this prohibition should pervade the entire body of legislation, and that the justice which the Constitution was ordained to establish was not thought by them to be compatible with legislation of an opposite tendency. In other words, we cannot doubt that a law not made in pursuance of an express power, which necessarily and in its direct operation impairs the obligation of contracts, is inconsistent with the spirit of the Constitution.

It is true that this opinion was delivered in the legal-tender cases, afterward overruled by a packed Supreme Court. What effect is to be given to a decision made under those circumstances against the protest of Chief Justice Chase himself, I am not here to discuss; but I submit that this statement of his, delivered in that case, so fully according with the spirit of all the other authorities upon that subject, should be regarded as the law governing us; that we should not by acts of legislation impair the obligation of contracts, destroy vested rights, and affect unnecessarily the value of property, unless we propose to take the property by absolute confiscation and give the compensation which the Constitution provides for in such cases.

I maintain, then, that neither in a general grant of legislative power, nor in the particular provisions of the Constitution, can anything be found that justifies the measure which has been proposed by the gentleman from Ohio. But he seeks to argue that by reason of the terms of this contract, by reason of the provisions of the original law incorporating these companies, Congress may exercise this power; and he puts it upon two grounds: first, that there is a provision in the original act declaring that at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of the roads shall be appropriated for the payment of this debt, and, secondly, that there is reserved a power "to alter, amend, or repeal."

Now, I ask attention for a moment to the first argument. It is really one of the most extraordinary propositions I have ever heard maintained, that a provision incorporated into the contract manifestly for the benefit of the debtor should be construed into giving absolute power to the creditor. Suppose in a contract between individuals it should be stipulated that at least 5 per cent. should be paid each year upon a particular debt, does that give power to the creditor to make it 10 per cent. or 50 per cent. at his discretion? No, sir; it is a provision for the benefit of the debtor, that he shall pay at least 5 per cent. and at his discretion as much more as he can. So that the provision in regard to 5 per cent., instead of being a provision out of which can be drawn these enlarged powers by which these companies can be swallowed up by act of legislation, is a limitation upon the power of Congress, and was intended to provide that the debtor should not be compelled to pay more than that except at his own discretion, or (putting it as strongly as possible for the gentleman) except upon the adoption of a new agreement between the debtor and the creditor.

But where can this power be found in the provision reserving authority to "alter, amend, or repeal?" Now, it is an admitted fact that no law passed by any legislative body is irrepealable. No law is beyond alteration or amendment. In every law that is passed this provision is just as much a part as though it were expressed in so many words. The courts have held over and over and over again that the power to repeal exists always. If not, it would be in the power of one Legislature to do for all future ages all legislation upon a particular subject-matter as to which the legislative power attaches. I insist, therefore, that these words incorporated into this statute go into it by a well-known principle with the same meaning and significance and force that they possessed before. If the law were subject to repeal before, how does it become more subject to repeal by asserting it in so many words in the statute? The word "repeal" has its significance derived from the statutes, derived from the history of the common law, derived from the history of congressional legislation. When used in the law, it has the same significance as before. What did it mean before? It meant that the legislative authority could alter, amend, or repeal so as not to divest vested rights or impair the obligation of contracts. Over and over and over again this has been held. It was expressly held in the Dartmouth College case in reference to corporations, and with a view perhaps to avoid somewhat the force of the reasoning in that case these words have been adopted by many Legislatures. What do they mean? Judicial construction is not lacking to determine their significance. In the fifteenth volume of Wallace's Reports are three cases in which this question as to what is implied in this reservation of power arose for decision. In the case of Tomlinson vs. Jessup, on page 459, the Supreme Court say:

The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State. Rights acquired by third parties, and which have become vested under the charter in the legitimate exercise of its powers, stand upon a different footing; but of such right it is unnecessary to speak here. The State only asserts in the present case the power under the reservation to modify its own contract with the corporators; it does not contend for a power to revoke the contracts of the corporation with other parties or to impair any vested right thereby acquired.

In Miller vs. The State, page 498, the court say:

Power to legislate founded upon a reservation in a charter to a private corporation is certainly not without limit; and it may well be admitted that it cannot be exercised to take away or destroy rights acquired by virtue of such a charter, and which by a legitimate use of the powers granted have become vested in the corporation. But it may be safely affirmed that the reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purposes of the grant or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of stockholders and of creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets. Such a reservation, it is held, will not warrant the Legislature in passing laws to change the control of an institution from one religious sect to another, or to divert the fund of the donor to any new use inconsistent with the intent and purpose of the charter, or to compel subscribers to the stock, whose subscription is conditional, to waive any of the conditions of their contract.

In Holyoke Co. vs. Lyman, 15 Wallace, 519, it is said, "Vested rights, it is conceded, cannot be destroyed or impaired under such a reserved power;" i. e., power to alter, amend, or repeal acts of incorporation.

So the Supreme Court of the United States in a very recent decision, after full consideration of the question, has decided that the power to alter, amend, or repeal incorporated into a statute is with limit, and the limit is it shall not impair the obligation of contracts or divest vested rights. It is precisely the limitation the same roads had before it was incorporated into the statute.

In Commonwealth vs. Essex County, 13 Gray, 253, it is said:

The rule to be extracted is this, that when under power in a charter rights have been acquired and become vested, no amendment or alteration of the charter can take away the property or rights which have become vested under a legitimate exercise of the powers granted.

This decision was made when by the general statute of the State of Maine it was provided that "all acts of incorporation are passed subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal, at the pleasure of the Legislature."

In Curran vs. Arkansas, 15 Howard, 5104, the Supreme Court say:

We do not consider, therefore, that the power of the State to repeal this charter enables the State to pass a law impairing the obligation of its contracts.

I defy the gentleman, with all his research, to produce a single authority anywhere in which a doctrine contrary to this has been held. In a very able case decided in 15 Monroe's Law and Equity Reports, page 357, the syllabus is this—I will not detain the House by reading the whole of the opinion:

A reservation by the Legislature in a charter to alter, repeal, or amend does not imply the power to alter or change the vested rights acquired by the corporators under the charter, and to add new parties and managers without the consent of the corporators.

The discussion is very full and elaborate. I quote briefly from the opinion:

And the question is, had the Legislature power, under the reserved right in the original charter, to alter, amend, or repeal the act incorporating the trustees, to assume to themselves, against the will and consent of the board of trustees, the very privilege which they had granted to the trustees. There can be no doubt that, without the reservation contained in the original act, the Legislature would have no right to make such an enactment without the consent of the trustees. The contrary is not urged in argument. The corporation is a private, not a public, one. The charter is a contract between the government and the trustees who were thereby incorporated. By this contract certain rights and immunities were vested in and conferred upon the trustees who were incorporated, and the Legislature had no right or power to change these rights and immunities, or to impair them, against the will and consent of the corporators, except so far as they had reserved the right to do so. If the act of the Legislature does not come within, but is contrary to, the spirit and meaning of the reservation, it impairs the obligation of the contract, and it becomes our unpleasant duty to declare the act unconstitutional and void.

I would ask gentlemen where in all the range of authorities, where in all the great writers of political economy, where in all the reports as we find them in England and this country, where in all our own great writers on constitutional law, they can find the power to pass the law sought to be enacted here in the speech of my colleague from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE?]

When Chief Justice Marshall and Mr. Justice Story and Chancellor Kent have declared that the legislative power, if there were no limitations upon it, either by previous acts of legislation or by constitutional provisions, could not pass such a law as this, will this House say it can exercise this power? If there were any authority anywhere to justify the doctrine which gentlemen proclaim, if there were any intelligent text-writer anywhere who justified the doctrine gentlemen maintain, I would have some doubt about the proposition I am urging, and I would not have the temerity to come here and fight the majority of the Judiciary Committee of the House; but I say I am justified and sustained by the text-writers, by all the books I have been able to examine. There is not an intelligent judicial authority, in my judgment, to be found maintaining the contrary proposition. If, therefore, we are without any authority in the very nature of legislative power, if without any authority by reason of the express grants to Congress by the Constitution of the United States, if without any authority under the provisions of this contract, entered into between these companies and the General Government, as expressed in the laws of 1862 and 1864, I ask the House to hesitate before it passes this bill.

I heard this afternoon, while the matter was under discussion, a distinguished gentleman say, in conversation with some one of his fellow-members, as a reason why a certain vote should be passed as to the order of business for this day, that this bill should be considered, because they meant to compel the railroads to pay what they owed to the Government. I felt like inquiring whether he had examined the question. I felt like asking the gentleman to point to the number of dollars the companies owed the Government. Has not the Supreme Court held that they do not owe the interest until the principal matures? Does not the contract, the bond, declare that the principal is not due until the time fixed by the terms of the bond (nearly twenty years) shall have been reached? Money due! You can say to-day you will enforce the provisions of the law for protecting the security which the law has contemplated and provided for; but I ask whether you can go further without the consent of the companies themselves?

Mr. Speaker, this is a higher question than the mere question of compelling railroad companies to pay debts. It reaches into the sphere of governmental obligation and governmental duties to the grand principles of free government and fair dealing by the Government toward its citizens. I have seen too much disposition to abandon the promises and pledges of the Government; I have seen too much disposition to say law shall be repealed to the destruction of vested rights and impairment of contract obligations, and I trust at least this side of the House will not embark in measures and schemes that sooner or later will involve the Government in dishonor and broken credit.

The contract may be a bad one. It may be true, as the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] remarked, that even if we pass his bill it will give $100,000,000 to these companies. It may be true that the companies will make two or three hundred millions of dollars or more. But the gentleman is more responsible for that than I am. This is my first session of Congress. I was not here when the law was passed; nor were my political friends in a majority in this House when it was passed. Even if the gentleman and his friends made bad contracts and passed laws pledging the credit of the Government, on the faith of which the capitalists of the world have invested vast sums of money, it is our duty to see the contracts enforced and the honest obligations of the Government liquidated. It may have been unwise legislation. I had occasion to say I regretted it, at the time it passed. But then here are the rights and duties and obligations of the Government, and I say the honor of this great country requires that they shall be regarded.

To-day there was handed to me a bill which represents the views of both of these companies upon the questions involved, and it presents a proposition to the Congress of the United States for the settlement of this matter. I may say here that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] has read an extract from a letter written by the president of the Pacific Railroad Company to indicate that he had no disposition or inclination to have a settlement of this claim. On the contrary, I believe the letter was written with the object of obtaining a settlement, because the interest of the companies, as well as the interest of the Government, requires that something shall be done so that this debt shall ultimately be discharged.

The provisions of this bill I have not examined. I am not prepared to commit myself to the advocacy of one of them; but believing that it has been drawn with an honest purpose and intention that some agreement may be reached, I submit it that it may be read. I send this bill to the desk and ask the Clerk to read it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I understand the gentleman does not indorse it himself.

Mr. HURD. I desire to offer it as a substitute.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Do you indorse it yourself?

Mr. HURD. No, sir. I desire to have it printed and to have it considered by the House. I introduce it by request, and I do not commit myself to any of its provisions. After a thorough study of it, I may.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

A bill to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the Government bonds advanced to the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and to the Union Pacific Railroad Company, under and in pursuance of the act of Congress entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and the acts amending the same or supplemental thereto, and for the settlement of the claim of the Government on account of said bonds.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That for the purpose of liquidating the claim of the Government on account of the bonds advanced under said act of July 1, 1862, and the acts amending the same or supplemental thereto, the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to carry to the credit of a sinking fund for the Central Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of California, the successor by consolidation of the Central Pacific Railroad Company of California and the Western Pacific Railroad Company, and to the credit of a sinking fund for the Union Pacific Railroad Company, the amount due, or which may be due, the said companies for the carriage and transportation of the mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores for the Government under the acts aforesaid, up to and including the 31st day of December, 1875, which, if not amounting at said date to the sum of $1,000,000, shall be made up by the respective companies to that sum.

SEC. 2. That the said Central Pacific Railroad Company and the said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall each pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $750,000 per annum in equal semi-annual installments on the 1st day of April and October in each year, commencing on the 1st day of October, 1876, either in lawful money or in any bonds or securities of the United States Government, at par until such sums shall, with interest thereon as hereinafter provided, be sufficient, when added to the other sums to the credit of said sinking fund, to pay off and extinguish the balance of the claim for the Government bonds advanced as aforesaid, with 6 per cent. interest thereon from their respective dates. Interest on all sums placed to the credit of said sinking fund shall be credited and added thereto semi-annually at the rate of 6 per cent. per annum: Provided, however, That if the foregoing provisions shall prove insufficient to extinguish the balance of the claim of the Government aforesaid by the 1st day of October in the year 1910, the semi-annual payments shall be increased to such a sum as will be sufficient for that purpose.

SEC. 3. That the payments so to be made by said companies shall be in lieu of all payments or other requirements from said companies under said act, and the amendments thereto, in relation to the re-imbursement to the Government of the bonds so issued to said corporations: Provided, however, That, until the claims of the Government for said bonds and interest are fully paid, said companies shall not in any manner be released from their present liabilities to keep the said railroads and telegraph lines, constructed under the acts of Congress aforesaid, in repair and use, and to transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines, and transport mails, troops, munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government, whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, at fair and reasonable rates of compensation; the whole amount of which shall, upon the compliance by the companies with the provisions hereof, be paid by the Government to said companies on the adjustment of the accounts therefor; and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid; said rates not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service: And provided also, That all Government freight and transportation destined for points between the Missouri River and the Pacific coast, and on the Pacific coast, shall be sent by the said railroads until the aforesaid claims of the Government on account of bonds advanced to the companies are fully paid and satisfied; and that, until the aforesaid claims of the Government are satisfied, no discrimination shall be made against said companies in the rates of compensation for the carriage of the United States mails.

SEC. 4. That the mortgage of the Government created by the fifth section of the act of July 1, 1862, amended by the act of July 2, 1864, shall not be in any way impaired or released by the operations of this act unless or until the obligations of said companies, respectively, to the Government under said section 5 are, in accordance with the provisions of this act or otherwise, fully and perfectly performed; but said mortgage shall remain in full force and virtue, and, upon the failure of said companies to perform the obligations imposed upon them by this act, said mortgage shall be enforced as if this act had not been passed; the Government, however, duly crediting and allowing to the respective companies upon said mortgage all payments which may have been made in part execution of this act.

SEC. 5. That each of said companies shall be entitled at any time, whenever its financial condition will allow, to pay to the Government, in lieu of the semi-annual payments provided for in section 2 of this act, which may then remain to be made before the full payment and extinguishment of the balance of the Government claims as aforesaid, the then present value of all such future semi-annual payments, computed according to an interest-rate of 6 per cent. per annum; and upon such payment of the present value the said balance of the Government claim shall be discharged without further semi-annual payments. And each of said companies shall also be entitled, at any time, to commute at the same rate any of said semi-annual payments herein provided for by the payment of a specific sum equal to the then present value of such of said semi-annual payments so desired to be commuted, but the sum so paid shall not be less than $1,000,000 at any one time.

SEC. 6. That so much of the proviso to section 3 of the act of July 1, 1862, as reads as follows, "And all such lands so granted by this section which shall not be sold or disposed of by said company within three years after the entire road shall have been completed shall be subject to settlement and pre-emption, like other lands, at a price not exceeding $1.25 per acre, to be paid to said company," be, and the same is hereby, repealed: Provided, however, That said lands shall not be sold by said companies at prices exceeding an average of $2.50 per acre, and that said companies shall apply for and take out patents for the lands as fast as they are required for settlement and sale; and until said lands are patented they shall not be subject to local taxation under State, territorial, or municipal authority.

SEC. 7. That if this act shall be accepted by the said companies within four months from the date of its passage by votes of the directors and stockholders at regular meetings duly called, the same shall be deemed and construed to be a final settlement between the Government and the company or companies so accepting the same; such acceptance to be filed with the Secretary of the Treasury.

SEC. 8. That all acts and parts of acts inconsistent with this act are hereby repealed.

Mr. HURD. It seems to me that this matter is of sufficient importance to justify the House in holding that this measure which has just been read be printed, and that there be a delay in the final vote upon the bill until it has been printed and laid upon the tables of members, so that we may be informed of its provisions. I desire to make that motion, if it be in order.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is not in order. That is not in accordance with the arrangement which was made yesterday. The arrangement was that after two hours' debate the previous question should be called. The gentleman of course can offer that as a substitute. But the order of the House last evening was that there should be two hours for discussion and that then the previous question should be called. The gentleman will have the right to offer an amendment, but it is not in order yet. The motion to reconsider is now pending. I will indicate when the amendment will be in order.

Mr. HURD. I was not here last evening, and was not aware what was the order made by the House. I desire to have this bill printed before the final vote is taken on the passage of the bill reported by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to ask a question of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.] Are there any sanctions in his bill by which the Government can enforce its provisions if the railroad companies shall not choose to accept them?

Mr. HURD. The gentleman speaks of it as being my bill. It was handed to me to-day as a proposition which the railroad companies would accept.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I think they would.

Mr. HURD. I have not read it all through. I have not considered all its provisions, and am unable to say what it does contain.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. What is the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio?

Mr. HURD. I desire to make some proposition which shall be in order. The motion that I endeavored to make was that this substitute be printed and laid on the tables of members before the final vote shall be taken on the bill of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. After the question of reconsideration is disposed of, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. HURD] can offer a substitute, and may ask to have it printed and move a postponement. But the first question in order is the privileged question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. CROUNSE. What is the attitude of that paper or bill which has been read at the Clerk's desk?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has only been read for information as part of the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD.]

Mr. CROUNSE. It seems that nobody is willing to assume the paternity of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio desires to have it printed, and says he proposes to offer it as a substitute for the pending bill. That will be assuming the paternity of it.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now ask for a vote on the motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the question. The question before the House is, Will the House reconsider the vote by which the pending bill was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary?

The question being taken, it was decided in the affirmative; and the vote was reconsidered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is now upon the recommitment of the bill.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 29, noes 79; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. HURD and Mr. LAWRENCE were appointed.

Mr. SPRINGER. I ask unanimous consent to have my name recorded on the last roll-call. I came in a moment too late to vote on the question of taking up this bill. I vote "ay."

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The rule positively prohibits a vote being added to the roll-call after it is completed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to have his name recorded.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object.

The question being on the recommitment of the bill, the House again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 36, noes 111.

So the House refused to recommit the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is now before the House for action.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The fourth section of the bill was drawn with a view to requiring the first payment to be made on the 1st day of July this year. As that time has passed, I have changed the dates in the fourth section so as to make the payments commence on the 1st of January next. I move to strike out section 4, and to insert in lieu thereof the section as I have changed it and which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 4. That it shall be the duty of the several railroad companies to which bonds were issued under any of the several acts of which this act is amendatory to provide a sinking fund for the payment, according to law, of the interest and principal of such bonds, and for re-imbursing the United States for such sums as have been, and may from time to time be, advanced and paid by the United States upon such bonds and interest, and which may not be re-imbursed from compensation for services as now provided by law, and from 5 per cent. of net earnings. And for the purpose of providing such sinking fund said companies shall severally be required to pay into the Treasury of the United States, in addition to the said compensation for services and 5 per cent. of net earnings, the following annual installments, to wit: The Union Pacific Railroad Company shall, during the period of ten years from and after the 1st day of January, 1877, inclusive, pay annually into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $750,000, to be paid one-half on January 1, and the other half on July 1 in each of said years. And during each and every year commencing with the expiration of said period of ten years, the said Union Pacific Railroad Company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States $1,000,000 until the whole amount of bonds issued to said company, together with interest, shall have been fully paid, one-half of each annual installment to be paid on the 1st of January, and the other half on the 1st of July. And the said Central Pacific Railroad Company, on its own account and on account of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, shall, during the period of ten years from and after the 1st day of January, 1877, pay annually into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $568,210, to be paid one-half on January 1 and the other half on July 1 in each of said years. And during each and every year, commencing with the expiration of said period of ten years, the said Central Pacific Railroad Company shall pay into the Treasury of the United States the sum of $760,330, until the whole amount of bonds issued to said company, together with interest, shall have been paid, one-half of each annual installment to be paid on the 1st day of January and the other half on the 1st day of July: Provided, That the sums paid into the sinking fund under this act shall apply first to the extinguishment of interest and the balance to the principal of the aforesaid bonds. And there shall be paid into the Treasury on account of said sinking fund, annually, one-half on the 1st day of January and the other half on the 1st day of July in each year, by the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, $87,327; by the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $22,296; and by the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $20,723, until the bonds issued to said companies respectively, and the interest thereon, shall be fully paid. And said several companies shall owe and be indebted to the United States in the several sums required to be by them respectively paid as aforesaid. And any company may pay any sum herein required to be paid in bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par.

The total sum required to be paid by any company in any one year by virtue of this act, and including said 5 per cent. of net earnings and said compensation for services as now required by law, shall not exceed the several sums following, to wit: By the Central Pacific Railroad Company, on its own account, $1,861,484, and on account of the Western Pacific Railroad Company, $133,588; the Union Pacific Railroad Company, $1,969,462; the Kansas Pacific Railway Company, $489,034; the Central Branch Union Pacific Railroad Company, $124,856; and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Company, $116,050.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now ask the previous question on the bill and the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman admit the substitute offered by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. HURD?]

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does my colleague on the Judiciary Committee desire to offer that substitute for the bill? If he desires it, I have no objection to a vote being taken upon it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Ohio desire to offer the substitute which he had read for this bill?

Mr. HURD. The substitute has not been printed and it cannot be fully understood by the House, and therefore I will not press it to a vote.

The question was put upon seconding the previous question; and on a division there were—ayes 103, noes 2.

Mr. LANE. I call the attention of the Chair to the fact that no quorum has voted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair, then, must appoint tellers.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I hope no further count will be insisted on; it will only consume the time of the House.

Mr. LANE. I insist upon a further count.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LAWRENCE and Mr. LANE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 130, noes 17.

So the previous question was seconded. The main question was then ordered to be put.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I am now entitled to one hour to close the debate, and I will yield to my colleague on the committee from Virginia [Mr. HUNTON] for such time as he desires. How long does the gentleman require?

Mr. HUNTON. Just as long as you choose.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Very well; I yield absolutely to the gentleman.

Mr. HUNTON. Mr. Speaker, the magnitude of the interests involved and the delicate and complicated relations between the Government and the Pacific Railroad companies, constitute my excuse for trespassing on the time of the House.

By the act aproved July 1, 1862, the Union Pacific Railroad Company was incorporated for the purpose of constructing a railroad and telegraph line from the hundredth meridian west longitude in Nebraska to the western boundary of Nevada. By the same act the Central Pacific Railroad Company, incorporated under the laws of California, was also authorized to construct similar lines from San Francisco to the eastern boundary of California, connecting with the Union Pacific line at that point.

To enable these companies to construct their lines, the United States Government granted to them in said act five alternate sections of public lands on each side of said roads and within the limits of ten miles.

It was provided further that upon the completion of each forty miles (afterward reduced to twenty) the Government should issue to the said companies $16,000 per mile in Government 6 per cent. bonds, payable in thirty years, to be secured to the Government by the first lien on the roads. This sum of $16,000 per mile was to be increased to $48,000 for three hundred miles across the mountains, and to $32,000 for one hundred and fifty miles between the Rocky Mountains and Sierra Nevada Mountains.

In consideration of this munificent generosity of the Government these companies were bound to pay the bonds at maturity, keep their lines in repair, and at all times transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, public stores, and transmit dispatches whenever required to do so by the Government, the compensation for such services to be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest, and at least 5 per cent of the net earnings of said roads should annually be applied to the same purpose.

By subsequent provisions of the act, the Kansas Pacific, the Western Pacific, the Central branch, Union Pacific, and the Sioux City and Pacific Railroad Companies were authorized to be constructed and extended as branches of the two main lines on the same terms.

Congress reserved in this act a modified right to amend, alter, or repeal the said act.

But this generosity did not satisfy the parties who designed to take hold of the provisions of this act and who were named as corporators in the act. They did not begin to build these roads under this law and came before Congress asking further and additional aid. The act of July 2, 1864, was passed. By it the land grants were doubled. The amount to be retained by the Government for its transportation of supplies, troops, &c., was reduced one-half. The companies were authorized to issue their own bonds to the same amount that bonds of the Government were issued, and these bonds of the companies, debts preferred before those of the Government by a first mortgage. The only benefit which was secured to the Government by the act of 1864 was the unconditional right to alter, amend, or repeal.

These companies at once commenced operations and before the time provided had completed their roads.

Under these two laws the various companies became entitled to $39,931,766 acres of land, as follows:

	Acres.
Union Pacific	12,000,000
Central Pacific, including late Western Pacific, now consolidated	9,100,000
Kansas Pacific	6,000,000
Denver Pacific	1,100,000
Central branch, Union Pacific	245,166
Burlington and Missouri River, in Nebraska	2,441,600
Sioux City and Pacific	45,000
Total	30,931,766

These figures are from approximate estimates merely, the adjustment of the grants not having been so nearly completed as to justify an attempt to state accurately the amount of lands inuring to each.

2. Of these lands the following amounts have been patented to the respective companies:

	Acres.
Union Pacific	1,625,402.28
Central Pacific, including the Western Pacific, consolidated	764,607.74
Kansas Pacific	516,555.19
Denver Pacific	49,811.59
Central branch, Union Pacific	186,453.28
Burlington and Missouri River	2,374,749.92
Sioux City and Pacific	40,196.64
Total	5,556,776.64

They have received from the Government bonds to the amount of $64,623,512, as follows:

Name of railway.	Authorizing acts.	Rate of interest.	Principal outstanding.
		Per cent.
Central Pacific	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6	$25,885,120 00
Kansas Pacific	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6	6,303,000 00
Union Pacific	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6	27,236,512 00
Central branch, Union Pacific	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6	1,600,000 00
Western Pacific	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6	1,970,560 00
Sioux City and Pacific	July 1, 1862, and July 2, 1864.	6	1,628,320 00
Total			64,623,512 00

Bonds payable thirty years from date; interest payable January and July.

On these subsidy bonds, amounting to $64,623,512, the Government has already paid $30,141,513 in interest, and owes for interest accrued and not yet paid to March, 1876, $646,235. These roads were completed, or most of them were, about the middle of the year 1869, and have been running ever since. Their incomes have been very large. By a report of the Secretary of the Interior, dated January 18, 1876, the net earnings of these roads for 1875 were as follows:

Union Pacific	$6,148,365 67
Central Pacific	8,021,498 13
Kansas Pacific	1,212,722 63
Sioux City and Pacific	210,230 66

These figures show that these companies are receiving very large sums of money annually out of which they could pay the semi-annual interest on the subsidy bonds, but they have instead disposed of the net earnings in dividends and left the Government to pay this interest.

To illustrate their ability to pay this interest, we will take as an example the Union Pacific. Its subsidy bonds amount to $27,236,212. One year's interest is $1,634,172, which could certainly be paid out of its net earnings of $6,148,365.67 and leave a large surplus for repairs and dividends.

It was expected that these companies would as soon as their net earnings justified it pay the semi-annual interest on the subsidy bonds and to that extent relieve the Treasury of the Government which had been so generous to them.

The debates upon the passage of these bills show that the construction placed upon the bills was that the companies would pay this interest as it fell due.

The Attorney-General, A. T. Akerman, in an elaborate opinion on this subject, dated December 15, 1870, addressed to the Secretary of the Treasury, concludes as follows:

My conclusion, then, is that the Government may lawfully claim from the company the amount of the interest in question as soon as such interest is paid by the Government.

To the particular question in your letter of November 23, I answer that the Government may retain the entire amount of compensation for services rendered to it by the company, applying the same to the interest paid by the United States, unless such interest shall have been repaid by the company, and in that event one-half of the compensation for such services may be reserved and applied to the principal of the bonds.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

But these companies have taken the ground that they are not bound to pay and will not pay the interest on the subsidy bonds until they mature—thirty years from their date.

This position taken by the companies was considered a breach of faith with the Government and a poor return for its generosity lavished upon it with an open hand. But the Supreme Court of the United States has sustained this position, and by existing laws the Government is powerless to collect this interest which it has to pay semi-annually for thirty years.

Amount of subsidy bonds as above	$64,623,512
Simple interest for about thirty years	114,322,300
Principal and interest at maturity	178,945,812

The interest upon these bonds has to be paid semi-annually, and if it is ever re-imbursed fully the interest so paid should become an interest-bearing sum, and at the maturity of the bonds they would owe the Government $380,736,083.79 by compounding the interest.

But by the decision of the Supreme Court the Government can only receive at maturity the principal and simple interest under existing laws. It may be that Congress does not possess the power to change the law in this particular; certain it is that no such change is attempted in the bill of the committee.

At the maturity of these bonds there will then be due from the companies to the Government the sum of $178,945,812, diminished by the credit of one-half of the compensation due from the Government for transportation of troops, supplies, &c., and by 5 per cent. on the net earnings; leaving at maturity at least the sum of $150,000,000 due from them to the Government.

It is the duty of Congress to provide for the payment of that sum at that time by appropriate legislation.

If we act the part of unfaithful public servants and take no action to provide the means to pay this enormous debt, it is almost certain these companies will take none, and at the time it falls due it will be impossible for them to pay this debt and interest. Their first-mortgage bonds have priority over the subsidy bonds. They amount to the same sum as the subsidy bonds, $64,623,512. If a sale is made under this first mortgage no private person or corporation could purchase so large and valuable a property at what is due on first-mortgage bonds. The Government must then become the purchaser and pay off the first mortgage or lose the amount of the subsidy bonds, both principal and interest.

The first alternative is forbidden by wise statesmanship; for no one could advise the Government to become the owner of these vast corporate franchises, the operations of which would not be profitable and would develop fraud and corruption which would dwarf the operations of the Credit Mobilier. It is plain that something must be done at once to protect the Government from a loss of $150,000,000. We shall be criminal if no effort is made to save a sum so large to the Government. The people, already overburdened with taxation, will not excuse us if they have to pay additional taxes to meet this vast sum lost to the Government by our most culpable neglect.

Let it be our endeavor to make no unjust or harsh law against these corporations, on the one hand, and, on the other, to enact some provision which will secure to the Government at the maturity of the bonds at least the aggregate of the sums paid by it semi-annually in interest, and thereafter pay the interest as it shall fall due, and gradually but surely extinguish the principal. I would in this way deal liberally by these companies, although they are not entitled to much forbearance at our hands.

It was supposed that these companies thus generously dealt with by the Government, with a property in their hands practically given them by the Government and of immense value, would have proceeded to build their roads in the most judicious, economical, and honest manner. But the contrary was the fact. The frauds and cheats of these companies have made the country blush with shame. Some of them are enumerated in the following extracts from the Wilson Credit Mobilier report on the Union Pacific, dated February 20, 1873:

Congress relied for the performance of these great trusts by the corporators upon their sense of public duty; upon the fact that they were to deal with and protect a large capital of their own, which they were to pay in in money; upon the presence of five directors appointed by the President especially to represent the public interest, who were to own no stock; one of whom should be a member of every committee, standing or special; upon commissioners to be appointed by the President, who should examine and report upon the work as it progressed; in certain cases upon the certificate of the chief engineer, to be made upon his professional honor; and, lastly, upon the reserved power to add to, alter, amend, or repeal the act.

Your committee find themselves constrained to report that the moneys borrowed by the corporation, under a power given them, only to meet the necessities of the construction and endowment of the road, have been distributed in dividends among the corporators; that the stock was issued, not to men who paid for it at par in money, but who paid for it at not more than thirty cents on the dollar in road-making; that of the Government directors, some of them have neglected their duties and others have been interested in the transactions by which the provisions of the organic law have been evaded; that at least one of the commissioners appointed by the President has been directly bribed to betray his trust by the gift of $25,000; that the chief engineer of the road was largely interested in the contracts for its construction; and that there has been an attempt to prevent the exercise of the reserved power in Congress by inducing influential members of Congress to become interested in the profits of the transaction. So that of the safeguards above enumerated, none seem to be left but the sense of public duty of the corporators.

Your committee, therefore, proceed to report the facts as they have been able to gather them from the evidence, relative to the manner in which the parties in whom these trusts were reposed have discharged them, and the consequences which have followed.

Your committee present the following summary of cost of this road to the railroad company and to the contractors, as appears by the books:

Cost to railroad company.
Hoxie contract	$12,974,416 24
Ames contract	57,140,102 94
Davis contract	23,431,768 10
Total	93,546,287 28
Cost to contractors.
Hoxie contract	$7,896,183 33
Ames contract	27,285,141 99
Davis contract	15,629,633 62
	50,720,958 94
	42,825,328 34
To this should be added amount paid Credit Mobilier on account of fifty-eight miles	1,104,000 00
Total profit on construction	43,925,328 34

These extracts show to a small extent how the Government was cheated and defrauded, and how the directors under the cover of the Credit Mobilier made the road cost $43,925,328.34 more than its actual cost to them, which large sum of money went into their pockets or was squandered in purchasing legislation and corrupting the very avenues to the Capitol. Nor were these enormities confined to the Union Pacific. It is confidently believed they are all guilty. But no such searching investigation has been made into the others; we may suppose because Congress was too sick at the disclosures already made to attempt any more.

The gentleman from California, [Mr. PIPER,] in a speech delivered on this floor on the 8th of April, 1876, spoke of the Central Pacific and its branches as follows:

The Central Pacific Railroad of California in 1870 became consolidated with the Western Pacific, the San Joaquin Valley, and the San Francisco, Oakland and Alameda Railroad Companies under the name of the Central Pacific Railroad.

With a desire to own every pass and natural avenue to the Pacific, the directors, by well-known means, also secured control of the Southern Pacific Railroad Company, a corporation formed October 11, 1870, by the consolidation of the San Francisco and San José, the Southern Pacific of California, the Santa Clara and Pajaró Valley, and the California Railroad Companies. The Southern Pacific Railroad of California should not be confounded with the Southern Pacific Railroad of Texas.

The schemes of these men to secure immense profits in the construction of roads to the Pacific were similar to those of the Credit Mobilier of America.

He then refers to a suit in California relating to the Central Pacific, and says:

Under these circumstances, the account given by Samuel Brannan, the plaintiff in this suit, may be considered as substantially true. He asserts that C. P. Huntington, Leland Stanford, Mark Hopkins, Charles Crocker, E. B. Crocker, and others, being a majority of the directors of the Central Pacific, formed themselves into a company styled the contract and finance company, for the purpose of taking contracts for the construction of the road at rates largely in excess of the sum at which the work could have been let out to responsible parties. The said directors then entered into a contract with themselves, as members of this fictitious corporation, for the construction of the Central Pacific, and transferred to the contract and finance company the entire subsidies of land, money, and bonds granted by the United States, the States of California and Nevada, and various municipal corporations of California in aid of the enterprise. They also granted to Wells, Fargo & Co. the exclusive right of running express trains for the transportation of freight, packages, and bullion over the Central Pacific, and received as pay for the concession stock in that company. They also bought up the stock of competing railroads, and, receiving the subsidy bonds from the United States, appropriated to themselves the profits of said roads. They so managed their operations, principally through the contract and finance company, as to earn immense profits, recklessly increasing the cost of building the Central Pacific to double or treble the amount necessary.

In order to obtain these immense grants of land and money, and to procure the re-organization of the competing railroads purchased by them, and to secure their re-election as officers thereof, they expended vast sums of money in lobbying, and in carrying out their schemes generally they rode rough-shod over the people of the Pacific coast, using every conceivable mode of oppression. These grave charges are substantially confirmed by the reluctant testimony of Richard Franchot and C. P. Huntington, given in the early part of 1873 before the special committee of this House appointed to investigate the operations of the Central Pacific.

House Executive Document No. 127, first session Forty-fourth Congress.

Act of 1862, section 6; act of 1864, section 10. In House Executive Document No. 127, first session Forty-fourth Congress, page 12, the Government directors of the Union Pacific Company say, referring to the case recently decided by the Supreme Court:

The company claims that the doctrine of this case evidently is that there is nothing due to the Government from the company on account of either principal or interest until the maturity of the subsidy bonds except one-half of such sum as the Government may create by its demands for transportation, and that, in fact, the only mode of re-imbursement now provided by law, either before, at, or after the maturity of the bonds, is this one-half of Government transportation, which is made by the tenth section of the act of July 2, 1864, to run so long in the future as there may be anything due to the Government, and even as against parties who may become possessed of the road under and by virtue of a foreclosure of the first mortgage—claiming that any other construction leaves nothing for the amendment relative to compensation for services rendered by the Government, contained in the fifth section of the said act, to operate upon.

This picture is too dark for further contemplation. There is a better and purer view to take of it. We turn from their corruptions with loathing to contemplate the magnificent work constructed by the Government. And while the world will never be able to think of this great work without horror at the corruptions of its constructors, yet it is a grand enterprise, greatly above anything of its kind in the world. Over twenty-seven hundred miles of continuous railway, with connections measuring as much more, spanning a continent, scaling mountains, furnishing a rapid transmission of mails and military stores, diminishing the costs of the Army, and binding remote sections of this Union together with an iron band.

This vast railroad line ought not to be crippled, and care should be taken that the object of Congress in its liberality to these roads should not be defeated. For these reasons and as a prudent financial measure, we should deal justly by these companies, as little as they deserve consideration, and impose no burden on them they cannot readily bear.

Can they bear such legislation as will provide as this bill does for a sinking fund which will pay all the interest due the Government on its bonds at their maturity and which will thereafter pay the interest semi-annually as it accrues and extinguish the principal in less than twenty years after maturity? Their ability is shown by a statement already made of the net earnings of the Central Pacific for the year 1875 of $8,031,498. Out of this immense sum the sum of $586,210 for ten years and $760,330 afterward provided for by the bill as a sinking fund can be paid and large dividends still be declared. No allowance is here made for the future increase of the net earnings, which, if we judge the future by the past, will be very large.

This bill is not only imperatively demanded at our hands for the protection of the Government, but it is demanded by the true interest of these companies. It certainly is to the interest of these companies that they shall be required to pay the sums enumerated in this bill annually rather than be sold out at maturity of the bonds to raise principal and interest accumulated into such a sum as to make payment impossible. This view of the subject is forcibly and clearly presented in a letter of Sidney Dillon, president of the Union Pacific, to Secretary Bristow, dated February 9, 1876, from which the following is extracted:

UNION PACIFIC RAILROAD COMPANY, PRESIDENT'S OFFICE,
23 Nassau Street, New York, February 9, 1875.

SIR: The existing relations between the Government and the Union Pacific Railroad Company are such as benefit neither party and tend continually to the injury of both.

The Government, in the prosecution of what it deems to be its just rights, has instituted legal proceedings against the company for claims of different origin and widely different character, and those claims are about to undergo or have already undergone judicial determination. Nothing can be more distasteful to this company than to have even the appearance of resisting a just demand of the Government. The directors, speaking for the stockholders, recognize and fully appreciate the great and generous aid extended by the Government to this magnificent enterprise, and it is their wish to do everything in their power to re-imburse to the Government, so far as they can and as speedily as may be, every dollar advanced from the national Treasury. The company also feel very keenly the disadvantage they incur, both in popular esteem and pecuniary resources, by being in seeming conflict with their great benefactor, the Government, and it is their most earnest desire to do everything they can to establish such relations of mutual trust and confidence as will best secure the demands of the Government and at the same time promote the prosperity of the company; and by promoting the prosperity of the company I do not mean simply the enhancement of the value of the property, but such extensions of the uses, resources, and facilities as will most rapidly develop the great national domain which it traverses for a thousand miles; and I would respectfully call your attention to the important fact that this great domain cannot be developed without increasing in value immensely the Government lands along the line of the road, and, in addition, increase the area of taxable property, a matter of vital importance to the whole country.

The mortgage held by the Government, in its terms and by judicial decision of the United States circuit court, cannot be enforced until the maturity of the bonds, which is near the close of the present century.

The bonds are accumulating an interest account, also uncollectable until the principal is due. Principal and interest, when due, will amount to the very large aggregate of overy $77,000,000, though the actual amount advanced by the Government was only $27,236,512.

For this very large amount the Government has only a second mortgage, and if it be allowed to accumulate, without any provision being made to meet it, the company will probably be utterly unable to pay it.

At the same time, it is equally manifest that the Government will be unable to collect it, except upon the assumption that it will advance the money to discharge prior mortgages, and run the road on Government account—a policy which wise statesmanship could not advise.

By standing still, therefore, the company has a load of debt accumulating, for which no provision is made, and the Government is drifting farther and farther from the opportunity to secure a just return for its advances. To do nothing is to injure both the Government and the company, perhaps irretrievably to both.

It cannot be otherwise than eminently proper that this bill which provides for a sinking fund from each of the said companies, as follows:

Union Pacific, first ten years	$750,000
Union Pacific, afterward	1,000,000
Central Pacific, first ten years	568,210
Central Pacific, afterward	760,330
Kansas Pacific	87,327
Central Branch	22,297
Sioux City	20,723

to be paid each year in semi-annual installments into the Treasury to be invested and compounded to pay the interest and principal of these subsidy bonds, should pass, provided Congress has the power and the right to pass such a law.

Has Congress the right to pass it? The act of 1862, section 18, provides:

SEC. 18. That whenever it appears that the net earnings of the entire road and telegraph, including the amount allowed for services rendered for the United States, after deducting all expenditures, including repairs, and the furnishing, running, and managing of said road, shall exceed 10 per cent. upon its cost, exclusive of the 5 per cent. to be paid to the United States, Congress may reduce the rates of fare thereon if unreasonable in amount, and may fix and establish the same by law. And the better to accomplish the object of this act, namely, to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroad and telegraph line and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but particularly in time of war) the use and benefits of the same for postal, military, and other purposes, Congress may at any time, having due regard for the rights of said companies named herein, add to, alter, amend, or repeal this act.

This is maintained to be, and I think is, only a modified right of repeal, alteration, and amendment, and can only be exercised under it the better to promote the public interest and welfare by the construction of said railroads and telegraph lines and keeping the same in working order, and to secure to the Government at all times (but especially in time of war) the use and benefit of the same for postal, military, and other purposes.

Under this reservation it is contended Congress would have no right to pass this law, which compels what was not provided for, the original acts and the provisions of which do not come within the purposes for which the right to alter and amend was reserved; but by the sixth section of the act of 1862 these magnificent grants of lands and the loan of bonds were made—

Upon condition that said company shall pay said bonds at maturity, and shall keep said railroad and telegraph line in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph line, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroad for the Government, whenever required to do so by any Department thereof, and that the Government shall at all times have the preference in the use of the same for all the purposes aforesaid, (at fair and reasonable rates of compensation, not to exceed the amounts paid by private parties for the same kind of service;) and all compensation for services rendered for the Government shall be applied to the payment of said bonds and interest until the whole amount is fully paid. Said company may also pay the United States, wholly or in part, in the same or other bonds, Treasury notes, or other evidences of debt against the United States, to be allowed at par; and after said road is completed, until said bonds and interest are paid, at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings of said road shall also be annually applied to the payment thereof.

Now, if these grants were made on condition that these companies should pay these subsidy bonds at maturity—and it is admitted that this can only be done by providing the sinking fund of this bill—it would seem plain that Congress has the right under the act of 1862 to force the companies to what they admit is essential to a compliance with this condition. To fail to do this would be alike injurious and unjust to the Government and these companies.

But the sixth section also provides that at least 5 per cent. of the net earnings shall be annually applied to the payment of these subsidy bonds.

When Congress provided that at least 5 per cent. should be so applied was it not meant that Congress should establish a larger percentage if it was necessary and could be taken without serious detriment to the companies? Under this provision of the sixth section it might be at least plausibly, and I think properly, maintained that Congress has the right to increase the percentage at least to a sum which, with the half compensation provided for elsewhere, would be equal to the semi-annual interest on the subsidy bonds and make the application at once to its payment. This would be better for the Government than the bill from the committee, and would make a difference of many millions of dollars against these companies, because they would not have the benefit of the compounding feature of this bill on the sums paid into the Treasury.

But the roads were not built under the law of 1862. To enable them to build their roads the law of 1864 was passed, which doubled the grants, &c., of the first law. The companies accepted this law. The only compensation to the Government in this law of 1864 is in the twenty-second section of the law, which reserves the unconditional right to alter, amend, or repeal.

It will be contended that this unconditional right to alter, amend, or repeal does not give to Congress the right to pass this bill.

The question of the power which the Legislature has by the reservation of this right has frequently been before the courts of this country.

The following cases it is thought will settle the law of this case:

Miller vs. State, 15 Wallace, 478.

A railroad company was organized under a law authorizing its creation, with thirteen directors to be elected by stockholders. A subsequent statute gave the city of Rochester, which had become a stockholder, power to appoint seven of the directors, leaving the other stockholders to elect six. The court held this was an authorized exercise of power under a reservation in the law of a right to alter or repeal.

Judge Clifford said of such charter:

The reserved power may be exercised, and to almost any extent, to carry into effect the original purpose of the grant, or to secure the due administration of its affairs so as to protect the rights of stockholders and creditors, and for the proper disposition of the assets.

Holyoke County vs. Lyman, 15 Wallace, 522.

Clifford, justice, in commenting on the reserved power to alter, amend, or repeal a charter, says:

Power to legislate, founded upon such a reservation, is certainly not without a limit, but it may be safely affirmed that it reserves to the Legislature the authority to make any alteration or amendment in a charter granted subject to it that will not defeat or substantially impair the object of the grant, or any rights which have vested under it, which the Legislature may deem necessary to secure either the object of the grant or any other public right not expresly granted away by the charter.

Hyatt vs. McMahon, 25 Barbour, 467.

A mutual insurance company was organized under a statute which authorized the directors to make assessments on premium notes to meet losses, but which reserved the legislative power to alter or repeal the charter. A subsequent law authorized receivers to make assessments. The plaintiff, as receiver, sued to recover an assessment.

Rosekrans, judge, said:

Another objection to the complaint is that the receiver has no power to make an assessment upon the premium notes belonging to the corporation; that by the terms of the contract it can only be made by the directors of the company; that the act of 1852, purporting to authorize receivers of mutual insurance companies to make assessments, is unconstitutional and void as to notes given before the passage of the act, (as was the case with the note in suit.) The conclusive answer to the objection of unconstitutionality of the act is the power reserved to the Legislature to alter or repeal the charter. The obligation of the contract was that the maker of the note should pay his proportion of losses and expenses of the company in proportion to the amount of his premium note. The note was made payable at any time when the directors should deem the same requisite for the payment of losses and incidental expenses. (Chapter 43, section 6.)

It has been said the assessment is not a judicial but a ministerial act, and may as well be performed by a receiver as by the directors. (14 Barbour, 373.) But whether this be so or not, the Legislature when they granted this charter reserved the right to alter it. * * * The Legislature exercised this right by declaring that when the assets of such corporation passed into the hands of a receiver he should make the assessment instead of the directors. This was a legitimate exercise of the reserved power. * * * Even if it increased the liability of the members, as it does not, it would be valid. (10 Barbour, 2, 60.) It need not be claimed to be without limit, or that it may be capriciously or wantonly exercised, but it may be affirmed that it may be exercised in all cases and to any extent to carry out the original purposes of the incorporation, and to secure the due administration of justice in regard to the rights of creditors of the corporation, and the proper disposition of its assets. (Northern Railroad Company vs. Miller, 10 Barbour, 262; Schenectady Plank Road Company vs. Thatcher, 1 Kernan, 102-115; White vs. Syracuse Railroad, 14 Barbour, 560; Troy Railroad vs. Kerr, 17 Barbour.)

Worcester vs. Norwich Railroad Company, 109 Massachusetts, 103.

The statute of 1871 required five railroad companies to unite in a station in Worcester for the accommodation of the passenger trains of all said corporations. This would require an exercise of the right of eminent domain by the corporations, and a large expenditure of money to extend the roads and build a station. The city of Worcester and some of the corporations petitioned the court for the appointment of commissioners to determine the location of the station. The Norwich Railroad Company resisted. Chapman, chief justice, said:

Proof is offered that to extend the several railroads named to a union passenger station east of Grafton street would make it necessary for each of them to extend its tracks a great distance, * * * and at a cost amounting in the aggregate to several hundred thousand dollars. * * * The validity of the act and of the proceedings under it are denied. The petitioners contend that the act is valid under the provisions of the general statutes, (chapter 68, section 41,) which are similar to prior statutes affecting all railroads that have been chartered since March 11, 1831, and subjecting them to alteration, amendment, or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature. The court has repeatedly had occasion to consider the provisions of the general statutes referred to. (Fitchburg Railroad Company vs. Grand Junction Railroad, 4 Allen, 198; Commonwealth vs. Eastern Railroad, 103 Massachusetts, 254; Commonwealth vs. Essex County, 13 Gray, 239; Commissioners vs. Holyoke, 104 Massachusetts, 446.) In conformity with these decisions, we think that the act of 1871 is a reasonable exercise of the right thus reserved to the Legislature.

Commonwealth vs. Eastern Railroad Company, 103 Massachusetts, 254.

The syllabus is:

A statute requiring a railroad corporation whose charter under the Revised Statutes, chapter 44, section 23, (general statutes, chapter 68, section 41,) is subject to amendment, alteration, or repeal at the pleasure of the Legislature to erect a station-house at a place on its road and cause trains to stop there, is not in violation of the Constitution of the United States as impairing the obligation of a contract.

Chapman, chief justice, said:

The defendants say that the act of 1868 violates the contract made with them by the Commonwealth, and requires them to expend their property for an assumed public use without compensation, contrary to the Constitution of the United States and of this State. * * *

But the act is not subjected to such an objection.

Fitchburgh Railroad Company vs. Grand Junction Railroad Company, 4 Allen, 198.

The court held that a law was valid which required a railroad company to make extensive changes in the level, grade, and connection of its road.

In Wisconsin the authorities on this subject in that State are collected in the great case of the Attorney-General vs. Railroad Companies, 35 Wisconsin, 570. In Kenosha Railroad vs. Marsh, 17 Wisconsin, 13, the court said of the reserved power to alter:

Undoubtedly the Legislature might, under this power, impose new duties and new restraints upon corporations in the prosecution of the enterprises already undertaken.

Parker vs. Metropolitan Railroad Company, 109 Massachusetts, 506.

It was held that under a power reserved to the Legislature to amend, alter, or repeal a charter, the rates of toll prescribed in the charter of a ferry company might be reduced by a subsequent statute.

Morton, judge, said:

The reservation of power is broad and comprehensive. Whatever may be its limitation, it at least reserves to the Legislature the right to make any reasonable amendment regulating the mode in which the franchise granted shall be used and enjoyed, which do not defect or essentially impair the object of the grant, or take away any property or rights which have become vested under a legitimate exercise of the powers granted. (Roxbury vs. Boston Railroad, 6 Cushing, page 424; Commissioners vs. Holyoke, 104 Massachusetts, page 446.)

Whiting vs. Sheboygan Railroad, 25 Wisconsin, 198, and the case in 35 Wisconsin, 570, hold that—

The Legislature may limit the tolls and fares to be received by this railroad company to a reasonable sum, beyond which the company shall not go.

The bill now proposed does not attempt to reduce the fares or rates on the Pacific railroads under the reserved power in the act of 1864.

These companies should not precipitate any question of that kind by now refusing to make provision for the payment of their debts. (Tomlinson vs. Jessup, 15 Wallace, page 454.)

A railroad company was incorporated in South Carolina in 1851 subject to a general law which reserved a right to alter, amend, or repeal. In 1855 an amendment of the charter exempted the stock from taxation, and did not reserve a right to alter this provision. The new constitution of 1868, and a statute under it, subjected the stock to taxation.

Field, justice, said:

The charter * * * constituted a contract. * * * The amendment formed a part of the contract. * * * The exemption from taxation added greatly to the value of the stock and induced the plaintiff to purchase the shares. * * * But these considerations cannot be allowed any weight in determining the validity of the subsequent taxation. The power reserved to the State by the law of 1841 authorized any change in the contract, as it originally existed or as subsequently modified, or its entire revocation. * * * The reservation affects the entire relation between the State and the corporation, and places under legislative control all rights, privileges, and immunities derived by its charter directly from the State.

Pennsylvania College cases, 13 Wallace, 190.

Under a reserved power to alter the charter of Jefferson College, the Legislature authorized a change of its location from Cannonsburgh to Washington, although it had sold scholarships to be satisfied in tution at Cannonsburgh.

Both the acts of 1862 and 1864 show that the railroad companies agreed to "keep the railroads and telegraph lines in repair and use, and shall at all times transmit dispatches over said telegraph lines, and transport mails, troops, and munitions of war, supplies, and public stores upon said railroads for the Government."

If the mortgage debts of the companies are permitted to accumulate with no provision for their payment, the roads must eventually be sold out and pass into other hands.

These sinking funds are necessary to keep the companies in a condition, as said by the supreme court of New York, "to carry out the original purposes of the incorporation."

3. This power to alter, as affecting the "individual liability" of stockholders, has received consideration from the courts, which may throw some light on this subject.

The proposed bill does not attempt to create a new individual liability on stockholders. It is not necessary to affirm that any such power exists. The railroad acts do not fix any limit to such liability if it can be imposed. Many state Constitutions and statutes treat the power to alter charters as a power to create unlimited individual liability, and hence in express terms restrict the power so that the individual liability shall not be more than double the amount of stock held. If a power to alter carries with it a power to create individual liability of stockholders for debts of a corporation, it might with much more force and justice be urged that a new liability could be imposed on the corporation itself which did not reach the stockholders.

Hyatt vs. McMahan, 25 Barbour, 467.

A charter was altered by the Legislature, and the court said of the alteration:

Even if it increased the liability of the members, as it does not, it would be valid.

Northern Railroad Company vs. Miller, 10 Barbour, 282.

This was an action to recover on a stock subscription under a charter which reserved a legislative right to alter or repeal. The defense was that the Legislature had altered the charter by authorizing the corporation to borrow money and to construct branch lines of railroad.

The court said:

The directors * * * by accepting the charter became bound by this condition or reservation; and every individual who subscribes to the stock of the company thereby makes himself a party to the contract, subject to the conditions and reservations of the charter. In effect he stipulates at the time he subscribes that the Legislature may alter or repeal the law, and thus change the obligation of his subscription or defeat it altogether. * * * Whatever modification is thus effected in the obligation created by his subscription is made by his own agreement. * * * What a man authorizes another to do is as obligatory upon him when done as if it had been performed by himself.

Sherman vs. Smith, 1 Black, 587.

The New York statute of 1838 authorized the organization of banking companies, and the law provided that the stockholders should not be individually liable for debts, but reserved the right to repeal or change the law. Afterward an amendment of the State constitution, in 1846, and a statute of 1849, declared that the shareholders of all banks which should continue to issue notes after a certain time should be individually responsible. The creditors of a bank organized in 1844 sought to enforce the individual liability. The stockholders resisted, on the ground that the original charter was a contract, protected by that clause of the Constitution of the United States which forbids the States to make any law impairing the obligation of contracts. The court held the stockholders individually liable for debts after the law of 1849.

Mr. Justice Nelson said:

The association was authorized to establish a bank subject to the liabilities prescribed in the act, [of 1838.] Now, the section which reserved to the Legislature the power to alter or repeal the act, by necessary construction reserved the power to alter or repeal all or any one of these terms and conditions or rules of liability prescribed in the act.

In the matter of the Reciprocity Bank, 22 New York, page 9.

The Reciprocity Bank was incorporated in 1834, under a law reserving a power to the Legislature to alter, modify, or repeal it. The act of 1849 imposed individual liability on stockholders for the debts of the bank.

The court say:

Within the power here reserved the Legislature would have had the right to pass the statute of 1849 and to impose the very liability now in question, even if the constitution of 1846 had never been adopted.

This applied to liabilities arising after the act of 1849. The bill now proposed is a provision for the payment of a debt created after the act of 1864 was passed. (See report of the Secretary of the Treasury for 1875, page 33.)

By a statement made by an expert it will appear that the sinking fund provided for by this bill will not pay the interest on these bonds at maturity. It is as follows:

Statement of process of computation of values, given in response to the letter of Hon. WILLIAM LAWRENCE, member of Congress, bearing date May 29, 1876, addressed to Mr. Maclennan.

Assume, commencing in 1874, an annual payment of $450,000 as 5 per cent. of the net earnings and half services to be due to the Government from the Union Pacific Railroad Company, and a like amount from the Central Pacific Railroad Company, (meaning the Central Pacific and Western Pacific Companies;) required the amount that will be owing the Government at maturity of subsidy bonds (January 1, 1898) from each company, (1,) for principal, (2.) for interest not re-imbursed, no allowance being made for interest on these several payments:

	Union Pacific.	Central Pacific.
Principal	$27,236,512 00	$27,855,680 00
Thirty years' interest at 6 per cent	49,025,721 60	50,140,224 00
Five per cent. of the net earnings and half services from 1874–1897, both inclusive, (twenty-four years,) assumed to be $450,000 a year	10,800,000 00	10,800,000 00
Therefore, at maturity due the Government for principal	27,236,512 00	27,855,680 00
For interest not re-imbursed	38,225,721 60	39,340,224 00
Total	65,462,233 60	67,195,904 00

The amount of the proposed forty-four semi-annual payments by the Union Pacific Company of $375,000 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1876, and the last or forty-fourth December 31, 1897, added to the amount of twenty-four semi-annual payments of $125,000 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1886, and the last at the date of the maturity of the bonds, December 31, 1897, compounded semi-annually, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, is $33,500,755.50.

In like manner the amount of the proposed forty-four semi-annual payments by the Central Pacific Company of $284,105 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1876, and the last or forty-fourth December 31, 1897, added to the amount of twenty-four semi-annual payments of $96,060 each, the first payment to be made June 30, 1886, and the last at the date of maturity of the bonds, December 31, 1897, compounded semi-annually, at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, is $25,424,559.80.

The proposed forty-four semi-annual payments of $375,000 each by the Union Pacific, and of $284,105 each by the Central Pacific, and the twenty-four proposed payments for the last portion of the period, of $125,000 each by the Union Pacific Company and of $96,060 each by the Central Pacific Company are the same in value as twenty payments of $375,000 each by Union Pacific Company and of $284,105 each by Central Pacific Company for the first part of the period of twenty-two years (or forty-four half years) and of twenty-four semi-annual payments of $500,000 each by the Union Pacific Company and of $380,165 each by the Central Pacific Company for the remaining twelve of the twenty-two years.

The balances due to the Government at maturity of subsidy bonds (January 1, 1898) are therefore as follows:

By the Union Pacific	$65,462,233 60
Less	33,500,755 50
Or	31,961,478 10
By the Central Pacific and Western Pacific companies	$67,195,904 00
Less	25,424,559 80
Or	41,771,344 20

E. B. ELLIOTT.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Washington, D. C., June 10, 1876.

If this be so, and nothing more than a part of the interest due the Government at maturity is provided for in this bill, then this bill, it must be conceded by all, does not go beyond the purpose and intent of Congress in passing the law of 1862, and the right of appeal, alteration, or amendment reserved in that law must embrace the right to pass this law.

I think these considerations and the authorities cited establish the right of Congress to pass this bill.

If this right does exist, who is there on this floor so bold as to say we ought not to pass it? Who dare to say that the people of this country shall lose this $150,000,000 by the fraudulent and outrageous conduct of these bloated corporations?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now yield five minutes to the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] and then I shall call for a vote upon the amendment and then upon the bill.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman if he will not yield for a motion to adjourn?

Mr. LAWRENCE. O, no. I cannot do that.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I will make the motion anyhow; I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was put on Mr. CANNON'S motion; and on a division there were—ayes 28, noes 72.

Mr. WHITE. I make the point of order that no quorum has voted.

Mr. HOLMAN. The question was on a motion to adjourn and that does not require a quorum.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not necessary on a motion to adjourn that a quorum should vote, and the House has refused to adjourn.

Mr. BLACKBURN. Did I understand the Chair to rule that a quorum was necessary on a motion to adjourn?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair ruled exactly contrary to that.

[Mr. HOLMAN addressed the House. His speech will appear in the Appendix.]

Mr. LAWRENCE. I now ask for a vote upon the amendment which I have offered to the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I ask unanimous consent of the House to print in the RECORD as a part of the proceedings of the House some remarks which I have prepared.

There was no objection, and leave was granted. [See Appendix.]

The question was upon the amendment offered by Mr. LAWRENCE to the fourth section of the bill.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The original bill required that the first payment should be made on the 1st day of July, 1876. That date has already passed and it is impossible that the law can be enforced. I therefore propose to change the date until the 1st of January next.

Mr. PAGE. I wish the gentleman would make the date of payment in October and April.

Mr. LAWRENCE. The previous question is operating and no amendment is in order, but an amendment like that would change the whole structure of the bill.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

The question was on the passage of the bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 159, nays 9, not voting 121; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ainsworth, Anderson, Ashe, Atkins, John H. Bagley, jr., John H. Baker, Banning, Bell, Blackburn, Blount, Boone, Bradford, Bradley, Bright, Buckner, Horatio C. Burchard, Samuel D. So the bill was passed.

Mr. LAWRENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 884) to authorize the change of name of the steamboat Peter Crary to that of Joseph L. Chapman; and

A bill (S. No. 952) to remove the political disabilities of G. T. Beauregard, of New Orleans, Louisiana.

The message also announced that the Senate had further insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 2571) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; had agreed to the further conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. ALLISON, and Mr. BAYARD.

The message also announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes; had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and had appointed as conferees on the part of the Senate Mr. WINDOM, Mr. MORTON, and Mr. THURMAN.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BANNING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me to offer a resolution to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. LUTTRELL. I will yield to the gentleman.

Many MEMBERS. Regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that the House now adjourn.

Pending the motion to adjourn,

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HARRIS, of Georgia, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker pro tempore signed the same:

An act (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Owensborough, Kentucky.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment, as conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, of Mr. RANDALL, Mr. HOLMAN, and Mr. HALE.

DISTRICT COURTS IN WEST VIRGINIA.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. In the absence of the gentleman from Maine, Mr. FRYE, one of the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 472) prescribing the dates for holding the district court of the United States in West Virginia, at the request of the chairman of the House conferees, Mr. FAULKNER, the Chair appoints Mr. WALSH, of Maryland, as a conferee on the part of the House in place of Mr. FRYE.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. MILLER for one week from Monday next;

To Mr. SEELYE for one day;

To Mr. DURHAM for twelve days, in extension of leave heretofore granted;

To Mr. SPENCER until Monday next on account of sickness;

To Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania, for one day; and

To Mr. PACKER for two days.

Mr. PAGE. I insist upon the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from California [Mr. LUTTRELL] that the House now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, July 8, 1876.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. No. 2685) for the distribution of the unappropriated moneys of the Geneva award was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill (H. R. No. 3849) for the relief of James W. Harvey and James Livesey, of the firm of Harvey & Livesey, of Wisconsin, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MERRIMON. I present the memorial of Samuel Strong and others, citizens of the District of Columbia, representing that they are creditors of the District government, and have made efforts for a long time to have their several claims paid, and have failed. They also set forth that a bill providing for the adjustment of claims against the District of Columbia has passed the House and is before the Senate, and that they have learned that the Committee on the District of Columbia of the Senate will not take action upon that bill at the present session. They represent that they are large creditors; that there are many workmen in the District to whom they are indebted for work done upon the streets and elsewhere in this city; that they have no means of paying them; and that it is of grave moment that the bill referred to should be passed at this session. I move that the memorial and an accompanying letter addressed to me upon the subject be referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I present a memorial of some three hundred miners, prospectors, voyageurs, merchants, traders, and cosmopolitan citizens, pioneers of Alaska, in which they set forth numerous grievances in reference to the government of that Territory.

In this connection I desire to state that the history of government in Alaska for the last four or five years has been one of oppression, one that is scarcely compatible with the professions of our people in this centennial year or in accordance with the genius of American institutions. It has been a military misrule. I have been attempting since the first day of the present session to attract the attention of the Senate and of the appropriate committee to this fact. I introduced a bill early in the session providing for a civil government in that Territory. The bill has not yet been reported to the Senate. I take this occasion to again call the attention of the Committee on Territories to this important matter. The grievances of which the memorialists complain are fully and specifically set forth in the memorial which I now hold in my hand, and I earnestly hope that some action may be taken upon the part of the appropriate committee to provide a civil government for the people of Alaska. I move the reference of the memorial to the Committee on Territories.

The motion was agreed to.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 978) extending and continuing the act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government," to report it without amendment, and I ask for its present consideration.

By unanimous consent, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill. It extends the provisions of the act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, approved June 30, 1876, and continues that act in full force and effect for a period of ten days, and no longer, from and after the 10th day of July, 1876.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. ANTHONY. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to report a bill to extend for ten days the act authorizing the Congressional Printer to proceed with the public printing. Some doubts have been expressed whether the general act which was passed ten days ago covers the public printing. As the former general act has been extended, so far as the vote of the Senate is concerned, for ten days, we report a bill extending the act relating to the Government printing I am not sure but that it is covered in the other act, but for perfect security I think the act to which I refer had better be extended.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 979) to further extend an act entitled "An act to continue the public printing" was read three times and passed. It extends the provisions of the act to continue the public printing approved June 30, 1876, and continues that act in full force and effect for a period of ten days, and no longer, from and after the 10th day of July, 1876.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MORTON. If there is no objection, I should like to have the report made by the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the Congressional Printer disposed of this morning. I think it important that that matter should be considered. The committee reported a resolution which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed. I ask to have it taken up and acted upon.

Mr. LOGAN. I gave notice yesterday that in the morning hour to-day I would call up the bounty bill.

Mr. KERNAN. I ask leave to introduce a bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Several Senators have risen with morning business.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. INGALLS asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 980) granting a pension to Irena Garrett; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Pensions, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. KERNAN (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 981) for the better protection of life and property at sea; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. KERNAN, it was Ordered, That Lena Bensinger have leave to withdraw her petition and papers from the files of the Senate, there having been no adverse report in the case.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 1574) to provide for repeal of all laws authorizing the appointment of civil engineers in the Navy, &c.;

A bill (H. R. No. 3856) for the relief of William H. French, jr., United States Army, late Indian agent at Crow Creek, Dakota;

A bill (H. R. No. 2813) relieving the State of Kansas from charges on account of ordnance stores furnished to Kansas Territory;

A bill (H. R. No. 3143) granting a pension to Daniel Clary;

A bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of George T. Olmstead, jr.

The message further announced that the House had appointed Mr. WILLIAM WALSH, of Maryland, a member of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (S. No. 472) changing the times of holding terms of the district court for the district of West Virginia, in place of Mr. WILLIAM P. FRYE, of Maine, absent.

The message also communicated the request of the House that the Senate return to that body the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills:

A bill (S. No. 391) to authorize the Secretary of War to purchase, for the use of the United States, a parcel of land on the Island of Key West, Florida; and

A bill (S. No. 843) establishing the rank of Paymaster-General.

The message also announced that the House had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM S. HOLMAN of Indiana, and Mr. EUGENE HALE of Maine conferees on the part of the House of Representatives on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (S. No. 382) to appropriate $1,000 to remove the remains of Hon. E. Rumsey Wing, late minister to Ecuador, from Quito to the cemetery at Owensborough, Kentucky; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

JOHN T. KING AND L. B. CUTLER.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the request of the House of Representatives for the return of the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and L. B. Cutler; and by unanimous consent the request was ordered to be complied with, and the bill returned to the House of Representatives.

PRINTING INVESTIGATION.

Mr. KELLY. I ask that the Senate take up House bill No. 1316 and dispose of it. It is a bill which has been under consideration two or three times.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Indiana had risen and also the Senator from Illinois before the Senator from Oregon in regard to taking up measures. Does the Senator from Indiana renew his motion?

Mr. MORTON. It will take but a moment I think to dispose of the resolution reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections in regard to the Congressional Printer. I understand the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] has an amendment to offer to the resolution.

By unanimous consent, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, reported by Mr. MORTON, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, June 28:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to investigate the official conduct of A. M. Clapp as Congressional Printer, and for that purpose have power to send for persons and papers, and to make report at the present session of Congress.

Mr. ANTHONY. I cannot say that the Committee on Printing hankers after this investigation, which we have gone over I do not remember how many times. My friend on the opposite side of the Chamber [Mr. SAULSBURY] may remember. I believe the reports which we have made upon investigations of the Government Printer have always been unanimous. If we are to have another investigation I hope that, if it is possible, it shall be of such a character as that the matter will stay investigated. I do not know what the Committee on Printing can do more than it has done. I do not know where we shall look for further evidence. There are two natural enemies of the Congressional Printer, as natural as any enemies in the lower creation. The employing printers of this city think that the Government, through him, is making a profit that they are entitled to; and the printers who are employed think they have not sufficient wages nor sufficient rights and privileges, and the two classes, antagonistic to each other in everything else, join against the Government Printing Office.

I wish to have an examination of the Government Printing Office made so far as possible by disinterested persons, not connected with the city of Washington or in any way concerned with printing here and without any interests that are liable to be brought in connection with the Government Office, in favor of it or against it.

With that view I offer the following amendment as an additional resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be authorized to designate and employ three practical printers or publishers to thoroughly examine and report upon the present mode of conducting the public printing, what abuses, if any, exist or have existed, and what measure, if any, should be adopted to reform the same and to improve that branch of the public service, and that the cost of such examination be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I do not think I shall vote for the amendment. It simply proposes to transfer duties which I think devolve, according to the application of Mr. Clapp himself, upon some committee of the Senate. We remember that Mr. Clapp, after an examination into the management of the Printing Office had been had in the House of Representatives, presented a petition to the Senate asking this body to investigate through some committee the charges which had been preferred against him. The petition was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections, and I supposed it was still in that committee. The resolution which has been reported from the Committee on Privileges and Elections was agreed to at a time when I was not present at the meeting of the committee, and reported to the Senate without my knowledge.

So far as I am concerned I am very sorry that this investigation is proposed at all by this body. Mr. Clapp, however, saw proper to prefer his petition to the Senate, alleging that he was an officer of this body, and therefore was not subject to the jurisdiction of the House of Representatives when it undertook to investigate the management of the Printing Office under his charge. That memorial was referred to the Committee on Privileges and Elections; and had I been present at the time of the report now under consideration was agreed upon, I should have opposed it; I should have opposed the reference to the Committee on Printing because that committee is a small one, composed of three gentlemen only, and the labors of an investigation are very onerous. It could have been more properly, I think, investigated in the Committee on Privileges and Elections, which consists of a much larger number than the Committee on Printing.

But I am very sorry that it is to be investigated by any committee of which I am a member, for I certainly do not want any portion of the labor if I can avoid it. And yet I believe that a committee of this body, and not a committee appointed of printers outside, irresponsible to the body, is the proper tribunal to make the investigation if the investigation is to be had; and therefore I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island. If the investigation is to be had, it ought to be had by a committee of this body, and not by persons deputed by any committee of this body to make an investigation into the affairs of that department. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island will not prevail because I think it is due, if we have an investigation, that it should be conducted under the management and control of this body and not by a commission appointed by any committee of the body.

Mr. ANTHONY. My colleague on the committee misapprehends the purpose of this amendment. I do not propose to shirk the investigation which the Senate imposes upon us. I do not suppose it would be proper in any manner to delegate to outside parties an investigation into the conduct of an officer of the Senate or any other officer unless we delegated it to judicial authority. But I propose to have an examination ancillary to that which the Committee on Privileges and Elections, very much to my disgust, has commended to us. I wish to have such an investigation as the Committee on Printing is not capable of making, because we are not experts at printing. My friend from Delaware is something of a printer——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I have no knowledge of it.

Mr. ANTHONY. And I have but very little knowledge of it. I should have no confidence whatever in my judgment to examine a large establishment of that kind and decide whether it was carried on in the most proper and economical manner, whether it had had the best methods, whether its order, its cleanliness, its discipline were all satisfactory. I propose an investigation by experts, to report to the Committee on Printing, not to the Senate, for our information. It is precisely in the same manner that an expert is brought before a court or a committee to give his testimony upon matters which are peculiarly within his knowledge.

But if this amendment does not meet the approbation of the Senator from Delaware, who is a member of the committee, I prefer that the whole matter should lie over until we can talk about it together. The resolution of the Senator from Indiana was introduced to the Senate in the absence of the Senator from Delaware, and I then hastily drew this amendment, and, not expecting the matter would be brought up this morning, had not shown it to my colleague on the committee; but I prefer that whatever amendment is made, coming from me at least, should meet the full approbation of my colleagues of the Committee on Printing. Therefore, if the Senator from Delaware is not satisfied with the purpose of this investigation, I should prefer that the resolution should lie over; but I wish it distinctly understood that I did not propose to delegate any power of the committee to these experts, but I thought if we could get some of these great printers, some of the men who have establishments nearly as large as the Government Printing Office, or as near to it as any in the country—take one from New York, one from Boston, one from Philadelphia, perhaps—men who have no interest whatever in the questions that have given us such immense annoyance arising out of the relations between the Government Printer and the employing printers and the working printers in this city; and if they could examine this vast establishment and give us their judgment upon it, it would be of great value to us and of value to the Senate. But if the Senator is not satisfied with it, I much prefer that the resolution should lie over.

Mr. MORTON. I ask to have the report read. It is very short.

The Secretary read the following report submitted by Mr. MORTON, from the Committee on Privileges and Elections, on the 28th of June:

The Committee on Privileges and Elections, to whom was referred the memorial of Hon. A. M. Clapp, Congressional Printer, have had the same under consideration, and beg leave to submit the following report:

The office of Congressional Printer is one which pertains equally to both Houses of Congress and to the whole Government. Although under the law the Congressional Printer is elected by the Senate, and in that sense may be said to be an officer of the Senate, yet his functions are of that general character as to make his conduct in the discharge of his duties a proper subject for investigation by either branch of Congress.

With the complaint which Mr. Clapp has made against the conduct of the committee of the House by which he has been investigated we have nothing to do, and can pass no judgment upon it; but, inasmuch as he was elected by the Senate and is removable at the pleasure of the Senate, and the responsibility for his continuance in office depends upon that body, the committee is of the opinion that his request for an examination as to his official conduct by a committee of the Senate should be granted.

The committee are further of the opinion that any investigation by a committee of the Senate, tending to affect the official conduct and character of a public officer, should be conducted with open doors, that the officer whose character is likely to be affected may have the opportunity of being present with counsel, if he chooses, and cross-examining the witnesses and bringing others in his defense, to the end that a fair investigation may be had and no injustice done. Such investigation should be conducted according to the generally recognized principles of evidence and the usages of courts, which long experience has shown are calculated to develop the truth, convict the guilty, and protect the innocent.

A committee of investigation appointed by the Senate should not be a lawless body, with power to trample upon private rights, which the law has never given to the courts, nor to blacken reputation with that sort of evidence which the code of every country rejects as insufficient and worthless. The committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Printing be instructed to investigate the official conduct of A. M. Clapp as Congressional Printer, and for that purpose have power to send for persons and papers, and to make report at the present session of Congress.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I prefer that the further consideration of the resolution go over for a while. I am clearly of opinion that this labor ought not to be imposed upon a committee so few in numbers as the Committee on Printing. There are only three members on that committee and it would require at least two of that committee constantly present at the examination of any witnesses. I think, therefore, it had better go over. At any rate, if it comes to a vote now, I shall not only vote against the amendment of the Senator from Rhode Island, but I shall vote against the resolution of the Committee on Privileges and Elections. If the investigation is had at all, it ought to be by a special committee, or some committee composed of a larger number than the Committee on Printing. I hope, therefore, that the resolution will go over.

Mr. ANTHONY. I have no objection.

Mr. CONKLING. If this is to go over, I wish to ask the Senate to take up a bill which will take but a moment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection will not send it over. The resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. MORTON. If it is the desire of the Senator from Rhode Island and the Senator from Delaware to have it go over, I shall make no objection.

Mr. ANTHONY. If this investigation is to be imposed upon us, I do not want to enter upon it with a difference among the committee, and I prefer that the resolution should go over.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No objection being made, the resolution will be laid over.

CHANGE OF NAME OF STEAMER.

Mr. CONKLING. I hope to be allowed to call up a bill which will take but a single moment. It is for the change of the name of a boat in which many people seem to feel urgently interested. It is House bill No. 3200.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 3200) to change the name of the steam barge Dolphin, of Clayton, New York, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

KENTUCKY SALT-WORKS.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. On Monday last the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CAPERTON] made a report from the Committee on Claims, recommending the payment of the claim of T. T. Garrard and others, praying compensation for the destruction of their salt, salt-wells, &c., in Clay County, Kentucky, by United States troops, in 1862. This claim is known as the Kentucky salt-works claim. I stated at that time that a minority of the committee dissented from the report, and that at a future time I would ask permission to present the views of the minority. I now ask leave to present the views of the minority, and I move that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMS FOR STONINGTON.

Mr. LOGAN. Mr. President——

Mr. EATON. I wish to appeal to the Senator from Illinois. Will the Senator from Illinois permit me to call up a resolution reported from the Committee on Military Affairs? I do not think it will take a moment.

Mr. LOGAN. Of course; I withdraw any right to call up anything this morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois holds the floor.

Mr. LOGAN. I yield to the Senator from Connecticut. It is very important that these little things should go through!

Mr. EATON. It is not important at all. I withdraw my request.

Mr. LOGAN. No; go on.

Mr. EATON. I am obliged to the Senator. I move to take up the joint resolution (H. R. No. 135) donating two cannon and carriages to the warden and burgesses of Stonington, Connecticut, which was reported by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion was agreed to; and the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The preamble recites that there are now at the town of Stonington, in the State of Connecticut, two eighteen-pounder iron cannon and two eighteen-pounder traveling-carriages, belonging to the same, which were used for the defense of the town against the attack of British men-of-war in the war of 1812, and which cannon are highly prized by the inhabitants of the town as memorable relics of the bombardment of the town on the 10th day of August, 1814. The resolution therefore donates the guns and gun-carriages named by the United States to the warden and burgesses of the borough of Stonington, to be owned and held by them and their successors in office, and gives permission to the warden and burgesses to place them on unoccupied land belonging to the United States, at the end of the Point, so called, in the borough of Stonington.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JAMES ATKINS.

Mr. WADLEIGH. I wish to call up House bill No. 1668.

Mr. WRIGHT. I have no disposition to object to the consideration of that bill; but, nevertheless, I want to say something upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 1668) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the deficiency bill approved March 3, 1875, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a direction to the proper accounting officers of the Treasury, in settling and adjusting the revenue, disbursing, and other accounts of James Atkins, late collector of internal revenue for the fourth district of Georgia, to credit him with $14,819.33, on account of loss of that amount by default of deputies in his employ; the amount being lost without neglect or fault of Atkins.

Mr. WRIGHT. The bill passed our committee; but I think myself that while the bill follows precedents, and not a few of them, it is, nevertheless, most dangerous legislation. It has never had my concurrence thus far; but the bill has passed, as I have said, our committee following precedents established in the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. And passed both Houses once or twice, and failed of enrollment by an error.

Mr. WRIGHT. I believe so. This same bill passed both Houses at the last session and failed of enrollment, and that had not a little weight in determining the action of the committee; but nevertheless it presents the question of relieving an officer by reason of the fault and negligence of his deputies. That is the question that is presented in this case. I merely wish to say this much lest I might be regarded as concluded by this case, and it might be held as a precedent to bind me hereafter.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. I think it is pressing me rather far to ask me to yield any further. I have yielded as far as I can under the circumstances. I desire to call up the bill (H. R. No. 58) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union.

Mr. SAULSBURY. That is a very important bill and cannot certainly be considered in the morning hour. Will an objection carry it over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. An objection will not carry it over. The question is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. LOGAN. It is a very important bill, but it is a bill that has been considered by the Senate and debated at great length at former sessions. It has passed the House five times, and I do not think it will require much consideration of the Senate now, for the same Senators who are here now, or a majority of them, have considered this bill several times. The mere reading of it will give the information necessary. I do not wish to discuss it. I am willing to take the vote as soon as the bill is taken up.

Mr. WITHERS. I will state to the Senator in that connection that there are upward of twenty Senators here who have never heard the bill discussed.

Mr. LOGAN. There may be some who have never heard it discussed; perhaps there are; but I speak of the majority of the Senate. They have heard it discussed. If it brings out discussion, it is like any other bill that is to be discussed or goes over until a time when it can be; but that should not interfere with taking it up. The Senate is not bound to pass it, but I ask that it may be taken up for consideration. When the morning hour expires, of course other business will come up, and I will then ask that it will be continued over until it can be considered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will put the question on proceeding to the consideration of the bill after it shall have been read for information.

The bill was read at length.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on taking up for consideration the bill just read.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SHERMAN. I think the Senate ought to be called.

Mr. CONKLING. The yeas and nays will show the presence of a quorum.

Mr. SHERMAN. So important a proposition as this ought not to be taken up and acted on, it seems to me, without more than a bare quorum. Perhaps the yeas and nays will solve that question

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Conkling, Dawes, Ferry, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Key, Logan, McMillan, Mitchell, Morton, Paddock, Wadleigh, West, Windom, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Caperton, Christiancy, Cooper, Davis, Eaton, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Kelly, Kernan, McCreery, Maxey, Merrimon, Morrill of Vermont, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sherman, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—25.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Cragin, Dennis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McDonald, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Patterson, Randolph, Ransom, Robertson, Sharon, Spencer, Stevenson, and Thurman—28.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. LOGAN. I desire to say to the Senate that this bill has passed the House since the year 1868 five different times and the Senate once, and it is now before the Senate again, having passed the House by a great majority at this session. I deem it just to the soldiers of this country who were defrauded out of their bounty that this Government should pay it at some time, and I think that they have waited long enough for it. I feel that I can demonstrate to the Senate or any other body that there is no one asking bounty by this bill except those who are entitled to it and who ought to have had it long ago. I give notice now that I will call it up every morning, and I will call the yeas and nays as to whether it shall be taken up or not until the country shall fully understand whether or not these men are to be longer deprived of that to which they are justly entitled.

Mr. CONKLING. I wish to ask a question of the Senator from Illinois. Is it the purpose of the Committee on Military Affairs to insist upon the amendment striking out sailors and marines?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; I propose to re-instate that myself.

Mr. CONKLING. And the same thing as to slaves and Indians?

Mr. LOGAN. The word "Indians" is not necessary in the bill. The bill applies to all soldiers, whether blacks, whites, or Indians. We strike those words out because they are not necessary to be in. It applies to all soldiers of every color. The only thing that it is necessary to put back is the clause as to sailors and marines.

Mr. CONKLING. I observe here the committee propose to amend by striking out the words "or State" in the fifth line of section 5.

Mr. LOGAN. That is in reference to the State bounties that were paid. When it was considered before, the committee for certain reasons thought best to strike that out and to report it to the Senate. Since that has been done, looking over the files and seeing the votes heretofore and what has been done on the bills heretofore, in my judgment, that word ought to be left in. I intended to suggest that to the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. So that the effect will be to give bounty regardless of what the States gave?

Mr. LOGAN. No, sir; the effect then would be to give this bounty, deducting State bounties.

Mr. SAULSBURY. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Nothing.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Then I object to this debate.

Mr. LOGAN. I intend to leave that question as to State bounties to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Delaware objects to further debate.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 5th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 166) to amend section 1225 of the Revised Statutes of the United States; and

An act (S. No. 336) to authorize the construction of a ponton bridge across the Mississippi River from some feasible point in La Crosse County, in the State of Wisconsin, to some feasible point in Houston County, in the State of Minnesota.

The message also announced that the bill (S. No. 2) to repeal section 2303 of the Revised Statutes of the United States making restrictions in the disposition of the public lands in the States of Alabama, Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, and Florida, and for other purposes, having been received by the President on the 22d of June, and not having been returned by him to the Senate within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his signature.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SARGENT. I offer an amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, to be referred to the committee of conference who have charge of that appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be so referred.

LANDS WITHIN THE KLAMATH INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. KELLY. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 1316. I do not now expect to get it through this morning, but it is a bill that I have been endeavoring to get before the Senate two or three times. It has been fully considered, and I simply desire that it shall be taken up so that it may be ready to be proceeded with on Monday morning.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none, and it is before the Senate.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1316) to adjust the claims of the owners of lands within the limits of the Klamath Indian reservation in the State of Oregon, the pending question being on the amendment offered by Mr. SHERMAN in line 12, after the word "mineral," to insert "and which are then subject to entry under the homestead or pre-emption laws of the United States."

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate is suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment against William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative and executive business.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet on Monday at eleven o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore put the question, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

A division was called for, and the ayes were 32.

Mr. HOWE and others. Give up a further count.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Was there a quorum voting?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There was not a quorum voting. The noes will rise.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is this a subject of debate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to address the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont will proceed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I merely wish to say that I vote against eleven o'clock, because on Monday there are many committee meetings, and it appears to me we ought to have the hour between eleven and twelve for that purpose. If the Senate thinks otherwise, of course I have no objection to make. My reason for opposing eleven o'clock was that I thought we could make better progress with the public business by meeting at twelve and having the morning for committee work.

Mr. SARGENT. If the court would meet at one o'clock, which I know it cannot do on next Monday, it would enable the Committee on Appropriations to get the ear of the Senate upon conference reports. The different conference committees are meeting continually. We agree or fail to agree. If we fail to agree, it is necessary to make a report at once in order that new committees may be appointed. For myself, I should like to say that I have been at work in committee-room every morning at nine o'clock and all the time I can possibly spare from the Senate and from the time necessary to be devoted to eating and sleeping. I have found, as well as other members of the Committee on Appropriations, that there should be some time during the day, a half hour or more, when we can receive messages from the House and make reports from conference committees. For that reason I beg, until a better arrangement may be made, that we meet at eleven o'clock. Next Monday we shall probably hear the action of the House on the sundry civil bill. We expect to hear the action of the House to-day on the consular and diplomatic bill. That subject will be brought before us on Monday, as well as the failure between now and Monday to come to a conclusion on the sundry civil bill. I hope, therefore, the Senator from Vermont will not object to our meeting on Monday at eleven o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. In that state of the case, as the Senator from California, a member of the Committee on Appropriations, states it, I shall not object; but I merely wish to say, withdrawing my objection if I made one, that I think we can receive messages from the House of Representatives at any time, whether we are sitting in trial or not, or from the President. I have no doubt if a message were announced from the House the Chair would suspend this particular trial, which is the Senate after all, and receive the message. But as my friend says he expects to make a conference report of some sort on Monday before the meeting of the court at twelve o'clock, I will let the committees take their share of the misfortune and agree to the hour named.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the motion that the Senate meet at eleven o'clock in the forenoon next Monday? The Chair hears no objection, and it is so ordered.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. SHERMAN asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 982) providing for the completion of the Washington Monument; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Appropriations, and ordered to be printed.

DEATH OF EDWARD Y. PARSONS.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, communicated to the Senate the intelligence of the death of Mr. EDWARD Y. PARSONS, late a member of the House from the State of Kentucky, and transmitted the resolutions of the House thereon.

Mr. McCREERY. Mr. President, I ask for the reading of the resolutions of the House of Representatives.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will lay before the Senate the resolutions referred to.

The Chief Clerk read as follows:

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
July 8, 1876.

Mr. KNOTT submitted the following; which was agreed to:

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker of the House to take order for superintending the funeral of Hon. EDWARD Y. PARSONS, late a member of this body from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That as a mark of the respect entertained by the House for the memory of Hon. EDWARD Y. PARSONS, his remains be removed to Louisville, Kentucky, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms, and attended by the said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

Mr. McCREERY. I offer the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Senate has received with deep sensibility the announcement of the death of Hon. E. Y. PARSONS, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect for the memory of the deceased, the Senate do now adjourn.

The resolutions were agreed to unanimously; and (at four o'clock and fifty minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, July 8, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

APPROVAL OF JOURNAL.

The Journal of yesterday was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to approving the Journal as it has been read?

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. I ask the Clerk to read again that portion of the Journal in relation to the question of consideration upon the Pacific railroad sinking bill, which was in charge of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE.]

The Clerk read that portion of the Journal, as follows:

The morning hour having expired,

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the regular order of business, under the order of yesterday, to be the consideration of the motion whereby the bill of the House, No. 3672, to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned, was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary; when

Mr. BRIGHT raised the question of consideration.

The question was then put, Will the House now consider the said motion? And it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. That portion of the Journal should read:

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the regular order of business, under the order of yesterday, to be the consideration of the motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill of the House, No. 3672, &c., was recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary,

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The correction will be made.

The Journal, as corrected, was then approved.

REDEMPTION OF UNUSED STAMPS.

Mr. MONROE, by unanimous consent, submitted the following resolution; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be requested to report to this House as soon as practicable a bill providing, with suitable safeguards, for the redemption of unused internal-revenue stamps.

PUBLIC BUILDING AT DANVILLE, VIRGINIA.

Mr. YOUNG. I am directed by the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds to ask unanimous consent to report for consideration at this time a substitute for House bill No. 1133, to provide for the erection of a public building in the town of Danville, Virginia.

The substitute directs the Secretary of the Treasury to procure by purchase, condemnation, or otherwise, in pursuance of the laws of the State of Virginia, a suitable lot of ground in the city of Danville, Virginia, and to cause to be erected thereon a building of brick suitable for the accommodation of the court-house, post-office, and other Government offices in that city, and provides that the lot of land and the building thereon, when completed upon plans to be previously made and approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, shall not exceed $60,000, and the lot of land shall be of such extent as to leave the building independent and unexposed to fire from any of the adjoining buildings. No money appropriated for this purpose shall be available until a valid title to the land shall be vested in the United States, and until the State of Virginia shall have ceded the jurisdiction over the same and relinquished the right to tax and assess the same while the United States shall be the possessor thereof.

Mr. FORT. Does not the point of order lie against this bill that it makes an appropriation?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It can be acted upon at this time only by unanimous consent. If objected to, the bill is not before the House.

Mr. YOUNG. I withdraw the bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, announced that the Senate had appointed Mr. SARGENT in place of Mr. WINDOM as one of the managers on the part of the Senate in the conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 3749) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes.

The message also returned, in compliance with the request of the House, the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler.

The message further announced that the Senate had passed bills of the following titles; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

A bill (S. No. 978) extending and continuing the act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government;" and

A bill (S. No. 979) to extend and continue the act entitled "An act to continue the public printing."

The message also announced that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills and a joint resolution of the following titles:

A bill (H. R. No. 1668) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the deficiency bill approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 3200) to change the name of the steam-barge Dolphin, of Clayton, New York; and Joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) donating two cannon and carriages to the warden and burgesses of Stonington, Connecticut.

MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST THE INDIANS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption now the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the House the object of the military expeditions under Generals Crook and Terry now operating against the Northwest Indians and the circumstances leading to their necessity, with copies of all correspondence bearing upon the origin of the expedition; also copies of all military orders issued by the War Department directing those expeditions.

Mr. YOUNG. I object. I have a resolution I desire to offer in lieu of that.

Mr. PAGE and others called for the regular order.

RESERVATION OF THE SIOUX NATION.

Mr. BOONE. I rise to a privileged question. Several days ago I entered a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

I desire at this time to call up that motion and have it disposed of.

Mr. CONGER. I raise the question of consideration upon that motion until after the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read, after which the question of consideration may be raised.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is the question of consideration raised upon this bill?

Mr. CONGER. I wish to say a word on this question. By unanimous consent——

Mr. HOLMAN. This bill is subject to a point of order, which I wish to reserve.

Mr. CONGER. By unanimous consent yesterday was devoted to certain business then before the House, and an agreement was made that to-day should be regarded as "objection day," and that we should proceed with the Private Calendar after the morning hour. The introduction of this or any other business that cuts off the morning hour will prevent the fulfillment of that unanimous agreement of the House. I hope that the House will not break in upon that arrangement; and therefore I raise the question of consideration upon this bill, which, however, I do not desire to antagonize.

Mr. PAGE. I suggest to the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE,] my colleague on the Committee of Indian Affairs, that if we have the morning hour, that committee will be called and he can present this report.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This bill is pending upon a motion to reconsider; and the gentleman from Kentucky has risen to a privileged question to call up that motion.

Mr. BOONE. Upon the question of consideration I desire to say simply——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This question is not debatable.

The question being taken, there were—ayes 57, noes 43; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. CONGER and Mr. BOONE were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 63, noes 85.

So the House refused to consider the bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order being called, the morning hour begins at fourteen minutes before one o'clock. The call rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs.

EXPLORATION AND SETTLEMENT OF BLACK HILLS COUNTRY.

Mr. PAGE. A bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs was pending when the last morning hour expired. That bill had been ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That bill is first in order.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1335) to declare the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, open to exploration and settlement, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that portion of country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, is hereby declared to be open to exploration and settlement; and the true intent and meaning of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, is declared to be that white men are not excluded thereby from traveling over, exploring, or settling upon any portion of the Territory of Wyoming not included within the boundaries of the permanent reservation established for said Sioux Indians by the second article of said treaty of April 29, 1868.

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the rights of the Indians to hunt within the limits of the Territory mentioned in this act.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I understood the agreement yesterday was that this day should be devoted to the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The agreement made yesterday was that private bills should be considered to-day, but not until the expiration of the morning hour, and that at the expiration of the morning hour it would be in order to move to go in the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar. The understanding was distinct that the morning hour should remain intact.

Mr. FORT. I should like to make an inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from California is entitled to the floor.

Mr. FORT. I should like to ask the gentleman from California who reported this bill whether the intention of this bill is to open up to settlement this Black Hills country?

Mr. PAGE. This bill simply provides that a portion of the Black Hills country east of the Platte River shall be open to exploration by miners and other parties who may desire to explore the country for the purpose of developing its rich mineral resources. If the House desires any fuller explanation in respect to this matter, I will yield for ten minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming, that he may explain to the House this whole subject.

Mr. FORT. I hope, then, the gentleman from Wyoming will state whether the present Indian war was brought about by the exploration of this country, and whether this bill is to open up to settlement the country which they are now fighting about?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] as to how this war originated has any bearing on the bill now before the House; but I desire to say, in reference to this Indian war now being carried on against hostile Sioux and in regard to military operations in that country, that it is not a fact, as is sought to be stated, that the military or the Black Hills miners are responsible for the war, that the impression is not true that is sought to be created that this is an operation by the military arm of the Government, without any reference to what is known as the peace policy of the present Administration in dealing with the Indians.

In 1868 the United States made a treaty with the Sioux Nation of Indians which was a mistake, a grave mistake, if not a national dishonor and a national disgrace. That treaty to-day is the foundation of all the difficulties we are having in the Sioux country. It is the cause of the death of the gallant Custer and his men up the Big Horn country fighting those Sioux Indians.

Do the facts justify that statement? Let us see. In 1866 General Pope, then commanding that department, established the posts of Phil Kearney, Reno, and C. F. Smith to open the road to Montana, to protect its people and the western emigrants, and protect the friendly Crow Indians and the Crow country from incursions and raids of the hostile Sioux. In establishing those posts and in opening that route many men were killed, citizens and soldiers. Notably among the events which took place was the massacre of Fetterman and his command, ninety-six men and officers all told, at Fort Phil Kearney. Yet, after those men had sacrificed their lives, before any punishment had been inflicted on those savages, who respect nothing in the world but physical force, the Government went to work and made a treaty by which it ignominiously abandoned that country to the savages, dismantled its own posts, and left the bones of the brave men who had laid down their lives in the defense of their country's flag in that wilderness.

Sir, was it to be wondered at under these circumstances that Sitting Bull and the men under him believed they were superior to the General Government and that the General Government was unable to conquer them? Why, sir, any man who knows anything about the Indian nature and the characteristics of the Indian people knows the legitimate result of that cowardly policy of "peace at any price" was only to defer the evil day that has now come upon us. Since that time, since the making of that treaty, constantly have the Sioux depredated upon the frontiers of Nebraska, Wyoming, and Montana. More men have been slain there in the peaceful avocations of civil life, and no murmur has been raised in reference to them, than fell under the gallant Custer on the 25th of last month on the Big Horn. The friendly Crows have been raided upon with every full moon. So with the Shoshones and so with the Pawnees, and at last these outrages became so great and so long continued that even the peaceful Indian Bureau could stand it no longer and it called upon the military arm of the Government to punish those men. In carrying out the request of the peace department of the Government, in complying with the wish of the Interior Department and the Indian Bureau expressed in 1873 and again in the report made to this present Congress, these gallant men under Custer have been sacrificed in the Big Horn ravines. The war that is now upon us should have been prosecuted in 1868. The Sioux should then have been made to feel the power of the Government and to respect its authority, and we should not now have this war on our hands, because we counted dollars of more importance than national honor and the defense of our frontier we did not punish those Indians at that time.

What are the facts in reference to these Indians and are all the agency Indians on their reservation? We have seen reports from Indian agents and Indian inspectors in the papers every day that all these agency Sioux have positively remained upon their reservations and only desire to be well treated to remain at peace. I was up in that country last year at the time the commission was there attempting to negotiate a treaty with the Sioux, and at that time the Young-man-afraid-of-his-horses, the hereditary chief of the Ogallalla tribe and the man who by birth is entitled to rule over all that people, told me there were not in that northern country under Sitting Bull and Crazy Horse and other chiefs to exceed from one to two hundred lodges, which would not have given them over eight hundred fighting men all told. Yet the report we get now is that eighteen hundred lodges were there, giving about thirty-five hundred to four thousand fighting men in this encampment or village which General Custer struck. Where did those men come from to increase that number from one to two hundred lodges up to eighteen hundred lodges? They came, sir, from the agencies, where they had been fed and fattened by your Government, where they had been better armed than your soldiers; they came from those reservations to fight your troops, and, if you maintain your present policy, they will go back to their agencies as soon as the snow falls to feed themselves and their ponies and prepare for new depredations in the spring. Justice to your soldiers, justice to your frontier settlers, the honor of your flag, demand that these red-handed murderers shall be punished and made to feel the power of the Government, and that we shall not continue a system of government for the Indians by which these hostile Sioux may return to the agencies to be fed and pampered after slaughtering and murdering your troops and your citizens.

Mr. SEELYE rose.

Mr. PAGE. How long does the gentleman want?

Mr. SEELYE. About five minutes.

Mr. Speaker, some further words are necessary to complete the statement which the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. STEELE] has just made. The Sioux, who are the cause of this disturbance in the Northwest, have never been upon a reservation. Sitting Bull has had no treaty with the United States at any time, but having the control of a few hundred savages has been marauding and murdering both Indians and white people in that region for a number of years. Now it became necessary to cause this marauding and murdering to cease, and the Government, perfectly right in its functions and the exercise thereof, last fall sent scouts to this Sitting Bull, demanding that he should appear upon a reservation at a given time or he would be forced to appear. He did not appear, and therefore the expedition under the charge of General Crook was fitted out against him. That expedition was not successful for reasons it is not necessary here to detail. It was repulsed with great loss. This very naturally excited Sitting Bull and his band, who at once came to the conclusion that they were able to contend with all the power of the United States.

Now the gentleman says that this chief has received re-enforcements from the bands that have been fed by the United States on reservations. That is a literal truth, but, Mr. Speaker, for a very different reason than the gentleman has assigned. The fact is that these Indians, with whom we have made a solemn treaty that their territory should not be invaded and that they should receive supplies upon their reservations, have seen from one thousand to fifteen hundred miners during the present season entering and occupying their territory, while the Indians, owing to the failure of this and the last Congress to make adequate appropriations for their subsistence, instead of being fattened, as the gentleman says, by the support of this Government, have simply been starved.

These are the first causes of their complaint. These excited the young men among them, and then, as you all know, the subsistence which had been eked out at diminished rations failed entirely by the 1st of April last, obliging this Congress to make another appropriation in order to carry the supplies to the end of the present fiscal year. But that appropriation was so small that before the 1st of July was reached the last pound of food was ready for distribution, and Congress has been obliged again in this temporizing and shiftless way to continue the supplies for a few days longer by special appropriation to meet the present emergency. Added to this, as we are assured by reports of officials of this Government, the word has gone abroad among the Indians that it is proposed to transfer them to the War Department, which means, as the Indians have interpreted it, that the Government intends to withdraw its protection from them and give them up to extermination under military rule. Now, the consequence of these facts, together with the excitement caused by the failure of General Crook's expedition, has been a wild restlessness and discontent which have spread more or less among all the Indians of that region, and though it is credibly reported that Red Cloud and Spotted Tail have succeeded, at the agencies which bear their names, in keeping the main body of their forces in order, it is well ascertained that many other Indians from other reservations and perhaps some from these have gone to join the force of Sitting Bull.

Mr. MILLS. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him a moment?

Mr. SEELYE. This is the literal truth, and it is important that we should understand it. The Indians have doubtless exaggerated some of the difficulties which are to be experienced by this transfer. It is not strange that they should exaggerate them. Wild, rude, ignorant as they are, it is quite to be expected that they would exaggerate. But the literal fact is that they, getting word that they were to be transferred to the care of the Military Department, and having these other sources of discontent which I have named, have become restless, and the Cheyennes and the Arapahoes have taken to the war-path, and are probably now re-enforcing Sitting Bull. He with his few hundred warriors could have withstood no such force as went against him under Custer. These exact facts Congress and the country should well understand.

Mr. PAGE. This bill reported from the Committee on Indian Affairs has no reference at all to this Indian war. All this discussion is out of place. It simply provides that the country east of the Big Horn Mountains and north of the North Platte River, in the Territory of Wyoming, shall be opened to exploration and settlement. In 1868 a treaty was made with the Sioux Indians and a reservation was set apart consisting of 25,000,000 acres of land. The treaty also provided that the Indians should have the right to hunt on the lands outside of the reservation. The bill now under consideration only provides that the portion of country described in the bill shall be open to exploration by miners. It is a rich mining country.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. PAGE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I find that the treaty of 1868, to which reference has been made, guarantees on the part of the United States—

> That no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same; or without the consent of the Indians, first had and obtained, to pass through the same.

That applies to—

> The country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains.

That seems to be the identical country described in the bill.

Mr. PAGE. I do not yield for a speech.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I merely suggest this to the gentleman for the purpose of obtaining an explanation.

Mr. PAGE. The portion of country embraced within the provisions of this bill is not affected by the treaty from which the gentleman has just read. The treaty provided that a reservation of 25,000,000 acres should be set apart for the Sioux Indians. Under this treaty no white person has the right without the consent of the Indians to travel over that country. But the country this bill is intended to cover is outside of the reservation altogether.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman from California allow me to read article 16 of the treaty? It is as follows:

The United States hereby agrees and stipulates that the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains—

Which, I remark, is the country described in the bill in identical modes of expression—shall be held and considered to be unceded Indian territory, and also stipulates and agrees that no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same; or without the consent of the Indians, first had and obtained, to pass through the same.

The point now to which I wish to call the attention of the gentleman from California is that the bill does affect the treaty in declaring the true intent and meaning of that treaty to be—

That white men are not excluded thereby from traveling over, exploring, or settling upon, any portion of the Territory of Wyoming not included within the boundaries of the permanent reservation, &c.

The point I want to get at is, that if I read the bill aright, and that if I read the sixteenth article of the treaty aright, the bill directly repudiates the treaty.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from California yield further?

Mr. PAGE. I do not. Now, in reference to the question propounded by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] I desire to say that the bill only contemplates throwing that portion of the country open to exploration——

Mr. KASSON. "And settlement," the bill says.

Mr. PAGE. Which is outside of the Sioux reservation.

Mr. LANE. Let me call the attention of the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] to article 11 of that treaty.

Mr. PAGE. I will read it. Article 11 provides:

In consideration of the advantages and benefits conferred by this treaty, and the many pledges of friendship by the United States, the tribes who are parties to this agreement hereby stipulate that they will relinquish all right to occupy permanently the territory outside their reservation as herein defined, but yet reserve the right to hunt on any lands north of North Platte, and on the Republican Fork of the Smoky Hill River, so long as the buffalo may range thereon in such numbers as to justify the chase. And they, the said Indians, further expressly agree, &c.

Mr. KASSON. Now will the gentleman read the sixteenth article in connection with that?

Mr. PAGE. As I said before, this bill only contemplates throwing open to exploration that part of the country embraced in article 11 of the treaty. It was never contemplated by the commissioners making this treaty that all of the country east of the Big Horn Mountains and outside of this reservation should be forever kept exclusively for the Indians, and that white men should be excluded from exploring the mineral resources of that country. No such thing was ever contemplated.

Now, the bill under consideration simply provides that this part of the country referred to in the bill outside of the Indian reservation shall be open to exploration. It is a country rich in mineral lands, and it seems to me that it would be wrong to close this country to the citizens of the United States who desire to go there for the purpose of exploration; it is but just that this country should be thrown open to exploration.

Mr. KASSON. But according to the bill it is also for settlement.

Mr. PAGE. Why not? Is there any objection to its being thrown open to settlement?

Mr. KASSON. I have read the sixteenth article of the treaty, which says that no white person shall be entitled to settle there or to pass through the country without consent of the Indians.

Mr. PAGE. But there is an amendment to the bill which provides against the Indians from hunting in this territory.

Mr. KASSON. I think the gentleman does not desire to make the bill conflict with the provisions of the treaty, but it expressly opens this country to exploration and settlement.

Mr. PAGE. Exactly.

Mr. KASSON. This same treaty provides that no white man shall be permitted to settle in this country north of the North Platte River and east of the Big Horn Mountains.

Mr. PAGE. Without reference to the reservation?

Mr. KASSON. If that was so, why does article 16 say that the country north of the North Platte River and east of the Big Horn Mountains shall not be settled upon by white men?

Mr. PAGE. That is the reservation itself.

Mr. KASSON. No; the reservation lies farther east; but this embraces the whole country north of the North Platte River and east of the Big Horn Mountains.

Mr. PAGE. It seems to me that article 11 of the treaty ought to be conclusive on that point. The Indians themselves only reserved the right to hunt buffaloes in this country if there should be any there. Why should that article be so construed by the House as to operate to prevent the exploration by citizens of the United States of that country? I think that that certainly was not the object of the treaty. The eleventh article precludes the idea.

Mr. KASSON. The eleventh article of the treaty is consistent with the sixteenth. By the eleventh article of the treaty the Indians relinquished the right to occupy permanently this country, but retained the right to hunt buffaloes there; but the United States agreed that east of the Big Horn Mountains and north of the North Platte River no white man should be permitted to settle on or pass through the country without the consent of the Indians.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I desire to ask the gentleman a question, and it is whether the country east of the Big Horn Mountains and west of the North Platte River does not belong to the Crow reservation, and whether this late battle fought by Sitting Bull was not fought upon the Crow reservation?

Mr. PAGE. I cannot yield for war talk. I want the House to consider the bill under consideration, and all I have to say in conclusion is that it seems to me that the eleventh article of the treaty is perfectly conclusive upon this point. I do not see why the House should desire to prevent explorations by citizens of the United States of a large tract of country rich in mineral resources merely because the Indians claim the right to hunt buffalo on it. Now, the bill provides that it shall not be so construed as to prevent the Indians from hunting buffalo in this country; but I believe myself that there are now no buffalo in that section of the country, and therefore it seems to me that the Government should give authority to the miners and frontiersmen who desire to explore the vast mineral resources of their country to go there and to go there under the authority of law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state to the gentleman from California that the previous question was called and sustained upon this bill when it was last under consideration, but it went over upon a demand for the reading of the engrossed bill, when the morning hour expired. The bill is now ready for its third reading and passage, and is under the control of the gentleman from California, [Mr. PAGE.]

Mr. PAGE. I do not like to call the previous question on the passage of the bill so long as any gentlemen express the desire to speak upon the bill. I now yield for a moment to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON.]

Mr. HARRISON. I wish to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] one single question. The gentleman from Massachusetts asserts that the Indians who have come from the reservations, who aided Sitting Bull to destroy Custer, were not those fattened at those reservations, but those who were starved and have been taught, by the action of this House in transferring the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department, that they were henceforth to be under the control of the War Department. That I understand to be the gentleman's position. Now, I wish to ask the gentleman if he understands that the Indians on these reservations have been taking the RECORD, to get the information as to this movement with such wonderful rapidity.

Mr. SPRINGER. The bill has not passed the Senate.

Mr. PAGE. I did not yield to the gentleman from Illinois for a speech.

Mr. HARRISON. The Chair gave me the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor by the permission of the gentleman from California.

Mr. SEELYE. The gentleman has asked me a question. Does he desire an answer?

Mr. PAGE. I have the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. No; I have the floor, recognized by the Chair.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There was no discussion after the previous question was ordered the other day. The bill is now upon its third reading and passage, and is of course under the control of the gentleman from California. The Chair does not understand the gentleman to have surrendered the floor at any time, but to have yielded to other gentlemen, as he deemed best. The Chair understood the gentleman from California to yield to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] whereupon the Chair recognized the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] took his seat——

Mr. PAGE. I yielded to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRISON] to ask a question. He came to me and asked me to yield to him one minute to ask a question of the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.]

Mr. HARRISON. You have not yielded to me for a second.

Mr. PAGE. I now resume the floor.

Mr. HARRISON. I rise to a question of order. The gentleman from California said, "I am now through, and if there is any other gentleman who wishes to address the House on this subject I will yield to him;" and thereupon the Chair recognized me.

Mr. PAGE. Not at all.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that was so.

Mr. PAGE. I said I would make a few remarks myself, and would then yield the floor to some gentleman if he desired to discuss the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not worth while for gentlemen on the floor to discuss this point. The Chair has decided that the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] is entitled to the floor, and can control it as he will.

Mr. PAGE. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. LAWRENCE] for three minutes.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I presume I am in the condition of many other gentlemen on this floor. I am not sufficiently informed to vote understandingly. It seems to me that this subject should be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs with instructions to report to the House all the facts, so that we may vote intelligently.

If I understand the facts correctly as they have been represented to me they are these; I will state them so that I may ascertain whether I correctly understand them: In 1868 a treaty was made with these Indians, by which it was agreed that white citizens should not settle in this territory now occupied by the Indians. In violation of that treaty citizens of the United States have gone into that territory with a view to mining operations, and the Army has been sent there to protect those citizens who have gone there in violation of the treaty. That has led to this unfortunate war.

Mr. RANDALL. Who sent the Army there?

Mr. LAWRENCE. I suppose the gentleman understands that.

A MEMBER. Not the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This, according to representations which I have heard, has led to this unfortunate war by which the lives of some of our best, truest, bravest, most valuable, faithful officers and men have been sacrificed. Now, if this be a correct statement of the facts, then it is our duty to call back the Army and to give notice to the men who are there to vacate the territory. We will then be in a position in which we can treat with the Indians upon this subject. I do not know that I have stated these facts correctly, but I have stated them as I have understood them from several sources. I desire to learn from some member of the Committee on Indian Affairs what are the exact facts in this case. If we are the aggressors; if we have unnecessarily provoked this war; if we have undertaken to protect our citizens in invading a territory where they have no right to go; if we have sent our Army there to protect them in an unlawful trespass, then we are in the fault, however unfortunate the consequences have been, and it is our duty to recall our Army and do what is right. I wish distinctly to say I do not affirm that the facts are as I have heard them represented. My purpose is to ask for information.

It is fair to presume, and I do presume and believe, that the military operations which have resulted so disastrously have been directed by a justifiable necessity for sufficient reasons, and must be fully authorized. I have confidence to believe that the Interior Department and the War Department have taken no unnecessary or unjustifiable step. And we know beyond doubt that the brave and good and daring Custer and his brave and good and daring men acted in the line of duty in obedience to orders. History will do them justice, and I shall venerate their names and cherish their memories.

Let us know the facts so that we may act understandingly on the measure before us. Under all circumstances let us abide by our treaties and never let it be said we have done a wrong to any portion of the Indian race.

Mr. PAGE. I now yield to the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] for three minutes.

Mr. HALE. I do not claim to know very much about the details of these different treaties. But I have heard enough and seen enough here, as the different articles of the treaty have been read and as the bill which is introduced and urged by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has been discussed, to tell me that this is the old, old story. A treaty is made at a given time with a tribe of Indians; under that treaty vast tracts of land, which at the time are deemed to be inaccessible and which are deemed for the far future to be unneeded, are ceded to the Indians for the sake of peace. Afterward it comes about, in the push that is constantly made upon our borders by the frontiersmen of the West, under the lead of the hardy men there who will not be controlled or restrained, this tract of land, ceded by treaty in years past to the Indians, is invaded, is sought to be occupied, and sought to be improved.

Then comes up the same old conflict that has been going on in this country for three hundred years between the advance of civilization, pushed forward by the frontiersmen, and the aborigines whose limitations are gradually being circumscribed; and at last there is a conflict. The demand of the frontiersman is resisted by the Indians. The result is that you have such an exhibition of war, of resistance, of slaughter as occurred the other day, and which cannot fail to move the human heart to sympathy for the gallant men of our Army, many of whom have gone safely through great wars that have convulsed all civilization, to be at last struck down in a petty Indian fight.

This involves all the great questions which have come up on this Indian matter for years past. I do not know that there is any way to prevent such bills as are offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] coming up year by year by which we are continually encroaching upon and circumscribing the Indian limitations. One man says, or a hundred men in the Territory say, that the only way to manage this question is to put it in the hands of the War Department, and that of course means gradual but sure and unvarying extermination of the Indians.

Now, the War Department has had its hand on this matter for the last four weeks; and we have the result for the time being in the slaughter of our forces.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HALE. Let me say one word more. As I have said, I do not pretend to have exact information upon details; but the occurrences of the last week have profoundly impressed me with the necessity that there should be established by the Congress of the United States some defined policy on this question, that shall be pursued long enough to settle whether or not it is efficient; a policy that shall not be continually changing: this year peace, the next year war; this year treaty, the next year encroachment; this year yielding to the Indians for the sake of peace, the next year encroaching on what we yielded the year before. So long as that continues, so long as these fluctuations occur, we shall, when our troops are found at a disadvantage as they were the other day, have the melancholy slaughter that has confronted us here.

Mr. PAGE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. SEELYE.]

Mr. SEELYE. Mr. Speaker, the Army is wisely where it is in the Northwest. This Government would have been derelict to its duty had it not placed a military force there and for precisely the purpose that this military force went to accomplish. Here was that wild, lawless, savage chieftain maranding upon and murdering neighboring Indians and neighboring whites. It was necessary that he should be subdued; and it was entirely within the power as it was rightly in the province of the military force there to subdue him. I say the Government would have been derelict to every duty had it not ordered him to be subdued. Now why was he not subdued? The only reason is that he received re-enforcements from these Indians on the reservations. Why did he receive them? The answer to that is threefold, and it is very simple, and I will repeat it briefly, though I have already given it once.

In the first place, we have not fulfilled the solemn treaty that we made with the Sioux for ceding to them the Black Hills. We covenanted that they should be kept in possession of the Black Hills country; that a single white person should not go there. In defiance of that covenant, from a thousand to fifteen hundred miners are there. This has especially excited the Sioux. In the next place, we have failed to fulfill our treaty stipulations in supporting these Sioux. The last Congress did not appropriate enough for their subsistence. This Congress has failed to supply that deficiency. Instead of feeding them, we have been starving them. The consequence is that they have become unsettled, as we might expect they would.

The third difficulty—and I say this in reply to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARRISON,] who seems so anxious to ask a question which he seems to be very unwilling to have answered—the third difficulty is the fact (whether these Indians, as he suggests, read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD I will not inquire) that according to official reports lately received by the Government from its agents, who have been sent there to make inquest respecting this very matter, the Indians at these agencies have in some way learned that it is proposed by this Government to turn over the care of them to the War Department, and they have come to suppose that that means their extermination, as I suppose it does. But the simple fact is that, however they have received the information, they have received it—of this we have positive statement—and the consequence has been that the Cheyennes and Arapahoes have gone to swell the hosts of Sitting Bull, while it is also possible that from Red Cloud and Spotted Tail agencies others have also gone. These are truths which I should not repeat again, but they seem to be ignored, and they ought not to be forgotten.

Mr. PAGE. How much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour will expire in seven minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HURLBUT.]

Mr. HURLBUT. Mr. Speaker, in the presence of the great calamity which has fallen upon the country it is nearly time that this House of Representatives should consider this question on a broader basis than as simply a quarrel between different sets of men as to who shall administer Indian affairs. I regret to have heard as I came in here just now the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. LAWRENCE,] which I believe are substantially a repetition of the speech he made before the Methodist conference in Baltimore. [Laughter.] He speaks, as I think, upon this matter without knowledge, as he spoke then without knowledge when he said that at this end of the Capitol there was neither Christianity nor civilization. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, it is right for this House to know in the first place that these military operations which have resulted in the disaster that we all regret were not conducted against any tribe of Indians with whom this country has ever had any treaty relations. This northern tribe of Sioux has never been in any relation to the United States except that of a declared enemy. This movement of troops was necessary and right, and was demanded by those at present controlling Indian matters in order to bring these men down from their savage state into a condition of comparative civilization.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] has said that he does not know whether the Indians take the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I have never heard that they were so badly debased as to read it. But they have other means of information. There are interested parties in these United States to-day, parties closely related to these Indians, who can and do give them information, and color that information so as to make it most hateful to the Indians. Those men are the managers of the Indian reservations to-day. I speak of what is well understood.

Sir, there is but one policy to be pursued toward Indians or anybody else. There are classes of men, whether Indians or whites or others, who are accessible directly to ordinary arguments and ordinary processes of civilization; and others who are beyond such influences. Now, we might as well face the facts as we find them. I do not care what treaties you make; I do not care what reservations you establish; the fact remains that when there has been once given an opportunity and an inducement for the white population of this country to go into any Territory, there is not force enough in the Army of the United States to keep them out.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope by unanimous consent the time of the gentleman from Illinois will be extended.

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not wish to trespass upon the House. I speak with knowledge of the people who constitute the men from whom the resources are derived to open up and pioneer your country, and I say to you there is not power enough in this Government to stop the progress of this conquering race to any place they may choose to go, and we may as well accept the fact. It is one of the evils of our special form of government that you cannot repress the conquering, predatory spirit, if you please, of the people of this country. There is not power enough to do it.

Now, sir, when the news went out that these Black Hills contained gold, there was just such a rush to it as there was to California, as there was to Nevada, and every other like place. And what is this Government to do? I admit we ought to maintain treaties. I abhor the idea altogether of treaties with Indians, because they are not nations. I hope we will try to keep good faith so far as we can. But you cannot stop it in any way in the world. If you increase your Army to 50,000 men, instead of reducing it as the gentleman from New York who has just wandered over there has said to 10,000, there is not power enough to stop that migration of our people. Now, sir, allow me to say on the general question of ethics, is there any reason why this part of this earth of ours controlled by the United States should be exempt by any treaty from that great law of development which governs the progress of nations? Strong men grow, weak men die. The uncivilized and barbarous tribes which will not accept civilization perish before its march. It is the law of the universe, and you cannot check it by any constitutional or legislative enactment.

This present bill, as I understand it, tries to a certain extent to remedy that which, if you choose, was a violation of contract. I am not denying that, but at the same time it was a violation of contract which this Government could not avoid. We seek now to make certain arrangements with semi civilized Indians. And before I leave the semi-civilized Indians allow me to suggest how beautifully the remark of my friend from Massachusetts illustrates the source——

Mr. PAGE. Mr. Speaker, I understand the gentleman from Illinois is proceeding by unanimous consent and not speaking in my time.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman from Illinois is speaking in his own time by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Such is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I ask by unanimous consent that the time for this debate be extended one hour.

Mr. BRIGHT. I object, Mr. Speaker, and call for the regular order of business. The morning hour has expired, and under the order of the House yesterday we ought to proceed to the consideration of private bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the proposition of the gentleman from New York that the morning hour be extended another hour?

Mr. COX. I will modify that, and ask by unanimous consent that the morning hour be extended for half an hour.

Mr. PAGE. Of course that is with the understanding that I shall not lose control of this bill.

Mr. RANDALL. The gentleman will still have his two minutes.

Mr. PAGE. I do not wish to lose control of the bill, as I wish to have a vote taken on it after the debate terminates.

Mr. BRIGHT. I do not object to debate, but I do object after the half-hour extension to a vote being taken on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, then, to the extension of the debate for half an hour.

Mr. CROUNSE. There is one bill the Committee on Indian Affairs has to report yet, and it is the only one in which my people are interested. I believe it will excite no discussion, and I hope by unanimous consent the committee will be allowed to report it before the expiration of the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That cannot be done.

Mr. PAGE. It is the understanding, then, that I shall have two minutes of my time, in which I shall call for a vote on this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Illinois has not been speaking in my time, but by unanimous consent.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair knows of no rule which will give the gentleman from California the control of the floor any longer than one hour. The House has extended the morning hour half an hour, and the gentleman may call for a vote in that time and the Chair will recognize him for that purpose. The gentleman from Illinois is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. There is a different shade to the real status of the question. The unanimous consent is that the Speaker may postpone putting the question to the House for half an hour. It is the duty of the Speaker to put that question, and the morning hour cannot terminate until he does put it.

Mr. BRIGHT. I object to the vote being taken.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Then the half hour is to be used entirely in discussion, and the vote will go over until the next morning hour.

Mr. SPARKS. The gentleman from Illinois has unanimous consent and ought not to be interrupted.

Mr. PAGE. It is not yet too late for the gentleman from Tennessee to object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He objects to taking a vote, but not to the continuance of debate for half an hour.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. If that is the arrangement which is being made, I object to it. I do not object to another half hour's debate; but you cannot put off the execution of the order of the House, which was that the main question be put.

Several MEMBERS. It can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. WILSON, of Iowa. By unanimous consent we can have further debate; but then the main question must be put.

Mr. HURLBUT. I think that is the understanding.

Mr. PAGE. I would like, Mr. Speaker, to understand what is the position of this matter.

Mr. RUSK. It is all right. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] will have the floor back. There is no one objecting.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BURCHARD] will proceed.

Mr. HURLBUT. I ask the Clerk to read the letters which I send up, from the Interior Department and the War Department, in order that the House may understand how this campaign came to be made.

The Clerk read as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, December 3, 1875.

SIR: Referring to my letter to you dated the 29th ultimo relative to the status of certain hostile Sioux Indians residing outside of their reservations and remote from any agency, and requesting that steps be taken to compel them to go upon a reservation and cease their depredations, I have the honor to inform you that I have this day directed the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to notify said Indians that they must remove to a reservation before the 31st day of January next; that if they neglect or refuse so to remove, they will be reported to the War Department as hostile Indians, and that a military force will be sent to compel them to obey the orders of the Indian Office.

You will be notified of the compliance or non-compliance of the Indians with this order, and if said Indians shall neglect or refuse to comply with said orders, I have the honor to request that the proper military officer be directed to compel their removal to and residence within the bounds of their reservation.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. CHANDLER, Secretary.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, February 1, 1876.

SIR: On the 3d December last I had the honor to address a communication to you relative to the hostile Sioux roaming in the Powder River country under the leadership of Sitting Bull, informing you that I had directed couriers to be sent from each of the Sioux agencies, informing that chief that he must come in with his followers to one of the Sioux agencies before the 31st ultimo, prepared to remain in peace near the agency, or he would be turned over to the War Department and the Army be directed to compel him to comply with the orders of this Department.

The time given him in which to return to an agency having expired and the advices received at the Indian Office being to the effect that Sitting Bull still refuses to comply with the directions of the Commissioner, the said Indians are hereby turned over to the War Department for such action on the part of the Army as you may deem proper under the circumstances.

I inclose copy of communication from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, dated the 31st ultimo, recommending that hostilities be commenced.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Z. CHANDLER, Secretary.

The Hon. SECRETARY OF WAR.

Mr. CONGER. What is the date of that?

Mr. HURLBUT. The date is the 1st of February, 1876.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Has the gentleman a letter from the peace commissioners to the same effect?

Mr. HURLBUT. I do not deal with them. I want to call the attention of the House to this, partly in justice to the Department of War and to the Army of the United States, and, above all things, in justice to that magnificent body of soldiers who perished in the discharge of their duty. Sir, this very Indian Bureau called upon the Army, as those letters show, and turned over to the War Department those whom they could not manage by the ordinary agencies they had around them. And this expedition that has resulted so disastrously and yet so gloriously, for it is glory for any man to fall fighting against desperate odds in the discharge of duty whether successful or not—this expedition was under the immediate direction and by the request of the Department of Indian Affairs. The object of it was to hem in these men, these outside Sioux, these men who had not united in treaties with the Government, and bring them down, and compel them to stay on the reservations.

The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] has made an admission in his speech which if I had made with my known views on this question might have been considered not exactly the thing. He has admitted the absolute failure of the existing system. He has admitted that the old and disabled remain at the agencies, and that among the chief sources of supply of this hostile band their allies, the men who furnished them with actual aid and with ammunition as well, are these very Indians that we have been feeding and pampering at these agencies. The gentleman says that they went because they did not get food enough.

Mr. STEELE. Will the gentleman allow me to make a remark in that connection? The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] says that the Government has failed to carry out its treaty stipulations in the matter of feeding these Indians. Now, I say that outside of any treaty stipulations the Government in the last two years has appropriated two and a half millions of dollars, and for the ensuing fiscal year is appropriating $1,600,000 to feed these Indians for which there is no treaty obligation or stipulation whatever.

Mr. HURLBUT. I say, Mr. Speaker, upon my knowledge that arms and ammunition and supplies to these declared enemies of the Government have been habitually furnished through and by reason of these agencies; that this central band of Sioux derived their arms and ammunition partly from the British provinces and largely from their friends and connections around these agencies. And, sir, the question seems to have resolved itself into this: that as long as under existing arrangements with regard to Indian affairs we can feed and pamper and clothe in absolute idleness a worthless gang of vagabonds, they will stand by the agencies and endure pampering and feeding; but whenever there is an opportunity to make glory and plunder by joining with their hostile brethren in an attack upon the flag under which they have been fed and pampered in idleness, they join.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Other Indians have done that.

Mr. HURLBUT. Others have done it; I do not blame them for it; the defect is in the system. The defect is in taking it for granted, in the first place, that anybody under God's heaven has a right to the land. There is no right about it. It is power only that gives occupation. There was no right reason for treating with these men about territory that they never occupied or from which they have expelled better men than themselves in the dim history of the past.

But now the immediate necessity is upon those people either of accepting the burdens and responsibilities and the duties of comparative civilization, abandoning their tribal organization and putting themselves as individuals within the reach of the Government, or of perishing. And I say this in no cruel spirit. If they stand in the attitude they occupy now they will die out just because they occupy it.

This present bill proposes, as I understand, to take such measures as in the judgment of the Committee on Indian Affairs can be taken at this time to keep peace among these partly civilized and partly controlled men. I am for that. And I do not know that I have anything further to say to the House. My simple object in rising was to vindicate the military authority of this country, to vindicate the reputation of the men who have died in the service, and to show to the country, as the country has a right to know, that these men died in the strict performance of their duty to which they were legally called.

Mr. HARRISON was recognized.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I hope as a representative of that country I will be allowed a few minutes.

Mr. HARRISON. A distinguished gentleman from my own State made himself famous by the assertion that no nation could exist one-half free and one-half slave. Now, sir, I am going to make an assertion, and the RECORD may send it down to fame, and it is this, that no people can exist one-half civilized and the other half barbarous. It is an utter impossibility that we can have in this country a nation marching ever onward in the track of civilization and yet keeping in her midst bands and tribes of savages in their tribal relations. It is an anomaly never heard of in any other country, and it is a system that must be discontinued sooner or later in this country. We have tried the religious plan, we have tried the Penn plan, and we find ourselves constantly liable to a shock such as startled us two days since. White heroes struck down by our savage protégés. A friend on my left talks of the Indian heroes, but he must have a dead Indian hero. [Laughter.] I never heard of an Indian a hero until the halo of death has been thrown around him. The hero Indian appeals to our sympathy, but he is a dead Indian and not a live one. Tecumseh was a grand old Indian, Logan was a grand old Indian, but it was not until these savages were dead and buried we recognized them as heroes. It is an utter impossibility that we can continue in this condition of affairs. We have a nation controlled by law, by law under the Constitution, and yet we uphold in a large portion of our Territories other nations than our own. Their people may commit all sorts of crime, and the law cannot reach them. They come into our own district, into the civilized portions of the country, and commit murder, and they cannot be tried by a court, but they are fought with under and according to the laws of war.

Sir, every man in America, whether he be an Indian, a black man, or a white man, should be held amenable to the laws of civilization, for that is the rule of this land. Civilization takes no step backward. It is ever moving onward. You might as well attempt to stop the current of the Mississippi or bid Niagara leap upward as to stop the tide of civilization and emigration going into the West. Sir, it is an utter impossibility. We can no more tame the leopard in his lair or change his spots than you can civilize the Indians while we encourage and maintain his tribal relations. I admit that if you mix him with the white man you may civilize him; but you must bring the Indian under the rules of our civilization and make him somewhat amenable to law before you can change his savage nature, and until that is done the problem of peace with our Indians will never be solved.

Now, Mr. Speaker, one word more. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] asserts that it is the information that has been carried from Washington to these reservations of the intention of the change of the management of Indian affairs from the Interior to the War Department that has incited the Indian to aid hostile tribes in striking down the flower of the American Army.

How did that information get there? Does the gentleman admit that the Indian peace commission are a part of a system of spies; that it is a part of their duty to carry information from Washington to these people, to tell them when we are doing anything in this House hostile to them, so as to force them to wage war upon us? Sir, this war was commenced three months ago. The bill to which the gentleman refers has not yet passed, and we do not know here in the House if it will pass or ever become a law; and yet the peace commission, fearing that power would slip from their fingers, are encouraging this state of affairs. This is at least the inference to be drawn from the gentleman's remarks. Either the gentleman's information and assertion are all wrong or the peace system is all wrong; one or the other. I must hold and believe, Mr. Speaker, that I believe the way to treat the savage is to treat him as a savage as long as he retains his tribal relations; and as a savage teach him that we are able to master him. He knows no law but force. Give him force, but temper it with the spirit of Christianity and the rules of civilization. Use force, genial force if possible, harsh if necessary, but force nevertheless, and with that you will control the Indian, and at least prevent him from murdering white men. For three hundred years we have left him in self-control and have prayed for his civilization. The whole system must be changed. Scatter them among the white men or sprinkle white men with them. Give him civilized rulers and make him obey civilized laws. If that cannot be done, then let him submit to destiny, a destiny as certain and as unerring as the decrees of fate. Let him go to the happy hunting-grounds of his fathers, and let white men, or at least civilized men, take his place.

Sir, this is a big world of ours. But, sir, it is too small to surrender one inch of it to savagery and barbarism when civilization is ready to enter upon that inch. It is a big, great world. But under the will of high Heaven, as I interpret that will, it is for the possession of man in his state of amelioration, and not to be the battle-ground of savages. Where but in America have savages and civilized men stood for three hundred years side by side, and the savage savage still? If the Indian is tamable, then turn over a new leaf; tame him as savages have been tamed in other lands and in other ages, by mixing him with his superiors. If this cannot be done, the sooner he belongs to the past the better.

Mr. KASSON. I desire to get the attention of the House, for the few moments remaining allowed for discussion, to the bill under consideration. The debate has wandered over a very wide range, and propositions have been made here in relation to the general policy of managing Indians which I should be glad to discuss in the presence of this House. My friend from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] presents the subject of the civilization of the Indian almost in the words of Wordsworth, and would have it said of our Government:

> The good old rule
> Sufficeth them, the simple plan,
> That they should take who have the power,
> And they should keep who can.

I admit my surprise, and I beg to suggest that before the House accepts that doctrine they should demand some further discussion of the subject. American civilization and progress do not proceed upon that principle alone or chiefly. They proceed upon the greater principle of right, and acknowledge conscience in public affairs and the moral obligation of contracts.

In 1868 we made a treaty with these Sioux whose rights this bill would destroy.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Have they kept that treaty?

Mr. KASSON. That treaty was signed by the Lieutenant-General of the United States Army, by Spotted Tail, and by many other Indian chiefs belonging to the different Sioux tribes. And one "Sitting Bull's" name is attached to it; Sitting Bull of the Ogallalla band, not the one now fighting, I understand. There are several of that name.

What were the terms of that treaty? By the eleventh article we agreed with the Sioux that the Sioux should not disturb the United States in the building of railroads. The Sioux withdrew their opposition to the construction of railroads now being built on the plains. They agreed to permit the construction of railroads anywhere not upon their reservation. They agreed not to attack persons traveling there, or to disturb trains, coaches, cattle, &c. They also relinquished the right to "occupy permanently" the territory outside of their reservation, but retained the right to hunt on any land north of the North Platte and on the Republican Fork of the Smoky Hill River. That is article 11 of the treaty.

Article 16 of the same treaty relates to the same subject. The United States, however, then made an agreement on its part, and I beg gentlemen who desire to vote correctly on this bill to listen to it. The United States agrees and stipulates that the country north of the Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains—the very territory embraced in this bill on which we are about to vote—shall be held and considered to be "unceded Indian territory;" that is to say, the Indians did not cede that territory outside of their reservation to the United States. The United States also stipulated and agreed that "no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of the same."

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentleman allow me——

Mr. KASSON. Not now; let me finish my statement. You have just heard that the United States, in consideration of this agreement with the Indians about the building of railroads and the maintaining of peaceful relations with the whites, &c., made the agreement with the Indians that "no white person or persons shall be permitted to settle upon or occupy any portion of this land," or, without the consent of the Indians first had and obtained, to pass through the same. Now you have the provisions of the treaty, signed by the chiefs of these bands of the Sioux and by the commissioners of the United States, and acted upon ever since.

The Indians relinquished all their claims to the "permanent occupation" of this territory outside of their reservation, but reserved the right to hunt on these lands north of the North Platte and on the Republican Fork of the Smoky Hill River. They reserved expressly the right to hunt on that territory which they said they would not permanently occupy, but which they also refused to cede to the United States, and which the United States said expressly no white persons should occupy.

Now, what is this bill which we are asked to vote for? It commences by declaring all that portion of the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, to be open to exploration and settlement. That is directly in the teeth of the fifteenth article of that treaty, which says that the United States will not permit white persons to occupy that Territory or to pass through it without the permission of the Indians. And then the bill goes on to declare the true intent and meaning of the treaty concluded with the Sioux April 29, 1868, which is the treaty I have just read, to be that white men are not thereby excluded from traveling over, exploring, or settling upon any portion of this same territory, in Wyoming, except what is included within the boundaries of the permanent reservation established for the Sioux Indians. And then it goes on to provide that nothing therein contained shall be construed to impair the rights of the Indians to hunt within the limits of the territory mentioned in this act.

Mr. PAGE. Will the gentlemen allow me one question? He certainly does not want to mislead the House.

Mr. KASSON. Certainly not.

Mr. PAGE. The treaty states that white persons shall be forever prohibited from settling on this territory. That means the reservation, does it not?

Mr. KASSON. Not at all. The treaty says that the territory north of the North Platte and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains shall be excluded from settlement by the whites.

Mr. PAGE. The part from which white men are excluded is that part embraced in the Sioux reservation, and not the part outside of it.

Mr. KASSON. I beg the gentleman's pardon. In terms as plain as the English language is capable of making them the United States agrees that the country north of the North Platte and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains shall be held to be "unceded" territory, and stipulates that "no white person shall be permitted to settle upon" the same. There can be no dispute about that.

Mr. PAGE. What do you do with the eleventh article of the treaty?

Mr. KASSON. That is in perfect accord with the other. The eleventh article says that the Indians will not permanently occupy this territory, but they reserve the right to hunt on it. But by the sixteenth article the United States stipulates that no white persons shall occupy that territory, and that no white people shall pass through it without the consent of the Indians. It was left a sort of neutral territory until further arrangements should be made.

Then there is one other thing. The proviso of this bill reserves the right of the Indians to hunt upon the very territory where you propose to allow whites to settle. Now, as a western man I will never consent to any such policy; I will never permit wild Indians to roam among white settlements. If you repudiate one part of the treaty, then repudiate it all. I am against repudiating any part of it. And while I recognize the wicked conduct of a wandering portion of these tribes, still it is none the less true that the difficulties out of which this Indian war has grown have in part arisen out of the violation of the provisions of this treaty—not by the United States, but by white men. We could not prevent these white men stealing in there, although we tried to do so; but we need not break the treaty because individuals have broken the law. Now, this bill proposes that the United States shall not only sanction the acts of white men in the past but shall authorize the violation of the treaty in the future. To this I am unalterably opposed.

I therefore move, as I have a right to do under the rule, that this bill be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has not the floor for the purpose of moving to recommit. It was the distinct understanding that I should resume the floor for the purpose of calling for a vote on the bill.

Mr. KASSON. I make the point that I have the right to move to recommit, under Rule 124, at any time before the passage of the bill.

Mr. PAGE. It is not according to the understanding.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired; and the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] calls for the regular order.

Mr. PAGE. I would not have yielded the floor, but would have called for a vote on the bill before the morning hour expired, if it had not been the distinct understanding that I should have the right to resume the floor at the termination of this debate.

Mr. BRIGHT. The gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] wants five minutes to speak upon this bill, and he proposes to call for the regular order at the end of that time.

Mr. MAGINNIS. And at the conclusion of his remarks, I would like to have five minutes.

Mr. CONGER. I call for the regular order. I have been struggling for that all the morning.

Mr. PAGE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry: what is the status of the bill now before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired; and, under the action of the House taken yesterday, the regular order is the motion to go into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of bills on the Private Calendar. By unanimous consent this debate may be extended so that the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and the gentleman from Montana [Mr. MAGINNIS] may be heard.

Mr. PAGE. When can we reach a vote on this bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It goes over, and will be in order as the pending business on the next call of committees, which the Chair supposes will be next Tuesday morning. Is there unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York shall proceed for five minutes upon this bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of misapprehension in the House as to the effect of this bill and as to the treaty stipulation referred to. This bill has reference to article 11 of the treaty, as the gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] undertook to show. It also has reference to the last clause of the treaty which was read here as to the unceded territory. Now gentlemen ought to know that article 11 is almost obsolete, because for the consideration of $25,000 that right of the Indians on the Republican Fork and the lands north of the Platte was entirely given up. So I understand the fact.

As to the other article, article 16, whereby the United States stipulated that certain other territory should be considered to be unceded Indian territory, all that matter comes pertinently before the House in connection with this bill. It is not a question of live Indian or dead Indian or whether the Indian is heroic or otherwise. Those matters have no connection with the question which we are to consider as wise legislators in the light of economy and of good faith.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] undertook to sneer at keeping treaties; at keeping faith with these Indians. He spoke of the white race as the conquering race. So it is. But we do make treaties with these Indians, and it was said in this treaty—

> From this forward all war between the parties to this agreement shall forever cease. The Government of the United States desires peace; and its honor is hereby pledged to keep it. The Indians desire peace; and they pledge their honor to maintain it.

But it seems from the argument of the soldierly gentleman from Illinois that honor counts for nothing; that treaties may be kept "if we can" keep them—a sort of India-rubber arrangement depending on the strength of the stronger arm. That is not civilization; and if the Indians do demean themselves so much as to read our records they will understand that we are far inferior in respect to honor and the observance of treaty rights. All of our Indian wars have come from the abrogation or the disregard of treaty stipulations thus solemnly made.

I see appended to this treaty the name of Sitting Bull. Perhaps he is not the Sitting Bull of whom we hear so much in the newspapers, for I understand there are two: one in the north among the Teton Sioux, who have never been brought under our control, who roam in a country of eight hundred square miles far up the Canadian border, who have been regarded almost as mists of the mountains or as myths. They roam where they choose; they have no treaty regulations or stipulations with us. As these Indians have never been brought within treaty stipulations or upon reservations, why, in the name of all that is good and pure and true and honest, as well as economical, do we make this sort of warfare? Why not, as I have said before, pursue the Canadian policy? Do not gentlemen remember that, when not long since the news came of the attack in winter on Crazy Horse's village, I had predicted then that the expedition would cost us a million dollars without result; that before the summer was over we should have another expedition which would also cost us enormously and be resultless? As has been said of the guerrillas of Spain, it may be said of these Sioux, roaming amid their vast mountains, that we might as well try to catch the wind or hold water in a sieve. You cannot conquer them in that way. You cannot save expense in that way. Before the summer is over $10,000,000 will be added to our Army expenses by reason of the failure to adopt a wise, enlarged, and comprehensive policy.

What we want, Mr. Speaker, is that the whole Indian service should be systematized. There should be a commission raised by this House, so as to advise us before December how we can best organize it as a department, having the military, to be sure, to be used under proper regulations. Thus we may save large expense in the shape of fighting. We may save this rascally business on our reservations by peace establishment. We may not need so many of these pious agents who defraud both the Government and the Indian. We may have, as they have in Canada, some honest, fair, and accountable system, and in the end, by aid of peaceful measures, enforced if need be at the proper time by the Army, and we may thus, and thus only, settle the question here.

But I will not sit in my seat here as a Representative of a Christian people, if you please, and listen to doctrines of extermination such as were propounded by gentlemen on this subject. I have been taught to believe, sir, there was a God in heaven; that there was a Prince of Peace on earth; that He taught a wiser doctrine than that of the older time, and that all history, all goodness, all persuasion from heaven and on earth lead us to be careful, watchful, prudent, non-expensive, just, faithful to treaty, and fulfilling the great behests of civilization toward these tribes.

Mr. BRIGHT. I now call for the regular order of business.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I wish to say a few words on this question. It is one in which my people are deeply interested, and as their Delegate upon this floor I hope I will be allowed five minutes' time.

Mr. BRIGHT. I must demand the regular order of business.

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the Delegate of the Territory of Montana will be heard.

Mr. HOLMAN. I trust the gentleman from Tennessee will allow the gentleman from Montana to have five minutes.

Mr. RANDALL. The Delegate from Montana ought to be heard. It is a subject he fully understands.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will put the question to the House. Is there objection to the Delegate from Montana being heard for five minutes?

There was no objection.

Mr. CONGER. I make no objection to the gentleman from Montana having five minutes, but I give notice when he has concluded his speech I must insist on going on with the regular order.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, I would not have participated in this discussion, which has so unexpectedly arisen and which has drifted so widely from the course proposed in the bill, but for the fact that I feel it incumbent on me to say some words in explanation of the expeditions which have been undertaken for the subjugation of the relentless savages of the Yellowstone, to prevent the Army from being placed in a false position before the country, and to defend the memory of the gallant Custer and his devoted followers, who have laid down their lives on the rocky ridges of the Little Horn in defense of the women and children of the frontiers. I have long known Custer—for some years a comrade, for many years a friend; and I do not propose that the noble cause in which he died, upholding the honor, the glory, the justice of the Republic, shall be represented as a lawless invasion of Indian country or as a battle for the protection of people who were unlawfully there.

In the late war this gallant young officer was one of the first whose daring inspired our cavalry, whose skill led it through many, many dangers, and whose dash and enterprise made him an honor to our flag and the dread of its foes. From his first charge at Baxter Station up to the day of his last charge at the fatal ford of the Little Horn, his enterprise always brought him to the front, and his nerve and vigor brought him victory, till he came to be recognized as the Murat of our armies. Sir, I feel no hesitation in glorifying his courage or conduct in the civil war. I have no fear of being misunderstood, for I feel what the eloquent gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. LAMAR] so well expressed when he said that while we should forbear to dwell on the darker memories of the war, we should cherish as a common heritage the glorious deeds performed by the soldiers of both sides in that conflict. It was the crucible in which the metal of this nation was assayed, and the stamp on our national character shall ever stand as a record of the heat of the fire in which that test was made.

But, Mr. Speaker, when I see distinguished members of Congress rising in their places here and without taking the trouble to investigate the facts, without taking the trouble to find out the origin or purpose of this war, without asking when or how it began or how long the United States has been waging it on the defensive, before commencing offensive operations, casting implied reproach on the memories of our brave and gallant soldiers and of our most daring cavalry officers, by implying that our troops are in that country lawlessly, in violation of treaties and without good reason, then I want a few minutes to state the facts of the case on this floor, and I thank the House for its courtesy in granting me by unanimous consent that permission.

Mr. LAWRENCE. I meant no such thing.

Mr. MAGINNIS. Mr. Speaker, this war was not brought on by any invasion of the country referred to in this bill by settlers or explorers. There is not a single white settler in that country to-day. Since the day the treaty was made or as soon thereafter as the evacuation could be accomplished, there never has been one there. The aggressiveness of the frontier has never then displayed itself there.

Nor, sir, was this war brought on by the invasion of the Black Hills, for it may astonish gentlemen here to know that it has been waged defensively on the part of the Government for twelve years before gold was discovered in the Black Hills. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] who so ably and so conscientiously represents the peace policy on this floor, has shown you that this war had no connection with the Black Hills troubles or with the treaty Indians whose reservation covers the Black Hills. Those troubles, he thinks, have sent recruits to Sitting Bull; but the difficulty with him is of a very different origin. It is strange that gentlemen will not comprehend the fact that the word "Sioux" is the general name for many different tribes; and that some of these tribes are living under treaties while others are not and refuse to be considered in any other light than as enemies of the United States and their people. Of this latter class are Sitting Bull and his confederates; not young Sitting Bull, of Red Cloud agency, but the northern Sitting Bull, who never was at an agency and never was other than hostile to the country.

I propose to give a brief sketch of his history. He has never treated with the Government, has never been in council but once, and has never put his bloody mark to an agreement of peace. It is thought that he was an outlaw from the band who perpetrated the Spirit Lake massacre in Iowa. It is reasonably certain that he was an emissary to stir up the Minnesota Sioux to the fearful massacre in that State. But he first came to notoriety among the whites during Sully's and Sibley's expeditions in 1863 and 1864. He fought Sully in the country north of the Black Hills, and in bravado sent in a proposition for the white chief to come out and engage in individual combat. Sully drove him through the Bad Lands beyond the Powder River, when he retired into the Big Horn country, drove out the Crows who hunted there, and since then has made it his stronghold. To those who are finical about treaty obligations, I call attention to the fact that this last battle was fought on the Crow reservation, the Crows fighting on our side.

In 1865 he made war on the steamboats on the river, captured, tortured, and killed several small boat-loads of miners, and decimated the Rees and Mandans, friendly Indians since the days of Lewis and Clarke. These friendly Indians found no protection in our flag that covered them. Early in 1866 he attacked and endeavored to capture a stranded steamer; but it happened to have a detachment of troops and a load of well-armed miners on board, and he suffered a bloody repulse. Later a peace commission was sent to meet him. The council was held on the bluffs at the mouth of the Yellowstone, opposite old Fort Union. He received the presents graciously, then wheedled the commissioners out of twenty kegs of powder and ball, and then broke up the council and went for their scalps. [Laughter.] They escaped to the steamer, and under a shower of their own bullets got safe across to the fort. That commission then dissolved. [Laughter.] During the rest of that fall and winter he contented himself with besieging Fort Buford and murdering all stragglers from the garrison. In this inglorious inactivity his followers began to desert him, and he began organizing an expedition in 1867 to wipe out the Gallatin Valley. The Montana Volunteers were organized to meet him and Fort Ellis was established, and he gave that up.

Then in 1868 he declined to attend at Laramie, where the treaty under discussion was made; but he was present when the forts were evacuated, taunted and insulted our retreating soldiers, set fire to the quarters before they left, and but for the treaty Sioux would have attacked the troops, who were marched out without the honors of war. He then crossed the Yellowstone to wipe out the small settlement of Muscleshell, but a friendly Indian gave the settlers warning, and they ambushed the invader outside the village and killed thirty-six of his warriors, and he retreated, leaving the bodies on the field. This gallant fight and glorious victory, being achieved with slight loss of life by the settlers, was heralded by the peace-policy party as a wanton massacre, although the victims had marched three hundred miles to sack that settlement.

In 1869 he made raids on the Mandans, the Crows, the Rees, the Shoshones, and other tribes friendly to the whites. In the winter he blockaded Fort Buford, made several attacks upon it, and kept the garrison cooped up for several weeks at a time; so that in 1870 General Hancock, then commanding that department, thought of organizing an expedition, similar to the one recently undertaken, to bring him to peace. But it was about that time that the peace-policy fever was raging at its height, and on consultation with the other generals of the Army Hancock recommended that another effort should be made before proceeding to extremities. The Northern Pacific Railroad would greatly simplify operations, it was going on at that time, and pending its completion into the Big Horn country he advised that another effort should be made to keep Sitting Bull quiet. The next winter Congress appropriated $750,000 to buy peace with Sitting Bull until the railroad would enable us to control the situation. That was the celebrated Teton-Sioux appropriation, in regard to the use and expenditure of which some criticisms have been made. Into that matter I do not propose now to go. Anyhow they succeeded in drawing off about half his force, including some of his oldest warriors, and getting them into the agency at Fort Peck. He himself, still refusing to treat, endeavored to organize a general confederation against the whites. In 1872 he had two battles with Custer, in both of which he was defeated, and in 1873 he attacked Colonel Baker and was repulsed. He waged war on the settlements of Montana, killing settlers and running off stock; war on the Crows, whom he drove from their reservation; and war on the Shoshones, and on every Indian and every man friendly to the United States or that honored its flag. In 1875 he attacked and captured two Government trains on the Carroll road, took all the stock of the Carroll Stage Company, murdered some unarmed recruits for the Montana posts, and, turning around, he again drove the Crows from their reservation, besieged their agency, and caused them to fly for shelter to the settlements, which he harassed until winter caused him to withdraw. During the winter he attacked the settlements at Fort Pease and drove them under protection of military authority back to the town of Bozeman.

Up to 1873 or '74 the peace commission had hopes that by the Government again getting down on its knees to him peace could be secured, but finding he was intractable and demoralizing all the Indians who were disposed to treat, they saw that he must be brought down; and the commission composed of such men as Mr. Brunot and Mr. Stuart, of Philadelphia, and all the peace men of that character petitioned the Indian Department to take some means to bring this scoundrel to terms. Their petitions resulted in the letters which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] has had read to-day; and the War Department after acting on the defensive for ten long, weary years determined to make an offensive campaign.

Now I ask any gentleman on this floor where the Government has violated its faith in making a war upon this intractable Indian, who has never recognized its power, who has defied its authority, and boasts that if he can get the Sioux Nation to join him, he will drive all the white men into the ocean from which they came.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Is not this the same wretch who organized a conspiracy to murder Senator ALLISON and his associates last summer?

Mr. MAGINNIS. He is the man who planned and organized that conspiracy, though he did not go into the council himself.

The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. KASSON] has read from the treaty a stipulation that all railroads should be allowed to be built through that country and travel should be allowed. Now, did not Sitting Bull attack Custer when he went out for the survey of the Northern Pacific, and did not Custer defeat him twice within fifty miles of the scene of this late disaster? Was that observing the treaty? Should not a treaty be binding on both sides?

Mr. KASSON. Let me remind the gentleman that Sitting Bull never signed that treaty. I discriminate between the treaty-making Sioux and this wandering band of Sitting Bull.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But two thousand of the warriors who followed him against Custer signed it through their representatives.

Mr. KASSON. That is conjectural merely. Sitting Bull's band embraces roaming Arapahoes and Cheyennes, as well as restless predatory Sioux.

Mr. MAGINNIS. But my sole purpose in rising was to defend the Army of the United States, to defend Custer and Sheridan and the men who have only after long entreaty taken the offensive to put down this freebooter and depredator who has waged unceasing war upon the United States for fifteen years.

Where is the man who dares to say that it was not only the right but the duty of the United States to follow the tiger to his lair, and to prevent his future ravages of peaceful settlers and friendly allies. The Government has been slow to move, God knows, and the shadow of its flag but a mockery of the protection that it owed to its people. Who shall question the justice of the pursuit of these outlaws, or claim that men could have died in any higher or holier cause than our brave cavalier and his troopers on the Yellowstone plains. Who shall claim that his murderers—the murderers of so many others—shall go unpunished. Sir, the Custer family died at the head of their column. The Republic will keep their memory green. Their Army associates are devoted and willing, and the power of this Government is equal to putting down any band of murderers and outlaws no matter how rough their crags or how remote their fastnesses. He who says otherwise belittles his country and insults her flag. There is no spot of ground between the oceans where that flag has not the right to wave and where the Republic has not got brave hearts and strong arms enough to carry it.

One repulse does not give enemies final victory, and the safety of the frontiers, the peace of all the other Indian tribes, the blood of our soldiers demand that these Indians shall be pursued until they sue for peace and submit themselves to the authority of the nation which will oppress no one and wrong nobody, but which is bound to give peace, security, and law to all red men and white alike.

PRIVATE CALENDAR.

Mr. BRIGHT. I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the motion of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole, Mr. SPRINGER in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole for the consideration of the Private Calendar, this being objection day. The Clerk will proceed to read the first bill on the Calendar, beginning at the point where the Committee of the Whole last left off.

H. P. JONES & CO.

The first business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1427) for the relief of H. P. Jones & Co., with an amendment by the Committee of Claims.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to pay to H. P. Jones, P. B. Ruffin, and James F. Cain, trading as H. P. Jones & Co., the sum of $200.10, with interest from February 26, 1873, being the amount of drawback of tax due to them on certain tobacco exported by them.

SEC. 2. That this act shall be in force from and after its passage.

The amendment was as follows:

In section 1, after "$200.10," strike out these words: "With interest from February 26, 1873."

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report. I think the reports in all these cases should be read without being expressly called for.

The report of the Committee of Claims was read, as follows:

That the claimants in February, 1873, shipped from Norfolk to Liverpool a lot of smoking-tobacco on which there was a drawback tax of $400.20, on compliance with the law in such cases provided by statute, which statute prescribed in substance that such drawback should be allowed upon proof to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue that the revenue-stamps affixed to the tobacco were destroyed before the shipment thereof.

The Department rejected the claim for this drawback on the ground that the proof of the destruction of the stamps was not satisfactory to the Department. The Commissioner claims in his letter of January 2, 1874, that claimants failed "to notify the collector of their district of their intention to export this lot of tobacco; that that officer was unable to issue his certificate as to the payment of the tax," and that "no inspection of the stamps was made by that officer."

Your committee find from the official papers, on file in the proper office for the port of Norfolk, that on the 26th day of February, 1873, the claimants did, on the usual approved form, request the inspector at such port to make the inspection of this tobacco preliminary to its shipment, alleging that the drawback was claimed. On the same date the collector for said port issued his order to said inspector directing the inspection to be made, and "to utterly destroy all revenue-stamps affixed thereto, and mark with some appropriate device or appendage each article or package thereof, and superintend the lading of the same on board of the vessel, and make return to the office." And on the same date the said inspector did make his return to said collector in due form, in which he states over his official signature that, in pursuance of said order, "upon a notice of shipment, &c., the stamps affixed to 'this tobacco' have been entirely destroyed by me, and said merchandise has been this day duly laden under my supervision," &c.

The proper manifest was issued, and the requisite affidavit of exportation and claim for drawback was made by the attorney of the shippers.

Long after this, when the claimants had called for their drawback, this same inspector, in a letter of date May 5, 1874, to the collector of customs, says:

"I have to say that I did not cancel the stamps. My orders were to see the boxes were aboard the vessel. I had no order to cancel stamps."

It was on this letter of the inspector that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, Mr. Douglas, declined to pay this drawback.

It is apparent from the record that this inspector's statement, made in his letter of May 5, 1874, that he "had no order to cancel stamps" is false; for the order already quoted expressly directed him to "examine and ascertain the quantity, marks, and proper description of this merchandise" and "to utterly destroy all revenue-stamps affixed thereto," &c. His official return shows he made this examination and destroyed the stamps.

Either his official return or his letter is false. The other portion of the official record shows that his letter in a material part is false, and, as between the claimants, who seem to have fully complied with the law on their part, and the Government, whose agent is the sole cause of this loss, your committee hold that if any one is to be the loser, on every principle of justice and law it should be the Government, which alone is in default.

Nor will the Government lose anything, for there is no question but the claimants affixed the stamps; the tobacco and stamps went abroad, and if, in fact, they were not destroyed, the fault was solely that of the Government's agent, who by his official report made on the very day of the shipment showed a destruction of the stamps, thereby lulling to security the shippers and inducing them to let the cargo depart without further act or any suspicion on their part.

The plain duty of the Government in such case is to pay the citizen and deal with the delinquent official.

The amount actually paid by the claimants for stamps was $400.20, and this under the law was the amount of drawback to which they were entitled. But it appears from the papers in the case that the amount claimed is only $200.10, which is to be attributed doubtless to the impression that the exporter was only entitled to one-half of the sum paid for stamps as a drawback. As this one-half is what they claimed, your committee are disposed to abide their own election, and, with the accompanying amendment striking out the words "with interest from February 26, 1873," report the bill back for the allowance of $200.10, with a favorable recommendation.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JOSEPH R. SHANNON.

Mr. HENDEE. When the House was last in Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar I objected to the bill H. R. No. 3185. I now desire to withdraw the objection.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. You cannot go back.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I submit that it is impossible for the committee to give unanimous consent to go back. The committee has no power to change the rules. I have no objection to this particular bill, but I think it would be a bad precedent to go back. Some gentlemen who may know that a bill has been objected to and passed over, and who may be giving themselves no further concern about it, might find that an advantage had been taken of them if the precedent were established that we could go back in this way.

Mr. BRIGHT. I object.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. My objection is not particularly to this bill, but to the power of the Committee of the Whole to give unanimous consent.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to the rule on page 184 of the Digest, which shows that it is competent for the committee by unanimous consent to recur to a bill which has been objected to.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. The unanimous consent of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I would like to hear that read.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

On such days, objection, such as is indicated by the above rule, or debate arising, is fatal to the further consideration of a bill, but an amendment may be entertained and voted on. And after a bill has been objected to, and on that account passed over, it cannot without unanimous consent be recurred to.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. BRIGHT] to going back to the bill No. 3185.

J. E. PANKEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky, reported by the Committee of Claims with an amendment.

The amendment was to strike out in lines 6, 7, and 8 the following words: "With interest thereon from the 1st of April, 1872."

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to that bill because it allows interest.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee recommend an amendment striking out the interest.

Mr. HOLMAN. An important paper connected with this bill is a letter from the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, and I hope it will be read.

The CHAIRMAN. That letter is not in the hands of the Clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN. The papers of course were reported with the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. That paper does not accompany the report of the committee

Mr. HURLBUT. I understand that the Commissioner of Internal Revenue recommends the passage of this bill as proper.

Mr. BRIGHT. The chairman of the Committee of Claims addressed a letter to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue and his reply was favorable to the bill.

The amendment offered by the committee was agreed to; and the bill, as amended, was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

JONATHAN WHITE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of Jonathan White.

The bill was read. It authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jonathan White, of Minnesota, out of any money not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $55.40, the same having been illegally paid to the United States land officers at Redwood Falls, Minnesota, under a wrong construction of the tree-culture act.

Mr. DUNNELL. I think it is hardly necessary to read the long report which accompanies that bill, and the provision of the bill is simply to correct a misconstruction of the law.

No objection was made, and the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

NATHANIEL G. SMITH.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 358) for the relief of Nathaniel G. Smith, postmaster at Flemington, New Jersey.

The bill and report were read.

Mr. COCHRANE. I object to that bill.

Mr. HAMILTON, of New Jersey. This bill passed the Senate in the last Congress, and has passed the Committee on Claims of the Senate as well as the Committee of Claims of the House.

Mr. COCHRANE. If I had an opportunity of explaining my reasons for objecting I am sure the gentleman would be satisfied that my objection was well founded.

The CHAIRMAN. Discussion is not in order; the bill being objected to is passed over.

MARGARET M. LAMB.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 266) for the relief of Margaret M. Lamb, postmaster at Annawan, Illinois.

The bill was read.

Mr. COCHRANE. I object to that bill also because there is no evidence that the stamps for which it is proposed to allow this claim were destroyed.

Mr. BRADLEY. It is useless for us to continue the consideration of these bills in relation to postmasters so long as the gentleman from Pennsylvania objects to them.

Mr. COCHRANE. I understand that the bill which will next be read is a claim for postage-stamps which have not been destroyed, and I only object to the passage of the bills where the stamps were not destroyed.

JAMES W. LOVE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to place to the credit of the post-office fund, on money-order account, the sum of $26; and the Auditor of the Treasury for the Post-Office Department is directed to credit James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana, in his account as such postmaster, $26, being for the loss of a like sum, money-order funds remitted by him to the post-office at Cincinnati for deposit and destroyed while en route by the burning of the mail-boat Pat Rogers on the Ohio River, August 5, 1874.

The report was read, as follows:

It appears that James W. Love was postmaster at Patriot, Indiana; that on the 4th of August, 1874, pursuant to regulations and instructions of the Post-Office Department, the said postmaster inclosed $26, in a registered letter, (number 9,) in the presence of a witness, having taken the description of each note inclosed, the same being surplus order funds. He placed the registered package in a mail-pouch, and delivered it to the messenger whose duty it was to carry the mail from the post-office to the boat-landing, and delivered the same to the mail agent on the boat. This pouch was so delivered on the evening of the 4th of August, as above mentioned, the route agent giving his receipt therefor. The mail-boat was the Pat Rogers, running on the line between Louisville and Cincinnati, and was burned the next morning, after receiving this package on board, which was August 5, 1874, while making an upward-bound trip. The money contained in the package in question belonged to the Government, and was being forwarded to Cincinnati for deposit, against which orders were to be drawn. It is perfectly apparent that when the money left the possession of the postmaster at Patriot he was no longer responsible for its safety, and was entitled to a credit therefor. The agent on board of the boat testifies that he received the package and had it in his possession, together with twenty-five others, in a mail-pouch, and when the boat was found to be on fire, he carried the pouch forward on to the forecastle of the boat, in hopes that she would land, but failing to make a landing, he was compelled to leave the pouch, and save himself as best he could, and the packages were burned up. The case was thoroughly examined by a special agent of the Department, and there appears no doubt as to the loss having actually occurred. The committee report the bill back with a substitute therefor, and recommend that the substitute do pass.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

BUTLER, MILLER & CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.

The bill was read. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to John J. Anderson, surviving copartner of the firm of Anderson & White, the sum of $8,597.83, in full of all claims of said Anderson & White, or either of them, against the Government of the United States, for cotton belonging to said firm, impressed for, and appropriated by, the authority of the Government of the United States to the defenses of Nashville in August and September, 1862, and for all damages in connection therewith.

Mr. FORT. I object to that bill.

Mr. WALLING. I hope the gentleman will hear the report read. The House committee adopted the report of the Senate committee.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

On the 26th day of February, 1874, Mr. Pratt, from the Committee on Claims, made a report on the bill introduced for the relief of these petitioners. We have carefully examined the evidence submitted to the committee at that time; also the additional evidence now submitted, and in the light of all the evidence we adopt the report made by Mr. Pratt, which is as follows, namely:

"The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Butler, Miller & Co. $14,159.38, and to Hawkes, Miller & Co. $10,223.42, in full satisfaction and discharge of their claims for cotton taken at Nashville, Tennessee, in 1863, by the United States Army.

"The principal testimony in the case of the first-named firm is furnished by the Secretary of War, accompanying his letter to the committee dated April 12, 1872. In that letter he states that no record is found in his Department in the case of Hawkes, Miller & Co.

"The record furnished by him in the case of Butler, Miller & Co. purports to be certain proceedings had before a board convened by virtue of special field order No. 71, paragraph 7, Department of the Cumberland, in which the finding of the board is set out, as also the testimony of the witnesses examined before them. The record begins by saying that the firm appeared as—

"Claimants for loss, damage, and expenses accruing on certain bales of cotton alleged to have been taken by military authority for use on the fortifications at Nashville, Tennessee; that the claim was fully stated in the declaration of C. C. Comstock, (agent for Butler, Miller & Co.,) on file and marked F, and plainly set forth in Butler, Miller & Co.'s account against the United States, of which the following is a copy:

"The United States to Butler, Miller & Co., Dr.

To 17 bales of cotton, short, marked S. & Co., 7,871 lbs., at 57 c	$4,486 47
To damages on 22 bales as assessed, S. & Co., 10,192 lbs., at 1½ c	152 88
To 17 bales cotton, short, marked W., 8,296 lbs., at 57 c	4,728 72
To damages assessed on 68 bales, marked W., 32,489 lbs., at 4c	1,299 56
To 13 bales cotton, short, marked W. E., 5,278 lbs., at 57c	3,008 46
To damages on 44 bales as assessed, marked W. E., 17,881 lbs., at 1c	178 81
To J. A. McAllister's bill for drayage, storage, &c	713 30
To William Lyon, bill of rope, bagging, and twine	248 89

"The substance of the testimony of the several witnesses examined is then set out and the conclusion of the board is stated in the following words and figures, to wit:

"J. A. McAllister, cotton merchant, and resident of Nashville, Tennessee, testifies that during the month of August, 1862, he had in store at his warehouse two hundred and twelve bales of cotton belonging to Spence & Sperry, marked S. & Co; one hundred and four bales belonging to C. A. Fuller, marked W., and sixty bales belonging to W. G. Elliot, marked W. E., in all three hundred and seventy-six; that said three hundred and seventy-six bales were taken by orders of Generals Rousseau and Negley, about the 5th and 24th days of September, 1862, for use on the fortifications at Nashville, Tennessee; that the said cotton bales were used on the fortifications about six months; that but eighty-seven bales of the lot marked W., and two hundred and forty-one bales and one bag of the lots marked W. E. and S. & Co., were returned, which leaves twenty-seven bales to be accounted for; that Butler, Miller & Co. purchased the whole lot of three hundred and seventy-six bales, belonging to Spence & Sperry, Fuller & Elliot, while it was being used in the fortifications, except a few bales that had been returned before the purchase was made, the above-named parties transferring the receipts obtained of the military authorities for the three hundred and seventy-six bales above mentioned to Butler, Miller & Co.; they (Butler, Miller & Co.) to stand in their (Spence & Sperry, Elliot & Fuller) place as to claim on the Government for loss or damage; that the cotton was hauled from the fortifications to the warehouse at the expense of Butler, Miller & Co.; that on ninety-one bales was paid drayage at $1 per bale; on one hundred and twenty-one bales, at $1.25 per bale; and on seventy-one bales, at fifty cents per bale; that he charged $1 per bale for storage, and twenty-five cents per bale for repairs on three hundred and twenty-seven bales and one bag. The above expenses were charged to and paid by Butler, Miller & Co.; that damages were assessed on one hundred and thirty-four bales by N. E. Alloway and N. K. Griffin, after the same were returned to the warehouse. Alloway charged, and we (J. A. McAllister & Co.) paid, (for Butler, Miller & Co.,) $26 for his services; that the ordinary rate for storage is fifty cents per bale, but he charged $1 per bale on Butler, Miller & Co.'s cotton on account of extra handling, incurred in having damages assessed and repairing done; that the price of cotton in Nashville, at the time it was being returned from the fortifications, was about fifty-five cents per pound. Witness states that the repairs above spoken of were about equally distributed between the lot of one hundred and ninety-three bales, upon which no assessment was made, and the lot of one hundred and thirty-four bales, which was assessed; that Butler, Miller & Co. furnished the material to repair said cotton bales, and that he has no interest whatever in this claim.

"N. K. Griffin, a member of the firm of A. Hamilton & Co., cotton factors, testifies that he, in company with N. E. Alloway, assessed the damages on a certain lot of cotton, said to belong to Butler, Miller & Co., some time during the months of December and January, 1862-'63; said cotton was stored in the warehouse of J. A. McAllister & Co; that the result of the assessment so made is the same as shown in exhibits B and C, on file with this board, namely: Forty-four bales, damaged one cent per pound; eighty-six bales, four cents per pound; sixty-eight bales, four cents per pound; and twenty-two bales, one and a half cents per pound damages; that the cotton so assessed was damaged by exposure to the weather, being wet and to some extent rotten and soiled with mud. Also, that the rope and bagging were torn from very many of the bales; that he thinks it was well worth $1 per bale to haul the cotton from the fortifications to the warehouse; that the price of cotton at the time it was being returned from the fortifications was about fifty-five cents in the Nashville market; and that in assessing damages they took into consideration the cost of material and labor in repairing the bales.

"The testimony of N. E. Alloway corroborates that of N. K. Griffin in every particular.

"C. C. Comstock, in his testimony before the board, states that he is interested in this claim to the extent that he has a certain percentage for his services as agent, and that while he admits the assessment of damages to have covered the cost of material and labor of repairing the one hundred and thirty-four bales upon which assessment was made, he claims that Butler, Miller & Co. ought to be paid for the expense of repairing the one hundred and niney-three bales upon which no assessment of damages was made.

"The board, therefore, concludes that three hundred and seventy-six bales of cotton belonging to Spence & Sperry, W. Y. Elliott & C. A. Fuller, were taken and used on the fortifications at Nashville, Tennessee; that while said three hundred and seventy-six bales were being so used they were purchased by Butler, Miller & Co., (except a few bales which were purchased after being returned to the warehouse;) that forty-seven bales of said cotton were never returned to Butler, Miller & Co., and one hundred and thirty-four bales were damaged while being used in the fortifications as alleged and to the extent alleged, namely: Forty-four bales damaged one cent per pound; sixty-eight bales, four cents per pound; and twenty-two bales, one and one-half cents per pound; that McAllister's bill (Exhibit D) is correct and just, except that he charges on three hundred and twenty-seven bales and one bag, when he should charge repairs on only one hundred and ninety-three bales; the repairs on the other one hundred and thirty-four bales and one bag being provided for in the assessment of damages; that William Lyon's bill for rope, bagging, &c., (Exhibit D,) is not to be allowed, except so much of it as would upon an average be required to repair the one hundred and ninety-three bales upon which damages were assessed; that Butler, Miller & Co.'s charge of fifty-seven cents per pound for the cotton that was lost in the fortifications is too much, fifty-five cents per pound being the price established by the evidence. The following statement sets forth fully what, in the opinion of the board, the claimants are entitled to:

United States to Butler, Miller & Co., Dr.

To 47 bales of cotton taken by military authority and not returned, weighing 21,277 pounds, at 55 cents per pound*		$11,702 35
To repairing 193 bales of cotton, at 25 cents per bale†		48 25
To rope, bagging, and twine for repairing 193 bales, at 76 cents per bale ‡		146 78
To storage on 327 bales, at $1 per bale		327 00
To drayage on 283 bales; that is, 121 bales, at $1.25 per bale	$151 25
91 bales, at $1	91 00
71 bales, at 50 cents	35 50
		277 75
To paid assessment of 134 bales		$26 00
To damages on 22 bales of cotton, (as assessed,) weight 10,192 pounds, at 1½ cents per pound		152 88
To damages on 68 bales, (as assessed,) weight 32,489 pounds, at 4 cents per pound		1,299 56
To damages on 44 bales, (as assessed,) weight 17,881 pounds, at 1 cent per pound		178 81
		14,159 38

It will thus be seen that the board found that the claimants, Butler, Miller & Co., were entitled to $14,159 38, being less by $657.71 than the amount claimed.

"The record does not disclose the names of the officers constituting the board, nor when and where they sat in judgment on this case. The examinations are attested by J. J. Donnelly, captain Fourteenth Michigan Volunteers, who subscribes himself recorder of the board. The witnesses appear to have been sworn, but by whom it does not appear. Their names are as follows: J. A. McAllister, N. K. Griffin, N. E. Alloway, and C. C. Comstock. They were examined on behalf of the claimants and by the board. The theory of the board was that the cotton, that which was missing, was to be paid for by the ruling price at the time it was removed from the fortifications, three months after its original seizure, and not its value at the time of the seizure at the place of the seizure. We say such was the theory, for in looking over the testimony but one question seems to have been asked as to its value at that time; and the finding of the board discloses that its value was assessed at the last-named period. When taken, cotton at Nashville was worth only twenty-three cents per pound; when restored, it was worth from fifty to fifty-five cents per pound.

"With this general statement of the case we come to the facts as established by these witnesses.

"McAllister, the first witness, swears that he was a cotton merchant of Nashville, and during the month of August, 1862, had stored in his warehouse—

212 bales of cotton belonging to Spence & Sperry, marked S. & Co.
104 bales of cotton belonging to C. A. Fuller, marked W.
60 bales of cotton belonging to W. Y. Elliott, marked W. E.

"That all the cotton was taken about the 5th day of September, 1862, by order of General Rousseau, except twenty-three bales, which were taken by order of General Negley, on or about the 24th day of September, 1862; that all this cotton, except twenty-three bales, was taken to Fort Confiscation; and as to the twenty-three bales, the witness does not know where they were used. Part of that taken to this fort was afterward taken away and used on other forts of the city. Tickets were given by Lieutenant Dearduff as the cotton marked S. & Co. was taken from the warehouse. These were ultimately surrendered to the number of one hundred and eighty-nine bales and a receipt given. The same officer issued tickets for one hundred and two bales, marked W., for which a general receipt was subsequently given. In the same manner tickets were given, marked W. E., for sixty bales on September 5, 1862. A general receipt was likewise given. On the 24th of September, 1862, the witness took a receipt from Fred. H. Kennedy for twenty-three bales marked S. & Co., and on the same day General Negley gave a receipt for one bale marked W., and on September 23, P. W. Hallo'an gave a receipt for one bale.

"The witness swears that the cotton was absent from the warehouse about three months, and that eighty-seven bales of the lot marked W. and two hundred and forty-one bales and one bag—a part marked W. E. and a part marked S. & Co.—were returned to the warehouse from the fortifications; or three hundred and twenty-eight bales and one bag in all were so returned.

"When this cotton was seized, two hundred and twelve bales belonged to Spence & Sperry, one hundred and four to C. A. Fuller, and sixty to W. Y. Elliott. While it was in the fortifications, Butler, Miller & Co. purchased all of it except a few bales, which had been returned to the warehouse from the street, but the number so returned is not given by the witness.

"The title to the cotton was passed to Butler, Miller & Co., by the transfer of the receipts which these several parties held, and by agreement this firm was to be subrogated to all the rights which Spence & Sperry, Fuller & Elliott had for loss, damage, &c., or, to adopt the language of the witness, 'Butler, Miller & Co. to stand in the place of the several parties as to claims for loss, damage &c.'

"It further appears by this witness that this firm paid the expense of hauling the cotton from the fortifications to the warehouse, the storage charges, and the expense of repairing the bales, including the rope and bagging necessary.

"Upon the return of the cotton, an assessment of damages was made upon one hundred and thirty-four bales, some of the cotton being wet, rotten, and muddy, and $26 was paid for this assessment.

"What the present claimants paid for the cotton, purchased as it was in the fortifications in its damaged condition, does not clearly appear; nor does the board seem to have thought that an important question, for but one question was asked on the subject; nor was but one question asked as to the price of cotton in Nashville at the time this seizure took place; and this same witness swears that he knew of but one sale about that time, of a lot of sixty-eight bales, which sold at twenty-three cents per pound. But he adds that there was no transportation for cotton at that time, and consequently there was no market price.

"When questioned as to its price when the cotton was returned, he says there were two or three sales of cotton after this at fifty-five cents per pound, but how long after he does not say.

"Mr. Griffin, the next witness, a tobacco and cotton factor of Nashville, assessed the damages on the returned cotton, in connection with N. E. Alloway, while it was in the warehouse of J. A. McAllister & Co.

"On forty-four bales, at one cent per pound.
"On sixty-eight bales, at four cents per pound.
"On twenty-two bales, at one and one-half cents per pound.
"The damage consisted in much of it being rotten, wet, and soiled with mud. The rope and bagging were off a good many bales.

"The cotton used on the fortifications was returned to the warehouse from the 23d of November to the 23d of December, 1862, and was hauled by draymen at $1 per bale. The market price at the time it was returned was fifty-five cents per pound.

"Mr. Alloway says the assessment of the damages was made in January. He was one of the appraisers, and had been in the cotton commission business. He agrees with Mr. Griffin as to the nature and extent of the damage done the cotton, but fixes the price at from fifty to fifty-five cents. The principle of the assessment was to affix the amount per bale to make it perfect and in good shipping order. This assessment was made at the request of McAllister & Co.

"C. C. Comstock, the last witness, speaks only to the point of the cost of the repairing done on the bales and the cost of the rope, twine, and bagging. And this concludes the testimony taken by the board.

"The claimants, with one exception, were not examined, and we are without any light, except that furnished by Spence, who gives us his impression only, upon the question what this lot of damaged cotton cost them while it was in the fortifications, if we shall conclude that to be a material question.

"Outside of the evidence taken by the board we have:

"First. The order, No. 5, of General Rousseau, dated August 30, 1862, impressing the entire stock of cotton bales then stored in Nashville into the service of the Government:

"'Captain Morton, of the Engineer Corps, is hereby authorized to take possession of it. The proper receipts will be given for the cotton, and it will be restored

*The weights of the missing bales are calculated from an average of the lots of corresponding marks as weighed after being returned from fortifications.

†It being proved by McAllister's testimony that repairing had been done on the ninety-three bales upon which no assessment was made, to an extent equal to that which had been done on the one hundred and thirty-four barrels which were assessed, the board allows repairing at the same rate.

‡That portion of the three hundred and twenty-seven bales upon which assessment was not made, and consequently not provided in the assessment.

at as early a day as possible. The owners are guaranteed against all losses except those which depend upon the fortunes of war.'

"Second. The statement of John J. Anderson, that the two firms mentioned in this bill had about seven hundred bales stored in Nashville, and which was taken by the military authorities and used in the fortifications, and that an award was made to each firm by the board on account of cotton not returned; that he was present when these awards were made, but cannot state the amounts.

"This witness says he procured from Secretary Stanton the order to General Rosecrans to convene the board of review to assess the loss and damages on the cotton that had been in the fortifications. Comstock was agent of the two firms, who lived at Columbus, and was present during the winter of 1862-'63 in Nashville, and a great part of the cotton taken was returned to him. The witness evidently is mistaken in speaking of the cotton as belonging to them when seized by the military and used in the fortifications.

"Third. Mr. Comstock, in an affidavit made in March, 1872, falls into a similar mistake, all the less excusable in him as the agent of these two firms and presumed to be well acquainted with their affairs. Thus, he says a very large amount of the cotton of each of these firms was taken to be used in the fortifications, and that those who took the cotton receipted for the same to him as the agent of the firms; whereas the truth is that the receipts were given to Spence & Sperry, to C. A. Fuller, and to W. G. Elliott, from whom Butler, Miller & Co. purchased, taking a transfer of the receipts. This witness represented the firms before the military board, and speaks of the award to Hawks, Miller & Co. as being over $10,000. He says he delivered these awards, or rather copies of them, to these firms respectively, and knows the amounts from memoranda now in his possession and made at the time. The gross amount of both was between $24,000 and $25,000.

"This witness confesses to his interest to the extent of the compensation to be received for his services.

"Two observations occur to this committee in connection with this witness's evidence. 1st. The glaring mistake he makes as to the cotton being seized while it was the property of these firms, and receipts therefor being given to him, tends to throw discredit over his entire testimony. 2d. He does not furnish the data in his possession, from which he estimates the award in favor of Hawkes, Miller & Co., and these data must have been quite imperfect when he can be no more exact than to say it was above $10,000, and that both awards amounted to between $24,000 and $25,000.

"Frank McClelland produces an account of Hawkes, Miller & Co. against the United States, being a true copy, as he says, from the one before the board, and on which the award was founded. It is—

For 4 bales of cotton	$1,105 80
For 4 bales of cotton	1,105 80
For damages on 58 bales	1,948 65
For damages on 101 bales	1,626 04
For 22 and 68 bales	4,437 13

"Joseph H. Geiger swears to having had in his possession certified copies of the awards made by the board in behalf of both firms; that they were placed in his hands for collection at Washington; that he presented the claims to Secretary Stanton, who refused payment on the ground that there was no appropriation for that purpose. He then placed the copies in the hands of Hon. Thomas Corwin for his professional attention, since which time he has not seen them, although he has made careful search through Mr. Corwin's papers. He is not able to state the amount of either award, but thinks the two were about $25,000.

"William Spence, the last witness, proves the purchase by him at Huntsville, Alabama, of a large amount of cotton, which he shipped to Nashville and stored in the warehouse of James McAllister & Co., its seizure and employment in the fortifications, the receipt he received therefor from the military authorities for the number and weight of the bales, and the sale by him of this receipt to Samuel McClelland, one of the firm of Butler, Miller & Co. His impression is he was paid something over fifty cents per pound for the lot, at the weights made out by McAllister & Co. before the cotton was taken to the fortifications. He also states his impression that Hawkes, Miller & Co. had a large amount of cotton they had shipped from Huntsville at the time he shipped his own, and which was taken by the same military order and put into the fortifications, and much damaged, and that their case was considered by the military board. He does not state this as a fact, but an impression.

"It is a noteworthy fact that only one member of the two firms offers his testimony, and that this gentleman (Samuel McClelland) says not a word about the purchase of the cotton or its price or the damage occasioned or the extent of the loss. What he swears to, and the only thing he swears to, is a fact next thing to immaterial, as that Charles C. Comstock had not been for the past eight years directly or indirectly interested in the payment of these claims.

"It will be seen by this review of the testimony that, so far as the claim of Hawkes, Miller & Co.'s case is concerned, we have not the award itself nor a copy of it, but statements that such an award was made for at least $10,000, and was founded upon an account, a copy of which was taken by Frank McClelland from the record. Where and of whom they bought the cotton, how much was taken, and to whom receipts were given, we know nothing positively. It will be observed that the witnesses speak almost exclusively of the cotton of Butler, Miller & Co. The award before us has no reference to Hawkes, Miller & Co. Not a single member of either firm has volunteered his evidence in support of the claim, except Samuel McClelland, whose affidavit amounts to nothing; nor is there any excuse volunteered for this omission. These firms are said to reside in Columbus, Ohio, a State in which claimants may swear on their own behalf even in courts of justice. Much more could they and should they in a case before Congress. They know or should know better than any one else when and where they bought their cotton, its weight, quality, and condition, the price paid, the amount of loss, its value when lost, and what (if anything) they have received on account of it. They possibly could furnish some theory to account for so great a loss of bales out of the number placed in the fortifications.

"Butler, Miller & Co. claim to have purchased from the different parties three hundred and seventy-six bales and claim to have lost of this number forty-seven bales, containing—

21,445 pounds, worth fifty-seven cents or	$12,223 65
To this they add for drayage, storage, repairs, and damages	2,593 38
	14,817 03
The board finds they lost forty-seven bales, containing 21,277 pounds, worth	11,702 35
The other items allowed as above amount to	2,457 03
	14,159 38

"In this aggregate was included an item of storage of three hundred and twenty-seven bales, $327, but on what principle this should be charged to the United States is not perceived. Upon the return of the cotton to the warehouse the liability of the United States should cease.

"Returning to the order under which the cotton was seized, the guarantees to the owners are: First. That it shall be restored at as early a day as possible. Second. The owners are guaranteed against all losses, except those which depend upon the fortunes of war. The last qualifies the first, and the whole might properly be read as follows: 'The United States will restore to the owners as early as possible all the cotton taken in the condition when taken, except as to so much as shall be lost or damaged through the fortunes of war, and as to the cotton so lost or damaged the guarantee shall not operate.'

"Now, the claimants proceed on the theory that none was lost or damaged by the fortunes of war, and insist as to that lost they shall be paid in full, and as to that damaged an amount equal to the difference between the cotton when taken and when returned. Not only that, but as to the cotton not returned they claim that the loss should be estimated by the market price of the cotton at the time that not lost was returned.

"To test the soundness of this theory, let us suppose the forty-seven bales not returned were lost or destroyed soon after the seizure, and when cotton was worth only twenty-three cents per pound, what would be the rate of compensation then? The obligation is not to return an equivalent amount of cotton for that lost, for losses by the fortunes of war were contemplated and provided against. A literal construction of the order would relieve the United States from making compensation for what was thus lost. But to give a liberal construction to the order, compensation for that lost should relate to the time when the cotton was seized. It was then the loss to the owners occurred. If the cotton had burned up next day, the measure of damage to the owners would have been its market value on that day. Now, since there is no proof when the loss in fact occurred or how it occurred, the true principle seems to be to assess the loss by the figure the cotton would have commanded at the time of the seizure.

Upon this principle the 21,445 pounds were worth	$4,931 35
The other items as assessed by the board were	2,457 03
	7,388 38
From this should be deducted the storage	327 00
	7,061 38
But to this sum-total should be added, according to the testimony of McAllister, fifty cents a bale for handling, for inspection, and assessment of damages on the three hundred and twenty-seven bales	163 50
Which would leave due the claimants	7,224 88

"This result should not be disturbed by the price paid by Butler, Miller & Co. to the owners while the cotton was in the fortifications. They can lay no claim to a higher rate of indemnity than those under whom they derive title. They bought the owners' claim against the United States, whatever that was, nothing more.

"The committee therefore are of opinion that Butler, Miller & Co. on the evidence are entitled to $7,224.88.

"As to Hawkes, Miller & Co.'s claim, the committee do not see how they can recommend payment in the present condition of the evidence."

The committee therefore herewith report a bill for the relief of Butler, Miller & Co. in accordance with this finding, and recommend its passage.

Mr. FORT. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be favorably reported to the House.

LEMUEL L. LAWRENCE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3319) granting a pension to Lemuel L. Lawrence, late second lieutenant of Company B, in the Sixth Regiment Illinois Cavalry Volunteers.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Interior to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Lemuel L. Lawrence, late second lieutenant of Company B, in the Sixth Regiment of Illinois Cavalry Volunteers, to take effect from and after the passage of the act.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The evidence shows that the said Lawrence was, in the early part of 1862, a second lieutenant in Company B, Sixth Illinois Cavalry Volunteers; that his said regiment was, about the 1st of March, 1862, stationed at Shawneetown, in Illinois, and that while said regiment was there in camp he, the said Lieutenant Lemuel L. Lawrence, was ordered with a squad of soldiers to march to Johnson County, Illinois, and arrest a soldier who had deserted from said regiment; that said Lawrence, in obedience to said order, did go to said county, and while attempting to execute said order in arresting the said deserter he was attacked by armed men and severely wounded. This wound has disabled him, and he is still suffering from said wound. These facts are all clearly established. The committee are of opinion that said Lawrence is entitled to a pension, and report said bill back and recommend that it do pass.

PHILIP ROHR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3503) for the relief of Philip Rohr, of Virginia, for tobacco seized for use of the Army.

The bill directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Philip Rohr, a citizen of Virginia, the sum of $1,600 for tobacco seized for the use of the Federal Army in 1864.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Philip Rohr, of the State of Virginia, claims compensation for two thousand pounds of Virginia chewing-tobacco at $1 per pound, taken for the use of the Union Army.

The facts are few and about them there is no dispute. Claimant was a loyal man, a resident of Bristol, Washington County, Virginia, and was the owner of the tobacco for which payment is claimed. On the 15th of December, 1864, a force of Federal cavalry occupied Bristol under the command of Generals Stoneman and Burbridge. By order of General Burbridge the tobacco was seized, carried to the camp, distributed among and used by the soldiers of the command.

The case was presented to the commissioners of claims and rejected by them upon the ground that tobacco is not an Army supply, and this is the sole question upon which this case must turn.

Strictly speaking, tobacco is not a "supply;" it does not appear among the list of articles required to be furnished to the armies of the Government. The "ration" is provided for in the statute, and tobacco does not appear as one of its components. But in the decision of the many cases coming before Congress, in the absence of precise statutes to cover each case, and with only general provisions for our guidance, some latitude should be allowed, and each case should stand upon its own merits. In the case at bar, a commodity which is in general, we might say universal, use, which forms a great item of our commerce, and is an article of comfort and luxury, is taken from a loyal citizen, not by violence or robbery, but by the intelligent order of the general in command. The Revised Statutes (section 1149) recognize it as an article necessary and proper for the soldier, and oblige commissaries of subsistence to keep and sell it to the soldier on credit and at cost prices. In fixing the "ration," the statute confers power upon the President, who is Commander-in-Chief, to alter the component parts of the ration as the health and comfort of the Army may require. But the President, in a tremendous war such as was waged between the sections of this country, could only make such general regulations as were necessary, leaving to his subordinates in the field, in great part, the discretion conferred upon him.

Whisky is not a "supply;" yet there were times and occasions, in forced marches, in protracted cold or wet weather, when it was deemed requisite to the health and efficiency of the Army, and it was issued. It became then a supply from the nature of the use made of it, or, to use the civil-law term, "by destination." There are hundreds of articles not mentioned in the Army regulations or in the statutes as forming component parts of the soldier's ration, and which, strictly speaking, could not be termed "supply;" yet, if taken for "supply," issued as "supply," and used as "supply," we hold that they have become so by destination. So with the tobacco. General Burbridge, exercising that portion of the discretion conferred upon the Commander-in-Chief, and with which his commission as major-general had invested him, deemed the tobacco necessary for the health and comfort of his command. It became supply by "destination," and we think the Government is bound.

But your committee think the price perhaps too large. Eighty cents per pound seems to us a reasonable price for common chewing-tobacco. Two thousand pounds, at eighty cents, would be $1,600. We think he should be allowed that amount, and report the accompanying bill and recommend its passage. (Vide case of Stubblefield, third general report commissioners of claims, article 6, page 3.)

Mr. HURLBUT objected to the bill, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

There being no other objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

THOMAS DAY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 3504) for the relief of Thomas Day.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Thomas Day, of Indiana, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $640.75, in full payment and satisfaction for the use of nursery grounds at Madison, Indiana, by the United States, in the year 1863, for a military post and for barracks and hospital purposes.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I object to this bill.

Mr. HOLMAN. I call for the reading of the report.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill is objected to.

Mr. HOLMAN. I submit that according to the rule of the House it is always proper that the report should be read if called for, and afterward the question is whether there is objection to the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The language of the rule is:

The Calendar of private bills shall be called over; and the bills to which no objection is made shall be first considered and disposed of.

Mr. HOLMAN. But the practice has been uniform that the report, if called for, should be read; and afterward objection may be made if it be thought proper.

The CHAIRMAN. The report in this case is very short, and it may be read if there is no objection.

Mr. HOLMAN. The uniform ruling has been what I state.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would hold that the reading of the report is consideration of the bill; and when the passage of a bill is objected to its further consideration cannot take place on that day.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is a question of such vital moment that if the Chair entertains any doubt about it I can show the uniform, unbroken ruling. The question has never been raised perhaps during this session, but the ruling is uniform on this point.

The CHAIRMAN. That may be the practice of the Committee of the Whole, but the rule is otherwise. If there be no objection, the Clerk will read the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on War Claims, to whom was referred the claim of Thomas Day, of Indiana, beg leave to report:

That this claim was before the Forty-third Congress, and a favorable report thereon made by Mr. JAMES WILSON, of the War Claims Committee of that Congress, now a member of this committee,

This claim is for the use and occupation of nursery-grounds by the United States, situated in Jefferson County, Indiana. Said grounds were occupied and used during the war of the late rebellion as a military post for barracks and hospital purposes. Your committee believe, from the evidence, that the claimant is entitled to the sum of $640.75, as a compensation for the said use and occupation. They report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. WILSHIRE. I withdraw my objection.

There being no objection, the bill was laid aside, to be reported favorably to the House.

W. H. NEWMAN AND L. A. VAN HOFFMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. No. 1654) for the relief of W. H. Newman and L. A. Van Hoffman.

Mr. FORT. I object.

Mr. HUNTON. I ask for the reading of the report in the hope that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] will withdraw his objection upon hearing the report read. This bill has been favorably reported in two different Congresses.

The report was read.

Mr. HUNTON. There has been no adverse report.

Mr. FORT. I understand there was an adverse report. I must insist on my objection.

Mr. RANDALL. I move the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. SPRINGER reported sundry bills with the respective recommendations of the committee thereon.

DEATH OF HON. EDWARD Y. PARSONS.

Mr. KNOTT. I rise to perform the most melancholy duty that has ever devolved upon me in the course of my public life: to announce to this House the sudden and unexpected death of my colleague, Hon. EDWARD Y. PARSONS. I move the adoption of the resolutions which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That a committee of seven members be appointed by the Speaker of the House to take order for superintending the funeral of Hon. EDWARD Y. PARSONS, late a member of this body from the State of Kentucky.

Resolved, That as a mark of the respect entertained by the House for the memory of Hon. EDWARD Y. PARSONS his remains be removed to Louisville, Kentucky, in charge of the Sergeant-at-Arms and attended by the said committee, who shall have full power to carry this resolution into effect.

Resolved, That the Clerk communicate these proceedings to the Senate.

Resolved, That as an additional mark of respect to the memory of the deceased the House do now adjourn.

The resolutions were unanimously adopted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced the appointment of the following committee in pursuance of the first resolution just adopted: Mr. BLACKBURN, Mr. HOPKINS, Mr. HARTZELL, Mr. WALKER of Virginia, Mr. FORT, Mr. LAWRENCE, and Mr. CLARKE of Kentucky.

And then, in accordance with the concluding resolution, the House (at three o'clock and thirty-five minutes p. m) adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following memorials, petitions, and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

The following bills from the House of Representatives were severally read twice by their titles and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs:

A bill (H. R. No. 2813) relieving the State of Kansas from charges on account of ordnance furnished to Kansas Territory; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3855) for the relief of George T. Olmstead, jr.

POST-ROUTE BILL.

Mr. HAMLIN. The bill of the House establishing certain post-roads in the country I am sure will interest more Senators than any other bill which may be brought before us, and I ask the Senate to allow me to take it up and have it passed this morning. It is House bill No. 3628, establishing post-roads.

Mr. MERRIMON. I ask the Senator from Maine to yield to me a moment that I may present a petition.

Mr. HAMLIN. If the Senator will allow me to get up the bill, I will suspend action upon it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to taking up the bill named by the Senator from Maine?

Mr. SARGENT. I object to the post-route bill, for the reason that there is not money enough to put it into operation. It would be a mere farce to pass another post-route bill without money enough under the general appropriation to put on a single route under it.

Mr. HAMLIN. I can give the Senator information which he has not got.

Mr. SARGENT. I have studied the matter carefully as a member of the Committee on Appropriations, and I assert boldly that if the Post-Office Department acts upon the previous post-route bill, and puts the service on under that act, there will not be a dollar left to carry out the service to be established by this bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. I tell the Senator there are $500,000 appropriated to meet this very case, and the money is there. The appropriations were made in gross by the Senate. As the bill came back from the committee of conference it appropriated a certain amount for what are called "star" bids, to wit, coach service, a certain amount for steamboat service, and a certain amount for railroads. Consequently the amount which is appropriated for railroads can only be used for railroad purposes. The amount passed by the House exceeds the estimates of the Department by about $500,000 for this branch of the service.

Mr. SARGENT. I have no doubt for this branch of the service; but we have already passed a bill of nearly a hundred pages making new post-routes. Here it is proposed to have another; and I still assert, after what the Senator has said, that from my examination of the matter I know there is not a dollar to put in operation any route to be established by this bill and keep up the present service.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to know if the bill has been printed.

Mr. HAMLIN. Long ago.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill has been printed. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Maine to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill is before the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. Let it be passed over for morning business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be laid aside temporarily, if there be no objection, for the reception of morning business.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MERRIMON. On Saturday last I presented the memorial of Samuel Strong and others, citizens of the District of Columbia, in favor of the passage of a bill now before the Committee on the District of Columbia, which provides for adjusting and paying claims unsettled against the District of Columbia. I now present the memorial of Thomas P. Morgan, William H. Groat, Morris Murphy, and others, contractors and creditors of the District, which is a concurrence in the former memorial which I presented. They join anxiously in the prayer for the relief prayed for in the former petition. I move that this additional memorial be also referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. BOGY presented the petition of H. Overstolz, mayor of the city of Saint Louis, Missouri, and Richard Walsh, city register, on behalf of the city of Saint Louis, praying for an appropriation to secure the bank of the Mississippi River opposite that city; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. WALLACE presented resolutions adopted at a meeting of soldiers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, in favor of the passage of a law for the equalization of bounties; which were referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SHERMAN. I present the petition of William Giles Dix, of Peabody, Massachusetts, at his request, praying that Congress may institute proper measures to convene a convention in the city of Philadelphia to modify the Constitution of the United States. I am informed that this gentleman is a respectable citizen of his State. He asks that his petition may be referred to a select committee; but I move that it be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, which is properly charged with the subject.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN. I also present the petition of a number of citizens of Iowa, who make very severe and bitter complaints against the action of Congress and different branches of the Government in regard to what are called the Des Moines River lands. They make charges of a very grave and serious character. I think similar petitions have been presented before and been referred, I think, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The petition will be referred to the Committee on Public Lands, if there be no objection. The Chair hears none.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I am very glad that reference has been made of the petition just presented. A similar petition was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary; and, in order not to have the jurisdiction divided, I move that the Committee on the Judiciary be discharged from the further consideration of the similar petition, and that it be referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania, presented the petition of W. L. Faulk, late captain in the Tenth United States Cavalry, praying the passage of a law authorizing the President to re-appoint him to his former rank and position in the Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. KERNAN, from the Committee on Patents, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 691) for the relief of Edward A. Leland, reported it without amendment and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. CRAGIN, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 667) for the relief of William Wheeler Hubbell, and to make just compensation for the past making, or use, or vending of his patent explosive shell-fuses and percussion-exploders by the United States, reported it with an amendment, the committee adopting the report made by them May 7, 1874.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 776) to restore William J. Montgomery, late first assistant engineer United States Navy, to the active list of the Navy, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. THURMAN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 215) relative to the Santillan grant, a private land claim in the State of California, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of the San Francisco Land Association of Philadelphia, praying that certain records of grants of land in the Mission of Dolores, in and near the city of San Francisco, California, may be admitted in the establishment of their claim to said lands, which they allege to have been wrested from them by virtue of a decree of the United States Supreme Court, because of the absence of such records, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred various communications on the subject, reported a bill (S. No. 983) to extend the duration of the court of Alabama claims; which was read and passed to the second reading.

FORT KEARNEY RESERVATION.

On motion of Mr. HITCHCOCK, it was Ordered, That Senate bill No. 894, to provide for the sale of the Fort Kearney military reservation in the State of Nebraska, be printed as passed.

TROOPS IN SOUTHERN STATES.

Mr. EATON. I offer the following resolution and ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to forthwith report to the Senate the number of United States troops of the various arms of the service now on duty in the States of Louisiana, Mississippi, Arkansas, Alabama, Florida, Georgia, South Carolina, and North Carolina, and, so far as is practicable, giving the location of each regiment, part of regiment, or separate command or detachment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let that go over.

Mr. EATON. I give notice that as soon as practicable, to-morrow, if possible, I will endeavor to get the floor for the consideration of the resolution in order to procure this information previous to action upon the joint resolution offered by the honorable Senator from Nebraska [Mr. PADDOCK] in regard to the volunteers against the Sioux.

AMENDMENT OF IMPEACHMENT RULES.

Mr. CAPERTON. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator rises to move to take up any measure, the Chair will state that if there is no further morning business the post-route bill is before the Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to ask the Senator from Maine, who has charge of the post-route bill, whether he would be willing to lay that aside in order to take up the resolution that I offered on Friday last, about the length of time occupied in arguing questions of the admission of evidence, &c., in the impeachment trial. Of course, if he is not willing, I shall not urge it; but I thought we might save time by acting upon the matter now.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have every disposition in the world to oblige the Senator, but I want to get rid of the post-route bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is no obligation to me; it is only a suggestion which I make about the business before us.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think I shall run my chances for to-morrow morning to take up this bill, if it cannot be reached to-day. Therefore I will consent to let it be temporarily laid aside.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The post-route bill will be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move to take up the resolution about amending the twentieth impeachment rule.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS, July 8:

Ordered, That Rule 20 of the rules for impeachment be so amended that on offers of and objections to evidence and other interlocutory and incidental questions one counsel or manager may open, one counsel or manager be heard in opposition, and one counsel or manager be heard in reply; and that the whole argument on each side shall not exceed thirty minutes without leave of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is upon the amendment of the Senator from New York [Mr. CONKLING] which will be reported.

The CHIEF CLERK. It is proposed at the end of the resolution to insert:

And that consultations by the Senate upon any question shall, unless otherwise ordered, be had without clearing the galleries or closing the doors of the Senate Chamber, subject to the limitations on debate prescribed by the twenty-third rule; and questions may be asked by Senators of witnesses, managers, or counsel without reducing the same to writing.

Mr. KERNAN. Is an amendment to the original resolution now in order as to the length of time allowed?

Mr. EDMUNDS. No, sir. This is an amendment by addition. We must dispose of this first.

Mr. KERNAN. Very well. I was going to suggest a limitation of the time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is altogether too warm to say much, although every debate to-day must be heated; but I submit to the Senate and to my friend from New York [Mr. CONKLING] that his amendment I think would be somewhat disastrous in respect to prolonging the proceedings. As the rules now stand it appears to me, to say nothing of other causes, that we should not retire to consult except on matters that seem to be of considerable importance; and the result would be, as it has been so far on questions of evidence, that they would be decided by the Senate without any debate among Senators, but after hearing the arguments of counsel; and we should therefore get on faster without having that proposition in force. If it were in force, then of course every Senator on every question would be at liberty to occupy ten minutes of time, and I fear that the temptation to express our views would be so great—and I should feel it quite as much as anybody if the subject were open, I have no doubt—that a great deal of time would be occupied in that way.

In the next place, it does not appear to me that, considering what a consultation is and should be, a comparison of views, with liberty to retreat if one has stated an opinion which turns out not to be sound, the object would hardly be answered by a public consultation. Human nature is so constituted that I think we should be much more apt to stick to a false position after we had once publicly made it manifest than we should in a private consultation.

For these reasons I hope that the amendment of my friend from New York will not be adopted.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. It seems to me that the order and the amendment are better omitted than enacted. Since we commenced taking testimony here I do not think we have had any debate in reference to the admissibility of evidence which has occupied an hour. This order is an invitation that it may occupy an hour. I do not think we have had any that occupied half that time.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The present rule gives them an hour on each side, and as many counsel as choose may speak.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. But practically since we have commenced taking testimony we have not had any question debated that occupied an hour, or, I think, more than half an hour. As to the amendment of the Senator from New York, we have not been called upon once since the testimony was commenced to retire. Now, if we make a provision that we shall have a consultation with open doors, we shall, before we know it, run into these debates and time will be consumed.

The other provision of the amendment is a very proper one, that members of the Senate shall be at liberty to ask questions without reducing them to writing. The rule now requires them to be reduced to writing; but practically that rule is not enforced. Therefore I think the best thing we can do in the way of saving time is to do nothing, but let the thing stand as it is.

It does seem to me that this trial ought not to occupy more than four or five days, and would not in an ordinary court. We, as members of the court, ought to give all the aid we can to bring it to a speedy termination.

Mr. MERRIMON. Mr. President, I beg to ask the Senator from Vermont a question about the nature of his resolution. I noticed, if I heard it correctly reported, that it provides that thirty minutes shall be consumed in debating any question arising on evidence, and that counsel on either side may speak. I beg to ask him how that thirty minutes are to be distributed? It does not make provision for that.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Why, Mr. President, exactly in the same way that under a similar rule debate is distributed in the Supreme Court in the adjoining chamber. Each side may use half an hour on an argument of an interlocutory question, instead of an hour as the present rule provides.

Mr. MERRIMON. I thought the resolution provided but thirty minutes for the whole debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. No; thirty minutes on each side. The present rule is an hour on each side. The present rule as hitherto construed by the present occupant of the chair, following the decisions of the Chief Justice in the last impeachment trial, is made to mean that counsel and managers may occupy their whole hour, just as we do in a debate, whenever they can get the floor. There is no beginning and no end; but there is a running debate on all hands on a little simple question, so that the only effect of my proposition is to reduce the time on each side one-half; and then to say that one person shall be heard on one side in support of the objection that is made or in support of the offer made, and one person against it, and one person in reply, and there it ends.

Mr. MERRIMON. I want to add one word. I concur in the proposed amendment of the Senator from New York. I believe that a brief debate in open session here might very often elucidate a question that the Senate would otherwise act upon sometimes very hurriedly. I think with a brief debate the other day I should have given a different vote on one point raised than I did. I do not feel exactly satisfied about it now. It was a vote against the defense.

The Senator from New Jersey says that in an ordinary court this case ought to be disposed of in five or six days. I have no doubt it could be; but he ought to remember that it is a great state trial and this is not an ordinary court. It is a trial that ought to be proceeded with very cautiously. There ought to be great deliberation about everything. It is to be a high precedent in the face of the nation and the world, and I think we ought to proceed quietly and cautiously, and deliberate about every point that is at all of importance, and I think it ought to be done in public. Therefore, I trust that the amendment of the Senator from New York will prevail.

Mr. MORTON. I think the time fixed by the Senator from New York is twice as much as it ought to be. Fifteen minutes on a side are enough, sufficient I think to enable this court to understand a point without elaborate argument. I think the rule in regard to the admission of testimony is very liberal, and there is not any great danger of this court being misled by the admission of any improper testimony.

Mr. SHERMAN. I agree entirely with what the Senator from New Jersey says, that this is time wasted. I believe the good sense of the managers and counsel on any question that is likely to arise in this case will not allow them to consume much time. Therefore, if no other Senator desires to speak on it, I move that the resolution and amendment be laid on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I want to say a word.

Mr. SHERMAN. I withdraw the motion, expressing my opinion that the better way is to do nothing.

Mr. CONKLING. If there was nothing before the Senate except the original resolution of the Senator from Vermont, I think I could vote with the Senator from Ohio to lay it on the table, for really I have seen no occasion for any rule abbreviating the opportunities of counsel or managers in the argument of any interlocutory question. I think the Senator from New Jersey was within bounds when he said that not half an hour had yet been occupied on an interlocutory question, and if my recollection is right, if you except one instance in which there was a colloquy about various things which may all be deemed to have pertained to one single interlocutory question, I do not think that anything like half an hour has been occupied; and therefore it seems to me it is hardly worth while for us, in anticipation of an evil which has not arisen, to shorten the rule in that respect.

But there are two other things in regard to this resolution, and I begin with the last. We violate systematically the rule in reference to putting questions. I do it and everybody does it with constraint, feeling that he should not do it. The Senator from Ohio awkwardly, as far as I can say he ever does anything awkwardly, tries to put a question and he says, "Mr. President, through the Chair, if that is the way to do it." Sure enough, "if that is the way to do it;" the Senator does not know; nobody knows. He can sit down and write out a question, and as I understand the rule that question must be addressed to the witness. If the Senator wants a manager to read a paper, if he wants to make an inquiry of any sort, there is no way under the rule in which he can get at it, feeling de trop, he inquires through the Chair. I think it is worth while to spend a moment in obviating that and allowing every Senator to put a simple question to enlighten himself and save time, without the necessity of putting it in writing.

Now, as to the matter of consultations, the Senator from Vermont does not understand my amendment as I do; else he would not say that it would authorize every Senator all the time to express his opinions. If that is what it means, I was unfortunate in draughting it. The amendment says that consultations, when they do take place, may be without clearing the galleries unless the Senate order them to be cleared; and it did not occur to me that the effect of that was to be to multiply consultations; but it occurred to me that it would have two effects, both of which are good, I think. I appeal to the RECORD, if it is noted there, to show, as I am confident it will show, that every time the Senate has retired or cleared the galleries upon the most insignificant question, if it be the question of an adjourned day, hours have elapsed before that decision was announced; when, had it been in open session, I do not believe, on one occasion particularly, one-fifth of the time would have been consumed. Now, I think that is an evil. I think it is a great mistake to turn out all the visitors in these galleries in order that the Senate may have what in open session would be a few moments' consultation, or that the Senate should retire to the Marble Room and there engage in that sort of consultation or conversation which has occurred heretofore. I think time would be saved by doing it just as we sit in our seats.

But again, I think it is wholesome and proper that the people of this country should understand what takes place upon this trial. If I do not regard its dimensions as great as those ascribed to it by the honorable Senator from North Carolina, I do remember that it is a trial before the Senate of the United States; and, if it is fit to be here, it is fit to be conducted decently and in order; and enough consequence attends it to make it a matter of interest to the people of the country, of as much interest as a great deal of the other business that transpires in the Senate. It has been made the occasion to discuss the question whether all citizens at large are impeachable and triable before this tribunal; and that question, which is one of dimensions as large as those referred to by the Senator from North Carolina, has been discussed by the Senate locked up in this iron box; and I judge from headings that I see in the RECORD that some members of the body have published "opinions," as they are called, upon that question. Senators who wrote or have been able to write since have published what they said, or what it is to be supposed they said, or what they supposed they ought to have said, or, as my friend from Illinois [Mr. LOGAN] suggests what they intended to say, or, as I will add, what they have thought since they intended to say. Some one of these forms of expression applies to what appears in the RECORD. Other Senators who expressing such opinions as they had at the time, and expressing them as they express opinions in debate, expressed opinions which were writ in water because they could not have the advantage of a stenographer or scribe to preserve even in substance what they said; and this is one of the inequalities, I think I may call it, (for, although every Senator has had as much time as every other Senator, every Senator does not have the gifts of his fellows or the facility of expressing himself clearly upon paper,) this is one of the inequalities which have grown out of the present condition of things. I think it has been a loss to the country. I think I see Senators around me now whose expressions on this subject have not appeared, and I imagine, will not appear in the RECORD, which expressions were valuable, and would be valued, and ought to have been produced, and ought to have been heard openly.

Now, Mr. President, I do not know how much of any serious question remains in this trial, whether a question of law or a question of fact; but whatever there may be, I submit that unless the Senate sees occasion at the time to direct that a consultation be secret, we might go on and express our opinions upon the remaining questions in this case. That is the purpose of my amendment, and its purpose is not at all, as suggested, to require consultations where they would not be required otherwise, to multiply them, nor even to deprive the Senate of the power, when it chooses to say so, of deciding that a consultation shall be secret; but it is to prevent the necessity on all occasions of having the Senate fly to a place of safety or seclusion, or unpeople the galleries here when they proceed to determine a question whether a certain thing shall be done on one day or another, or whether a piece of evidence is admissible or not, or whether some other incident in the trial shall occur or whether it shall be admitted or forbidden.

If the motion prevails to lay the original resolution on the table, of course I shall not feel at liberty to persevere in the amendment that I have offered; but if we consider it at all, I hope the Senate will consider the two subjects together.

J. T. KING AND L. B. CUTLER.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler, with an amendment; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. I ask unanimous consent to use up one minute of the time of the Senate in concurring with an amendment of the House to the bill just returned from the House of Representatives.

There being no objection, the President pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler.

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. The House has stricken out the proviso, and I move that the Senate concur.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear it read,

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment of the House will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The amendment of the House is to strike out the words:

Provided, That a further sum equal to the amount of the previous regular compensation of the said King and the said Cutler from the 19th day of May to the 30th day of June, inclusive, is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended immediately by the Secretary of the Interior in manner as aforesaid.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much does this bill give as it stands?

Mr. MORRILL, of Vermont. Three thousand dollars.

The amendment was concurred in.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I wish to make an explanation that affects some other gentleman as well as myself. A week or ten days ago, when I was about going home, I went to the Senator from Georgia [Mr. GORDON] and asked him to pair with me during my absence. He very graciously consented to do so, and said that he would then go home, and we paired. After I got to my home, I remembered that some days before the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] had called upon me and asked me to pair with him, and the moment that occurred to me I wrote a note to the Senator from Georgia stating the fact; but he had left the city of Washington and it was too late, and I put him in a wrong position which I desire to amend as much as I can. I regret very much that the lapse of my memory made me do wrong to him or to anybody else; but I want to state distinctly that the pair was made at my solicitation with the Senator from Georgia for my benefit, as I was not well.

ANDREW EVARTS.

Mr. ALLISON. The Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 897) granting a pension to Andrew Evarts, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. I ask that the bill be considered now. I think there will be no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (S. No. 897) granting a pension to Andrew Evarts was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place on the pension-roll, subject to the provisions and limitations of the pension laws, the name of Andrew Evarts, private in Company B, Fourth Ohio Volunteers, at the rate of $8 per month.

The Committee on Pensions reported the bill with an amendment, which was to add at the close of the bill the words "from and after the passage of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

AMENDMENT OF IMPEACHMENT RULES.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, let us have the regular order.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the resolution submitted by Mr. EDMUNDS on the 8th instant, the question being on the amendment offered by Mr. CONKLING.

Mr. CONKLING. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] on Saturday expressed his opinion that it would be proper to suspend for a moment the court proceedings in order to receive a message from the House. I understand that to-day shortly after twelve o'clock, or after the court goes into session, there will probably be a ten-day bill from the House, and it will be necessary to receive that and act upon it, as it is the last day when the existing legislation reaches. I will ask that there may be an understanding that that message from the House may be received.

Mr. CONKLING. The court can take a recess for a moment and the Senate can go into legistative session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be subject to the order of the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not like to consume the time of the Senate, and yet I want to say a word in relation to the amendment that has been presented by the Senator from New York. I think if the Senate are wise they will adopt the amendment. I think the experience that we have already had in the progress of this trial ought to convince us all that our discussions, be they what they may, should be in public and not in secret. On Saturday we had a very large volume of the RECORD containing the opinions of the several Senators who had seen fit to prepare their opinions for publication. I have nothing to say about that. I did not participate in the debate; but I suppose I may say that the RECORD itself shows that in all that publication the interlocutory proceedings do not appear, which are quite as important in a proper estimate and quite as important in coming to a sound conclusion upon the questions there discussed as the abstract opinions are. I think if we had all of that debate it would be useful to the country, and would throw quite as much light upon the decision at which we arrived as the opinions which have been published.

I know the Senator from Vermont has told us, and I think he has repeated it certainly on one or two occasions, and there is much in it, that in an open debate one is not as willing to yield an opinion once expressed as he is in a consultation. While I may not refer to what took place in secret session, I think I may appeal to Senators to say that of all consultations it was the queerest that man ever beheld. It was as earnest, as determined, as positive a debate as ever took place in this body.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not think you ought to say that.

Mr. HAMLIN. The Senator says I ought not to say it, and I will take it all back. [Laughter.] I will then say that I ask Senators to recall to their minds what was the character of the debate that there took place, and I ask them in all candor if in a public debate anything would be said or done by any Senator from which he could not and would not as readily withdraw an opinion expressed as he did or would in the debate as it did take place? I think, therefore, that the experience of the body negatives entirely the suggestion of the Senator from Vermont, a suggestion which I thought had a good deal in it, and which, had the consultation been what I supposed a consultation would be, certainly would have been correct; but I can say, I think without violating any rule, that the consultation differed entirely from what I supposed it would be.

Again, I think it is not in accordance with the genius and spirit of the Government or the times that our discussion should be here in secret upon this matter. What is the question submitted to us for our consideration I know not and I care not; but we are called upon to decide it, and we decide it not only for ourselves but for the public as well; and why is it that that discussion which is to instruct or enlighten us in our judgment in the conclusion which we shall arrive at in a private consultation should not be made public for the instruction of the whole world? In other words, they may know truly what are the reasons which influence our judgment upon every question that is presented to us.

I do not recollect the precise phraseology of the amendment submitted by the Senator from New York, but I would make this suggestion that our consultations be here in open Senate, and I would not object to this qualification, "unless the Senate should otherwise order."

Mr. CONKLING. That is the way it is in my amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then it meets my idea precisely. If, then, there be that which in the judgment of Senators should not be discussed publicly—and I am one who can see no such question—the rule will not be in force and we may hold a private consultation.

As to the consumption of time upon these interlocutory questions, the Senator from New Jersey has overstated it by more than half. I do not call to mind a single question that has occupied fifteen minutes, and I am sure the questions have not averaged ten minutes, and I do not, therefore, in the light of economy of time see any reason why each question should not be discussed in open Senate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I want to ask, as this debate has got to go on a while longer, that the Chair will lay before the Senate a House bill which I understand is now here and which ought to be referred.

Mr. CONKLING. Let this be disposed of. I insist on the regular order; I want a vote on this question.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then, Mr. President, I have a word to say. I was in hopes my friend from New York would allow that bill to be referred.

Mr. CONKLING. We have allowed so many things to be done that I think we ought to have a vote on this.

Mr. EDMUNDS. You ought to treat us all alike.

Mr. CONKLING. My honorable friend demanded the regular order himself. I am only following him. I want to vote on this question. We can do it as soon now as ever.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I will not bandy words with my friend from New York about demanding the regular order, because he has a perfect right to do it, and whatever anybody has a right to do he ought not to be complained about for doing.

I want to say one word in reply to the Senator from Maine. I do not feel at liberty, as the Senator from Maine did, to make any reference to either the character or nature of any discussions that have taken place when the doors have been closed or when the Senate has withdrawn. I supposed that, like the proceedings of an executive session, they were not to be made use of either directly or indirectly. So much for that.

Now, Mr. President, the Senator urges this amendment of the Senator from New York, as the Senator from New York does, upon the ground that the American people have a right to know the views and opinions of Senators. So they have. They have a right to know the views and opinions of all the judges of the United States courts when they are acting officially; they have a right to know the views and opinions of grand jurors and of petit jurors; but they have a right to know them all in the methods that human experience has shown to be most perfect for the security of purity in administration and orderly and seemly procedure in administering justice and in carrying on public affairs; and therefore there is the same force in the argument of the two Senators who have addressed you in support of this amendment to be applied to requiring the consultations of a jury or the consultations of judges, after they have heard a point argued before them, to be stated in the hearing of the audience and of the counsel, that there is in requiring this, as it appears to me. What the American people have a right to know, and what everybody else has a right to know, is the opinion of the court which acts as a body, and where there is a difference of opinion they have a right to find it out and do find it out by dissenting opinions being filed just as in the case that has already taken place before the Senate. The American people do know what the judgment of the Senate was, because that was given in a public vote, and if in a private vote it was made public by us. They do know what were the views of Senators who chose to reduce them to writing and have them published according to the order of the Senate. How many Senators were convinced either way, if any, is a matter that they have no right to know any more than they have to know how many jurors in a given case where the jury are out for five, or six, or twelve hours, or six days, were brought over from one side to the other by the reason that their fellow-jurors gave. So in the case of a court, the public has no right to know how many of the judges, when the case is first stated in the consultation-room, lean to one side or the other and finally conclude that the side they did not lean to is after all the true one and afterward vote accordingly, and the judgment is so announced.

So it does seem to me, being as brief as possible in order to let this be voted on, that we, instead of securing a fundamental principle of public propriety, are violating one in opening the doors of the Senate to what are truly and really, no matter how much warmth there may be about them, consultations of judges in arriving at a conclusion, which, so far as the tribunal goes, is the conclusion of the body upon points that are presented.

But, Mr. President, I will not take any more time, for the reason that the hour is almost up, and I do not want to prevent a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from New York, [Mr. CONKLING,] upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. MORTON. It seems to me that the amendment offered by the Senator from New York is a little too broad. The theory is that this is a court for the trial of impeachments, and the proposition is that when we are called upon to make up our opinions about a given question we are to consult in public.

Mr. CONKLING. Unless we choose to consult in private.

Mr. MORTON. I do not know of any court composed of more than one judge that holds its consultations in public. The judges announce their opinions in public when they agree; but when they consult together about making up their opinions that is a private matter, and the public is not interested in that. So far as we are a court, I think our consultations should be in private ordinarily. The public is not interested.

Mr. CONKLING. That is just what the amendment provides we may do.

Mr. STEVENSON. Is the question susceptible of division, or will the Senator from New York modify his proposition so that questions may be put in writing?

Mr. CONKLING. The rule is habitually disregarded now. Not one question has been so put in writing. A Senator rises and says "I want to put through the Chair, if it may be allowed, this question; is that a letter from so and so?" Suppose he stops to write that down. The rule requires that. The only way we proceed conveniently now is by a disregard of the rule. I do not care anything about that part of it. If my honorable friend from Kentucky wants to sit down every time that he desires to know the date of a paper and cut himself off from the privilege of just inquiring from his seat "what is the date of that paper," very well; it is a mere matter of convenience, and I do not insist upon it.

Mr. STEVENSON. I have never put a question myself since the trial has been going on. I have, therefore, no personal solicitude in it. I favor this proposition so far as open sessions go. It occurred to me, however, that if you allow every sort of question to be put without being reduced to writing we might get into a difficulty. That was my only reason for making the suggestion.

Mr. CONKLING. It is allowed now, practically, in disregard of the rule.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. What became of the motion to lay the resolution on the table?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was withdrawn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I did not renew it, because I did not wish to cut off debate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. I renew that motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Jersey moves to lay the resolution and amendment on the table.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg to appeal to the honorable Senator from New Jersey. It will require no longer to take the yeas and nays upon this amendment than upon the other question.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Very well; I withdraw the motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The roll-call will proceed on the amendment offered by the Senator from New York.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Boutwell, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Ferry, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Kernan, Logan, McMillan, Merrimon, Paddock, Patterson Ransom, Stevenson, Wallace, West, and Windom—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Cockrell, Cooper, Edmunds, Frelinghuysen, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Kelly, Key, McCreery, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Robertson, Sargent, Sherman, Withers, and Wright—24.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the resolution.

Mr. KERNAN. I move to amend by inserting "fifteen" instead of "thirty" minutes.

The amendment was agreed to; there being on a division—yeas 27, nays 13.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the resolution of the Senator from Vermont as amended.

Mr. MCMILLAN. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 16; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anthony, Boutwell, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Cockrell, Davis, Edmunds, Ferry, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Kelly, Kernan, Logan, McDonald, Morrill of Vermont, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Robertson, Sargent, Wallace, and Withers—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Booth, Conkling Cooper, Frelinghuysen, Ingalls, Key, McCreery, McMillan, Merrimon, Sherman, Stevenson, West, Windom, and Wright—16.

NOT VOTING—Messrs. Alcorn, Allison, Barnum, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Christiancy, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Dorsey, Eaton, Goldthwaite, Howe, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill of Maine, Norwood, Oglesby, Randolph, Saulsbury, Sharon, Spencer, Thurman, Wadleigh, and Whyte—37.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. MITCHELL. I move to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senator from New York was defeated.

Mr. CONKLING. On that motion I beg to say a word. I learn that several Senators, who were in favor of allowing the Senate to consider questions openly in place of considering them privily, of putting it in the hands of the Senate to say whether consultations should be open or secret, were deterred from voting for the amendment because of the latter clause which permitted questions to be put without their being reduced to writing. If the vote is reconsidered, as I hope it will be, I will withdraw the latter part of the amendment, so as to take the sense of the Senate upon the simple question whether the Senate may be permitted, if it chooses, to deliberate openly and not privately.

Mr. SARGENT. I rise to a point of order. The resolution, as amended, has been passed on the yeas and nays, and I understand it was carried—the Chair will inform me if I am mistaken—by a vote of nearly two to one, 26 to 16. It is not in order to move to reconsider a vote upon an amendment prior to that vote which passed the resolution itself.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution has passed, as stated by the Senator from California, and the Chair sustains the point of order raised by the Senator from California.

Mr. HAMLIN. I voted with the majority. I move to reconsider the vote adopting the resolution. That will give us a chance to get at the other.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is in order now to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

IMPEACHMENT OF WILLIAM W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

During the proceedings of the trial Mr. SARGENT said: I move that the court take a recess until further order, that we may receive a message from the House of Representatives and act upon it.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. GEORGE M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3858) to continue the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government;" in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

TEMPORARY PROVISION FOR EXPENDITURES.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the bill just received from the other House be taken up and read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none; and the Secretary will report the bill.

The Chief Clerk read the bill at length.

Mr. SARGENT. I ask that the bill may be put upon its passage.

By unanimous consent, the bill was read twice and considered as in Committee of the Whole. It extends the provisions of the act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government, approved June 30, 1876, and continues that act in full force and effect for the period of ten days from and after the 10th day of July, 1876, and no longer.

Mr. ANTHONY. I understand that this bill continues the precise act that we passed ten days ago.

Mr. SARGENT. For ten days longer.

Mr. ANTHONY. It was the opinion of some of the legal Senators that that bill did not cover the public printing, and a separate act was introduced to continue that branch of the service. I should like to know whether this act covers the public printing.

Mr. SARGENT. The Senate afterward modified the former general act, to which the Senator refers, by making it unquestionably cover the public printing. The act with reference to public printing was introduced at a time when it was supposed the general act would not cover that branch of the public service; but the general act has been modified so as to cover it.

Mr. ANTHONY. I only wished to call the attention of the Senate to the fact.

Mr. SARGENT. I think this act will cover it.

Mr. ANTHONY. Then there will be no necessity for passing the other bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. CONKLING. Now, let us go on with the court.

Mr. SARGENT. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from California asks that the recess close. The Chair hears no objection, and it is closed. The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment resumes its session.

The trial was further interrupted to receive the following:

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following bills; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

A bill (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of Jonathan White;

A bill (H. R. No. 1427) for the relief of H. P. Jones & Co.;

A bill (H. R. No. 1479) granting a pension to Dalton Hinchman;

A bill (H. R. No. 2472) granting a pension to John Frey;

A bill (H. R. No. 2768) granting a pension to Juliett A. Hendrickson, widow of William L. Hendrickson, late private Company E, Twenty-eighth Regiment Illinois Infantry Volunteers;

The message also announced that the House had passed the bill (S. No. 627) making an appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.

The message further announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin; insisted upon its amendment to the second amendment of the Senate to the said resolution disagreed to by the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HENRY B. PAYNE of Ohio, Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, and Mr. FRANKLIN LANDERS of Indiana, managers at the conference on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 3858) to continue the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenses of the Government;" and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, asked a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. OTHO R. SINGLETON of Mississippi, Mr. WILLIAM M. SPRINGER of Illinois, and Mr. JAMES MONROE of Ohio managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 3884) to continue the act entitled "An act to continue the public printing;" in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

THE PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. SARGENT. It seems that the House is of a different opinion from myself in reference to the general law covering the matter of public printing, and have passed a bill which is sent to us to cover the public printing. I do not wish it to rest on my judgment alone, but I ask that the Senate act upon that bill—it will take but a moment to pass it—so that it can be signed to-day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

By unanimous consent, the bill (H. R. No. 3884) to continue the act entitled "An act to continue the public printing" was read three times, and passed. It provides that the provisions of the act to continue the public printing approved June 30, 1876, be extended and continued in full force and effect for a period of ten days from and after the 10th day of July, 1876, and no longer.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment then resumed its session.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. HOWE. I ask the Senator to withdraw that motion a moment, if he will. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners.

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. I think we had better have an executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania insist on his motion?

Mr. CAMERON, of Pennsylvania. Yes, sir.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

The Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After twenty minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at five o'clock and ten minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, July 10, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Saturday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

TEMPORARY APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent of the House, before proceeding with the call of States in the morning hour, to report from the Committee on Appropriations a bill (H. R. No. 3858) to continue the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

The bill was received and read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides that the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government," approved June 30, 1876, be extended and continued in full force and effect for a period of ten days from and after the 10th day of July 1876, and no longer.

Mr. RANDALL. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered, and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PRINTING FOR WAYS AND MEANS COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRISON. I ask unanimous consent to submit from the Committee of Ways and Means the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be authorized to have printed any documents for the use of said committee that they may deem necessary in connection with subjects being considered by said committee.

Mr. KASSON. That is rather broad. Cannot the gentleman limit it by naming the objects in reference to which he wishes documents printed?

Mr. MORRISON. I do not understand the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. KASSON. Cannot that be limited to some class of subjects. It seems to me to authorize the printing of almost anything, investigations or anything else.

Mr. MORRISON. It provides for the printing of necessary documents in connection with subjects now being considered by the Committee of Ways and Means, which I think is entirely proper.

Mr. KASSON. It seems to me that is rather too broad. We ought to know exactly what printing it provides for. Let the gentleman limit it to any class of subjects, so the House may be advised what is proposed to be printed.

Mr. DUNNELL. Let the resolution be again read.

The resolution was again read.

Mr. KASSON. I must object to that in its present broad terms. It will authorize the printing of almost anything.

Mr. MORRISON. I am willing to insert the words "in relation to the revenue," if that will please the gentleman.

Mr. KASSON. Anything in relation to the revenue, I have no objection to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the resolution as modified?

There was no objection, and the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. MORRISON moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY EXPEDITION AGAINST THE INDIANS.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to submit for adoption now the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, directed to report to the House the object of the military expeditions under Generals Crook and Terry now operating against the Northwest Indians and the circumstances leading to their necessity, with copies of all correspondence bearing upon the origin of the expedition; also copies of all military orders issued by the War Department directing these expeditions under Generals Terry, Crook, and Gibbon.

Mr. HURLBUT. I should like to amend the resolution offered by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs by inserting also the expedition under General Gibbon.

Mr. BANNING. I have no objection to that amendment or to naming all the commanders of expeditions, Terry, Crook, and Gibbon.

Mr. HURLBUT. There are three expeditions now operating, one under General Terry, one under General Crook, and another under General Gibbon, and we want information in reference to all of them.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the resolution as modified.

There was no objection; and the resolution, as modified, was adopted.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BANNING. Mr. Speaker, I hold in my hand an official document showing the present distribution of the troops of the United States, showing the number under General Crook's command to be only 1,790 men; the number under General Terry's command to be only 1,123; the number in the Territories to be 7,930; the number in the Southern States, excluding Texas, to be 3,334; the number in Texas to be 3,718; in short, an accurate statement of the distribution of United States troops at the present time; and as there is an uneasiness in the public mind, many wanting to know exactly the location of the troops, I move, if there be no objection, that the paper be printed for the information of the House in the RECORD, and also as a document of the House.

Mr. COX. At what date?

Mr. BANNING. Last Saturday. And shows we have enough troops, if they are property distributed, to conquer the Indians against whom we have sent a very small force.

Mr. HURLBUT. Is it official?

Mr. BANNING. Yes, sir; official, and bears date last Saturday.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the printing of the document in the RECORD and also as a House document?

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

The document is as follows:

THOMAS M. VINCENT,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
July 8, 1876.

PRIVATE BILLS PASSED.

Mr. TERRY. Before going on with the morning hour I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the bills which were reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar last Saturday and which are now on the Speaker's table on their passage be taken up and passed. It will take but a very short time, as the bills were passed in committee without objection, Saturday having been made objection day in the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. REAGAN. I do not object if it does not interfere with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman object?

Mr. REAGAN. I object if it interferes with the morning hour. But if we are to have the morning hour, then I do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It will not do away with the morning hour if these bills are taken up and passed at this time.

Mr. REAGAN. If it does not interfere with the morning hour of course I do not object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the Chair understand the gentleman as waiving his objection?

Mr. REAGAN. I do waive my objection if it does not interfere with the morning hour.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour will only be postponed to a later period of the day.

Mr. HOLMAN. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TERRY] asks by unanimous consent that bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar last Saturday be taken up and passed.

Mr. TUFTS. I object until after the morning hour.

Mr. TERRY. It will not interfere with the morning hour, and I hope the gentleman will withdraw his objection.

Mr. TUFTS. I withdraw my objection.

The following House bills, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that they do pass without amendment, were taken from the Speaker's table, severally read a first and second time, ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 629) for the relief of Jonathan White;

A bill (H. R. No. 3490) for the relief of James W. Love, postmaster at Patriot, Indiana;

A bill (H. R. No. 3503) for the relief of Philip Rohr, of Virginia, for tobacco seized for use of the Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3504) for the relief of Thomas Day, of Indiana.

The following House bills reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that they do pass with amendments, were taken up, the amendments concurred in, and the bills, as amended, severally ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, they were accordingly read the third time, and passed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1427) for the relief of H. P. Jones & Co.; and

A bill (H. R. No. 2894) for the relief of J. E. Pankey, of Fulton County, Kentucky.

The following Senate bill, reported from the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar, with the recommendation that it do pass, was also taken up and ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed:

An act (S. No. 627) making appropriation to pay the claim of Butler, Miller & Co.

Mr. WALLING moved to reconsider the votes just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MANNING M. KIMMELL.

Mr. HATCHER. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a bill (H. R. No. 3859) to remove the political disabilities of Manning M. Kimmell, late of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri, and to put it on its passage at this time. It is accompanied by a petition requesting the removal of his disabilities.

There was no objection, and the bill was read a first and second time.

The bill, which was read, provides (two-thirds of each House concurring therein) that the political disabilities imposed upon Manning M. Kimmell, late of Cape Girardeau County, Missouri, by the fourteenth amendment of the Constitution of the United States by reason of participation in the late rebellion, be removed.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed; two-thirds voting in favor thereof.

Mr. HATCHER moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION.

Mr. FAULKNER. I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee on Foreign Affairs in reference to a matter I think ought to be considered at once. I send up a preamble and resolution which I ask the Clerk to read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas there are now in California and the adjacent Pacific States about one hundred thousand Chinese and other persons of the Mongolian race; and whereas the said population is increasing at the rate of from eight hundred to one thousand a week; and whereas it is estimated that 90 per cent. of said immigration consists of coolies, peons, or persons held in like condition of service or temporary bondage, having no sympathy and seeking no association with the political, social, or Christian elements of said States; and whereas it is asserted that the introduction of this large and rapidly increasing immiscible population has tended to produce demoralization, to disturb the natural functions of labor, and has proved injurious to the States in which it is found; and whereas it is believed by many persons that this class of immigration was not contemplated by the spirit of our Constitution nor by the policy of our early legislation, and, in any view, that it is of such doubtful expediency that it should not be encouraged or stimulated by treaty obligations. With a view, therefore, of throwing light upon the important and interesting questions here involved—

Resolved, That a committee of five members of this House be appointed to examine into the questions here presented, with full powers in the premises, and that the same are hereby instructed to report to this House at its next session.

Also resolved, That said committee shall have authority to employ a stenographer, and to send for persons and papers.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. SEELYE. I do not object, if the preamble states that it is alleged that such and such difficulties have occurred. If the preamble states facts, and if the facts be as stated, the commission is a work of supererogation.

Mr. FAULKNER. The preamble uses the language "it is estimated," "it is asserted," "it is believed."

Mr. SEELYE. I desire to have that distinctly expressed.

Mr. HURLBUT. I object to any special commission for that purpose, but am quite willing that the Committee on Foreign Affairs shall take charge of this matter. We are loaded down now with special committees, and I think this should be intrusted to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, whose duty it is to take charge of it.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I object to the present consideration of the resolution.

SETTLERS UPON CERTAIN LANDS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. STRAIT. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table and have put upon its passage at this time the bill (S. No. 547) for the relief of settlers upon certain lands in the State of Minnesota.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of this bill at this time?

Mr. HOLMAN. Let the bill be read.

The bill was read.

Mr. HOLMAN. Withholding my objection for the moment, if I may be permitted to do so, I wish to say that I have no objection to this bill provided the grant to this road may be declared forfeited by the bill itself. I propose to add the following words:

And the grant of lands heretofore made to the said company is hereby annulled.

Mr. STRAIT. I must decline to accept that amendment.

Mr. HOLMAN. Then I object.

FUNERAL OF THE LATE HON. EDWARD Y. PARSONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. HARTZELL.] appointed on the committee of seven to take order for superintending the funeral of the late Hon. EDWARD Y. PARSONS, being detained at home by reason of sickness in his family, the Chair has appointed in his place the gentleman from Kentucky, Mr. WHITE.

SILVER COIN BILL.

COUNTERFEITING OF TRADE-MARK GOODS, ETC.

Mr. COX. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill to punish the counterfeiting of trade-mark goods and the sale or dealing in of counterfeit trade-mark goods; and I shall ask to put it upon its passage. I will say to the House that this bill was very thoroughly considered in the Senate by the Committee on the Judiciary of that body, and that our Committee on the Judiciary will hardly have time to report upon it at this session. Such Senators as Mr. CONKLING and Mr. THURMAN have thoroughly considered it. Its object is to protect honest merchants and manufacturers. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to its consideration.

The Clerk began the reading of the bill, but before concluding,

Mr. COX said: I will not ask that the time of the House be taken up by the reading of this bill at length, but will ask that it be referred to the Committee on Patents, with leave to report it back at any time.

No objection being made, the bill (S. No. 846) was accordingly taken from the Speaker's table, read a first and second time, and referred to the Committee on Patents, with leave to report at any time.

SALE OF GOODS IN CENTENNIAL EXHIBITION.

Mr. MORRISON, by unanimous consent, reported from the Committee of Ways and Means a joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876; which was read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the joint resolution to be engrossed and read a third time.

The joint resolution provides that the act approved June 18, 1874, entitled "An act to admit free of duty articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876," shall be amended so as to permit the sale and delivery during the exposition of goods, wares, and merchandise heretofore imported and now in the exhibition building, subject to such regulations for the security of the revenue and the collection of duties thereon as the Secretary of the Treasury may in his discretion prescribe; that the entire stock of each exhibitor, consisting of the goods, wares, and merchandise imported by him, and now in said buildings, shall be liable for the payment of duties accruing on any portion thereof, in case of the removal of such portion from said buildings without payment of the lawful duties thereon; and that the penalties prescribed by and the provisions contained in section 3082 of the Revised Statutes shall apply in the case of any goods, wares, or merchandise now in said buildings, sold, delivered, or removed without payment of duties, in the same manner as if the goods, wares, or merchandise had been imported contrary to law, and the article or articles so sold or delivered or removed shall be deemed and held to have been so imported with the knowledge of the parties respectively concerned in such sale, delivery, or removal.

The joint resolution was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SINGLETON submitted the following report, which was read by the Clerk:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 1594) making appropriations for the consular and diplomatic service of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, having met, after full and free conference have been unable to agree.

O. R. SINGLETON,
SAM. J. RANDALL,
CHAS. FOSTER,
Managers on the part of the House.

A. A. SARGENT,
FRED. T. FRELINGHUYSEN,
R. E. WITHERS,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am instructed to ask the House further to insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate and to request another conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

I will not detain the House by a lengthy speech, but it is proper that I should make a few remarks in reference to the grounds of disagreement between the two Houses. It will be remembered that at an early day of this session this bill was passed by the House after a very thorough consideration and honest investigation on the part of the Committee on Appropriations, and I believe there were but one or two dissenting votes on its final passage. Some objections were made to the bill, it is true, by members on the other side of the House, while it was being considered; but when the vote came to be taken upon its passage there were but one or two recorded against it.

The bill was at once sent to the Senate for its action, and from the course pursued it does appear to me, without intending any reflection upon that body to any extent whatever, that it did not show that courtesy in dealing with it which was due to this House. It will be found upon examination of the bill that, although they now admit in conference that large reductions may be properly made in this branch of the public service, yet when it came to be considered in the Senate that body struck out every proposed reduction made by the House and made but two amendments themselves, proposing reductions amounting, I believe, to but a few hundred dollars. One was the striking out of the House bill an allowance made to the amanuensis of Mr. Schenck while minister to England. At the time the bill was framed in the committee and passed by the House Schenck had not resigned his place as minister and having but one arm an amanuensis was indispensable; but by the time the bill came to be considered in the Senate his resignation had been tendered and accepted, and the Senate very properly struck out the provision for his amanuensis. The other proposed reduction by the Senate was the striking out the salary of a clerk whose services could be dispensed with amounting to $600. Those were the only amendments which the Senate proposed to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill in the way of reducing expenditures. They restored every salary of every minister and all the consuls to old figures, and where we had proposed to dispense with consuls they re-instated the whole of them and sent the bill back to the House in that form.

It must be manifest to every fair-minded man that if the Senate had been disposed to consider in a proper spirit the question of retrenchment and reform in this service, they could have found some merit in the work of this House, and could then, as they now propose to do, have made some important changes looking to reform. But their wholesale rejection of our work manifests a determination to antagonize this House at every point. It has been asserted, and I believe it has never been disputed, that when this bill first went over to the Senate they determined to restore all the provisions contained in the corresponding bill of last year. Be that as it may, the result of their action shows that they were not willing to allow any retrenchment whatever, although when we come into conference with them now they admit that much can be done in that way.

The first committee of conference met, and I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] will bear me out in the statement that when the question was distinctly asked of the conferees on the part of the Senate whether they intended to make any point on changes of law proposed by the House, they answered that they did not intend to stand upon that, did not intend to make any fight on that ground.

We then went earnestly to work, and first took up the diplomatic part of the bill, in order to see how near we could get together upon the salaries of our first-class ministers abroad. We very soon found that the conferees on the part of the Senate were not disposed to meet the House, as we believed, in a spirit of proper liberality on that point. It was contended that the salaries of $17,500 were but just and proper and ought not to be changed, while the House conferees stood to the provisions of the House bill. It was at this point that the disagreement took place.

That fact was reported to the House and a new conference was ordered. The Speaker of the House re-appointed the same committee for reasons satisfactory to himself, and the President of the Senate did the same thing, and it turned out to be exactly the old committee. We met again a few days ago, and when we went into session gentlemen may imagine our surprise when the conferees on the part of the Senate receded from the position they had first taken and declared that they never would recognize the right of this House to insert in appropriation bills any changes of existing law for the purpose of reducing salaries unless it suited the Senate to agree thereto. Although they had waived this objection in the first instance, we found that at our next meeting they took that ground to which they now adhere, declaring that under no circumstances whatever will they assent to the principle that this House has a right to change salaries without the consent of the Senate.

Now, in view of all the facts, it does seem very strange that the Senate should think proper to take this position with them. I cannot but regard it as more a matter of punctilio than a contest for any grand prerogative belonging to the Senate, because, sir, the doctrine for which that body now contends has been in times past departed from again and again. New legislation of every description has been incorporated into appropriation bills. Need I name a few instances? Why, sir, the first civil-rights bill passed by Congress was put on to an appropriation bill, although it was not germane to it and had no connection with it whatever, and it was forced through against the wishes of a minority.

More than that, it will be remembered that several years ago the bill of Mr. Orth, of Indiana, changing our whole consular system from beginning to end, making new classifications and re-arranging the salaries of all the consuls, was put upon an appropriation bill and in that form passed through the two Houses of Congress, both branches being then republican; and no objection whatever was made to it. So it has been again and again that changes of existing laws affecting almost every subject of legislation have been made in appropriation bills without protest upon the part of the Senate.

But, sir, all those changes were in the interest of office-holders—to increase salaries, not to reduce them. As long as the movement was in that direction, as long as you were giving to the officers of the Government more than they already received under the existing laws, as long as they were made the recipients of the people's money, not one word of complaint ever came from the Senate. If they are sincere in asserting the prerogatives of the Senate and in contending for the rights and privileges of that body, how does it happen that this is the first time we have heard any complaint of changes of law upon appropriation bills? It is not easily accounted for. At the beginning of this session the Committee on Appropriations understood the difficulties that were in their way. They knew perfectly well that under the construction which had been given to the one hundred and twentieth rule of this House they could not cut down salaries, they could not retrench expenses; that under this rule the only movement which could be made toward changing the law was to increase salaries and enlarge the expenses of the Government. Therefore, at the first meeting, I believe, of the Committee on Appropriations, we considered that matter and proposed to the House that the rule should be so amended as not simply to give us power to increase, but to authorize us to reduce salaries; for under the operation of that rule many of them had gone up to exorbitant amounts. Under that rule the salaries of the minister to Germany and the minister to Russia were both raised from $12,000 to $17,500 upon an appropriation bill. There is no law now which authorizes those officers to receive this amount of salary except a provision tacked on to an appropriation bill. Thus it has been that all the tracks were found going into the giant's cave but none coming out.

The House, seeing the necessity of retrenchment and the difficulty that lay in the way of the Committee on Appropriations, granted at once the request of the committee; and the rule was changed. It was done after debate, gentlemen on the other side of the House opposing it, declaring that the amended rule would throw too much power into the hands of the Committee on Appropriations. Yet the House by a decided majority did change that rule and authorized the committee to report to the House any amendments, being germane and looking to a reduction of expenses, which in their judgment would accomplish the end contemplated. This bill was reported upon that basis; and, after long discussion and mature consideration, it passed this House, reducing the appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service about $450,000. And I here wish it to go to the country as a fact, that there were cast against it only a few votes, one or two, so fully were all satisfied that they could not afford to record their votes in opposition to it.

This difficulty has been sprung upon us at the other end of the Capitol, and Senators seem determined to maintain their position. They cannot consistently do it in the face of their former course. They cannot go before the country and justify themselves in this new assumption of power. They cannot convince plain people that the consequences of their course will not be to throw large amounts of money into the hands of friends to be used as heretofore for electioneering purposes. I do not charge this purpose upon the Senate; but this will be the effect, whether they intend it or not.

We propose that the expenses of the Government shall be reduced to the very lowest amount consistent with the public welfare. It must be apparent to every man who will think a moment about it that what was said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] the other day is entirely true. There are but three modes of escape from our present embarrassments: first, to retrench to the very lowest point that will not injure the service of the Government; second, to add to the already grievous burdens of the people by increasing the tariff duties upon imported goods, (for we find now that our revenues under the law as it stands are falling off from $1,000,000 to $2,000,000 a month;) or, in the third place, we must raise money by a sale of interest-bearing bonds, thus increasing instead of diminishing the national debt.

Now, when these alternatives are presented, (and I should like gentlemen to point out any other mode by which we can get out of the difficulty,) what is the proper course to pursue? What should we do in the present emergency? Shall we borrow money and sell our bonds in market, avert drawing interest for the purpose of paying these enormous salaries and other Government expenses? No man in his senses will advise such a course at the present time. Shall we increase the tariff duties on imported goods? We should be equally far from taking that position. There is then but one other left, and that is retrenchment. That is retrenchment, sir, to the very lowest point consistent with the public good; and that is what we now propose to do, and that is what we feel to-day the Senate is attempting to prevent us from doing.

Mr. Speaker, it is very strange indeed that Senators, well-informed and patriotic as they are, should insist on keeping these salaries up to the present figures. As I remarked a moment ago, the salaries of ministers to Germany and Russia were fixed by law at $12,000 each, and yet by an amendment to an appropriation bill these salaries were increased to $17,500. So of other salaries. If they could be increased at this fearful rate by such an amendment, why may they not be reduced to $14,000 by the same process when the necessity of the times and our finances demand retrenchment? There surely can be nothing wrong in our efforts to bring them back again, not to $12,000, that is not the proposition of the House at all, but to $14,000. Yet the Senate will not agree to this change, but insists upon holding these missions up to $17,500.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SINGLETON. Very well, sir.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman referred to the increase of salaries of certain missions as having been put by the House upon an appropriation bill, did he not?

Mr. SINGLETON. I say they were ingrafted upon appropriation bills; that is, the salaries of ministers to Germany and England.

Mr. HALE. Yes, sir; and let me put this question to him.

Mr. SINGLETON. Very well, sir.

Mr. HALE. The House upon an appropriation bill put on an increase of certain salaries and sent it to the Senate, thereby changing the law. Now, does the gentleman hold that when the House did that it had the right to say to the Senate, "We have put on this increase of salaries and you must submit to it, or we will not let your bill go through?

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir; you do not understand me as saying anything of the sort.

Mr. HALE. The gentleman says that he could not take that ground. The Senate would have the right to resist this change of the law. The Senate yielded to the demand of the House for increase of salaries. The Senate consented to the bill coming from the House. Two years later the House takes another position in reference to those salaries and proposes to put them back.

Mr. SINGLETON. That is a different issue.

Mr. HALE. The Senate has the same right, precisely the same right to its discretion in reference to the change of law that it had when the House sent over an increase of salaries.

Mr. SINGLETON. Do you call that a question or a speech?

Mr. HALE. Do you say yes or no?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not like so many little speeches injected into my remarks, but I will answer in due time.

Mr. HALE. Has not the Senate the same right now as it had then?

Mr. SINGLETON. I am free to admit the House and Senate are co-ordinate branches of the legislative department of the Government, but they are not co-equal in every respect. That is my declaration, and I will make it good. If they are co-equal, then whatever the House can do the Senate can do, and whatever the Senate can do the House can do. And yet the gentleman knows perfectly well that is not the case, because here we prefer articles of impeachment against the Secretary of War or other officers guilty of malfeasance. The Senate takes up these articles and tries the case, and we have nothing to do with that trial except simply to have managers there to conduct it. They are to all intents and purposes the jury which decides the case. In this instance, then, they are co-ordinate, but not co-equal.

Mr. HALE. I admit that.

Mr. SINGLETON. Wait a moment.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman acknowledge that one is above the other?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes, in some respects I do, and I will show it.

Mr. HALE. Each has certain privileges the other has not. Neither is above the other.

Mr. SINGLETON. I hope the gentleman will let me answer the question he put.

Again, the Senate is the treaty-making power. What has this House to do with making treaties? Further, the Senate has the veto power upon the nominations of the President for offices. Have we any voice in that matter? Are we equal with the Senate in these respects? Unquestionably not, because we have no voice in them whatever.

Again, there are certain privileges which belong to this House which do not belong to the Senate. One is the power to originate revenue bills, and it has been construed that revenue bills mean not only bills to raise money, but applies with equal force to bills proposing to disburse the money which has been already raised. No man will deny that, I apprehend.

Mr. KASSON. That is not agreed to.

Mr. HALE. It is not agreed to.

Mr. SINGLETON. Not under the Constitution? I assert that to be the case. The House has power to originate a revenue bill. Can the Senate originate such a bill?

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. They pass bills making appropriations every day.

Mr. SINGLETON. Can the Senate originate a revenue bill? Has the Senate under the Constitution any power to originate such a bill? Certainly not.

Mr. KASSON. Not for raising money.

Mr. HALE. But the Senate can amend revenue bills coming from the House.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am coming to that point in a moment. Yes, sir; the Senate can concur with amendments.

Mr. HALE. It can put on its own amendments.

Mr. SINGLETON. I ask the gentleman not to interrupt me so often. The Senate can concur in amendments to a House bill when those amendments are proposed by the House itself. To concur implies that the amendment has been proposed by the House. The Senate has the right to propose amendments, but if the House reject them it neither comports with the letter nor the spirit of the Constitution that the Senate may so far insist on those amendments as to stop the wheels of Government if not adopted by the House.

Mr. HALE. Let me ask the gentleman a question right here, right on this point.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will let the gentleman ask his question, and then I must insist upon going on unmolested.

Mr. HALE. Does the gentleman mean to advance the opinion here that there is nothing in the Constitution that gives the Senate the right to amend and insist on its amendment as we have the right to originate revenue bills?

Mr. SINGLETON. I mean to say just what the Constitution declares.

Mr. HALE. No, but——

Mr. SINGLETON. I will answer the question if the gentleman will only wait.

Mr. HALE. Let me put the question so the gentleman can understand it. Is there any more right given in the Constitution to the House to originate a revenue bill and insist upon it than there is in the Senate to propose amendments and insist upon them? Is there any more right in one than in the other?

Mr. SINGLETON. Why, sir, the gentleman must see there is a vast difference between the powers in reference to revenue bills. The Senate cannot originate a revenue bill under any circumstances.

Mr. HALE. Will not the gentleman answer?

Mr. SINGLETON. The House alone, under the Constitution, can originate such bills, and therefore has greater power over the subject than the Senate.

Mr. HALE. Will not the gentleman answer my question?

Mr. SINGLETON. Mr. Speaker——

Mr. HALE. Both of us are perfectly good natured; will not the gentleman answer that question? Let me repeat it again. Under the Constitution has not the Senate as much right to insist on its amendments to revenue bills as the House has to insist on its originating revenue bills?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not believe it has, and I will give you the reason why.

Mr. HOLMAN. Certainly it has.

Mr. HALE. My friend from Indiana [Mr. HOLMAN] says certainly it has. The gentlemen disagree.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am not responsible for the opinions of anybody but myself. You asked me a question, and when I answered you openly, fairly, you tell me what somebody else says. Now I hope the gentleman will sit down, and let me go on.

Mr. HALE. I understand the gentleman to say——

Mr. SINGLETON. I cannot yield further.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi declines to yield further.

Mr. HALE. I think the gentleman will certainly——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Mississippi yield?

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not.

Mr. HALE. Will the gentleman——

Mr. SINGLETON. You will have an opportunity to respond.

Mr. HALE. I want to understand that last proposition of the gentleman.

Mr. SPRINGER. Will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me for one moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi is entitled to exclusive possession of the floor; and other gentlemen will allow him to proceed without interruption when he declines to yield.

Mr. SINGLETON. I propose to state again the opinion which I entertain in reference to this matter. As I have already stated, all revenue bills must originate with the House. They cannot originate anywhere else. And if that be true, then the powers of the Senate and the powers of the House in reference to such bills are not equal the one with the other. If they were, a revenue bill could originate in the Senate as well as in the House. But the Senate is entirely precluded from originating revenue bills.

Well, sir, I grant you that the Constitution provides that the Senate may, in regard to revenue bills, "concur with amendments;" that is, as I said a moment ago, with amendments put on by this House. The word "concur," I believe the learned gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. SEELYE] will agree I am correct in stating, is derived from "con," meaning "together with," and "curro," meaning "I run." The Senate can run or agree with this House so far as amendments put on by the House are concerned. It may also, as the Constitution provides, "propose amendments." But I will not admit that it can by insisting upon its amendments defeat all revenue bills of this House.

The principle of changing existing laws by amendments to appropriation bills has been practiced so long by the party in power that, whether originally right or wrong, it has now grown into a lex non scripta, a common-law principle by which that party at least should feel itself bound. It is too late for the Senate to insist on their amendments to appropriation bills, and if this House refuse to agree to them it has the right to withhold all the appropriations for the support of the Government. I believe the explanation I have given expresses the spirit and intention of our fathers in framing that instrument.

It is a known fact that our Government, though different in many respects from that of Great Britain, is modeled after the English government to a certain extent. Our President here answers to the king, or, as it is now, the queen of Great Britain. Our Senate answers somewhat to the House of Lords, and this body, the House of Representatives, represents the House of Commons in England. Well, sir, it was demonstrated on this floor a few days ago by the gentleman from New York [Mr. COX] and it is a historical fact that at this day the House of Lords of Great Britain does not pretend to claim the power to restrict or control the appropriations made by the House of Commons. And the members of the Senate heretofore for the most part by their waiver of the right, if it were ever allowed, seem to have concurred in that idea in reference to our own Government. I believe this is the first time—at least it is the first time within my knowledge—where the Senate has come forward and made the point distinctly and proposed to stand upon it, and withhold necessary appropriations from the Government.

Before passing from this point, I wish to say that this may be a refinement, a very nice point, which is understood by the Senate and which may be understood by gentlemen on that side of the House; but I tell you the common people of the country will not and cannot appreciate it. The Senate has never objected to the power and practice of putting new laws on appropriation bills which had the effect of increasing expenditures, of increasing offices, of increasing salaries. But now, when it is proposed that we shall reduce instead of increasing expenditures, Senators take their stand on this point. I apprehend the country will not understand, will not appreciate the argument made in support of their position. And what is stranger to me than all else is that gentlemen on the other side of this House, as if they thought perhaps there was not determination enough in the Senate to stand up to this point, are constantly speaking words of encouragement to them and saying they hope the Senate will not recede from its position and that the wheels of the Government should be stopped rather than concession should be made. Members of this House who for years in the presence of the whole country have disregarded that rule, which they now claim to be inflexible, and have utterly set it at defiance in every possible shape and form, occupy a strange position when at this late day they think it necessary to encourage this disposition on the part of the Senate.

Mr. Speaker, I will be through what I have to say in a few moments. The first committee of conference, as I have said, reported disagreement not upon the question of law, but upon the amount of salaries, and another committee was appointed. When it came together instead of the conferees on the part of the Senate waiving the point of law in the second instance, as they had done in the first, they took the position that it was interfering with the Senate's prerogative and declaring that there they meant to stand, let the consequences to the country be what they might. Well, sir, as members of that committee of conference, backed up by the voice of this House and backed up by the sentiment of the country everywhere, we did not feel ourselves at liberty to yield that point. We did not feel ourselves at liberty to give up the bill which had been passed by the House and allow the Senate to say the Government shall be run in the old groove, that there should be no adequate retrenchment of our expenses, but that we must continue as heretofore spending our slender means extravagantly for a corrupt administration of the Government.

Mr. KASSON. Will the gentleman state what the difference in amount of money is between the House bill and the bill as passed by the Senate?

Mr. SINGLETON. It is about $435,000. I cannot state just the exact amount, because they have not offered, so far as any formal proposition is concerned, unless upon conditions to which we could not accede, to abate one single dollar contained in the bill as amended and sent back to the House.

Mr. KASSON. In their amendments did they propose any amendments except to make the bill to conform with the existing law? Were not the amendments proposed by the Senate simply restoring the appropriations where the existing law fixed them?

Mr. SINGLETON. The law, if you call that a law which gave to this amanuensis of Mr. Schenck a certain salary for one year; yet they struck it out and went back upon the principle they proposed to adhere to as they did in the case of the clerk, because by the law, as you call it, that was ingrafted upon an appropriation bill, they struck down the salary of the clerk, which was $600, and therefore went back upon the principle just as effectually as if the reduction had been $6,000,000.

Mr. KASSON. The gentleman from Mississippi did not understand my question. The principle of the Senate is that they will agree to changes of the law whenever their judgment approves of those changes. The point I raise is whether the amendments of the Senate making a difference of $400,000 in the amount appropriated by the bill were not simply amendments that made the amount appropriated conform to the principle of existing law.

Mr. SINGLETON. I have answered that question time and again. They struck out every amendment that we made and proposed to leave the salaries and expenses where the appropriation bill of last year left them, reducing nothing.

Mr. KASSON. Just as the law fixes it.

Mr. SINGLETON. There is no law regulating many of these salaries and expenses except that which was attached to an appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. It was a permanent law, not limited to a single year. The point is a very distinct one, and the gentleman can answer it. A law exists upon the statute-book fixing certain amounts to be paid under that law, and the amendments of the Senate are only designed to make the amounts of the appropriation conform to that law.

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not exactly understand what you mean. If you consider that the appropriation bill of last year with the amendments was a law to reach beyond that year, then the action of the Senate is in conformity to the law, but there is no separate statute upon the statute-book in relation to these salaries.

Mr. FOSTER. Why, there is.

Mr. SINGLETON. There is not in reference to ministers to Germany and Russia, and I defy the gentleman to show it.

Mr. KASSON. Does the gentleman deny that Congress has heretofore passed laws fixing the salaries of ministers and consuls?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes; in appropriation bills.

Mr. KASSON. This is a little colloquy between the gentleman from Mississippi and myself. Such a law exists on the statute-book. My inquiry is a practical one, whether the amendments of the Senate do anything but carry out the existing law?

Mr. SINGLETON. Now, if the gentleman will only sit down and wait I will answer his question. I say that there was a law passed giving a salary of $17,500 to the minister to England, $17,500 to the minister to France, $12,000 to the minister to Germany, and $12,000 to the minister to Russia, and yet the Senate have done what? Have they declared their willingness to abide by that law? Not at all, but it insists that the salaries of the ministers to Germany and Russia shall be $17,500 instead of $12,000 as fixed by law, thus changing said law by an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. KASSON. But it was a permanent law, and not an appropriation for a single year; and now the question is whether the Senate proposes that the salaries shall be paid to the amount of the existing law.

Mr. SINGLETON. I say that there was no law passed fixing these salaries to $17,500, except by amendment to an appropriation bill, and by the same means we propose to bring them back to the act giving to each of them $12,000.

Mr. KASSON. Was it not the law?

Mr. SINGLETON. Was that a permanent law fixing these salaries, or only an appropriation for one fiscal year?

Mr. RANDALL. We propose to make this a permanent law.

Mr. KASSON. This is a little colloquy between the gentleman from Mississippi and myself, and I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will not interfere.

Mr. SINGLETON. I think I understand this matter fully. We propose to do now precisely what the Senate did when it raised these salaries from $12,000 to $17,500. This bill proposes to go in the opposite direction and bring the salaries down to $14,000 and not to $12,000, as fixed by the act regulating salaries.

Mr. KASSON. That is a correct statement.

Mr. RANDALL. Will the gentleman from Mississippi allow me a moment?

Mr. SINGLETON. Yes; I will allow the gentleman a moment now, although I have something else which I want to say.

Mr. RANDALL. A few words will suffice me to explain what I consider the differences between the two Houses on this bill. I have here in my hand a copy of an appropriation bill of 1874 for the year ending June 30, 1875, and in that bill are clauses re-arranging the entire diplomatic and consular service of the United States, both as to salaries and as to their respective positions.

It was stated when it was incorporated in the appropriation bill that it was a reduction. Subsequently it was ascertained, as I am informed, to have increased the expenses of the service $53,000. And I have here the figures which go to sustain this fact. The appropriations for this service for 1873 and 1874 amounted to $1,311,759. The appropriations for 1874 and 1875, which was a bill in which the entire diplomatic and consular service was changed, amounted to $1,370,185, or nearly $60,000 more than the year previous. Now, it will be observed that in that bill the Senate opposed legislation in an appropriation bill raising the salaries of the diplomatic and consular officers. We are in the position to-day of asking the Senate to lower the salaries of the diplomatic and consular service in the identical bill in which they raised them two years ago; and we propose to do it to the extent in the diplomatic service of $173,500 and in the consular service of $193,350.

The Senate in the recent conference took the ground that they would not go directly to the law, but directly to the details. The Senate offered to take the amount which the House appropriated for the diplomatic service and give to the President of the United States the disposition of that amount for the current year ending June 30, 1877. The difference therefore is thus far whether the President shall arrange the diplomatic service either by a reduction of the salaries of certain officers in connection with that service, or by withdrawing certain ministers, so as to make the entire service come within the limits of that amount.

Mr. KASSON. I suppose there was coupled with that a provision that the President should not in any case authorize the payment of any salary beyond the amount already authorized by law.

Mr. RANDALL. I think that clause was in the proposition. So far well. The House conferees, as I understand it, were willing to accept that, provided there was also incorporated in the bill a provision that these were the amounts of the salaries respectively that should be paid for the year. In other words, the House conferees desired that this bill should be in full for the diplomatic service for the year, and that it should be so expressed that no claim should come from any diplomatic officer for any additional sum unless it should be provided for hereafter in a different manner, looking very much to the same result as the proposition submitted on the legislative appropriation bill. There is where we separated. The Senate were willing to take the aggregate amount of money contained in the House bill, and to give the President the right to distribute it in the way I have indicated; but they were unwilling to go far enough, as the House conferees thought was desirable, and to say that this amount should be in full for the diplomatic service for this year. That is the point of difference.

Mr. KASSON. A little further information, if the gentleman pleases. The consular service was proposed to be included in the same arrangement, as I understand it.

Mr. RANDALL. The proposition did not point to the consular service with the same distinctness as I have given it as to the diplomatic service, because it was suggested that perhaps an additional sum beyond the amount agreed upon for that service by the House would be asked for by the Senate. The House conferees said that whenever that question arose they would be prepared to say whether they would advance on the amount the House had fixed for the consular service.

Mr. KASSON. In view of that fact, I beg to call the attention of the gentleman to this distinction: that the consular service more than pays for itself. It is not paid for out of our own Treasury, but out of the charges imposed upon the commerce of the country. I therefore desire to call his attention to the propriety of liberality in the direction of the number of consuls for the benefit of American commerce.

Mr. RANDALL. We never got far enough to be able to show whether we had any liberality or not in that particular. But I will admit—for I am very frank in my statements—that I have far more consideration for the consular service than I have for the diplomatic service. And I will now express the opinion here that if the entire diplomatic service was to fail for want of appropriations and our ministers were all brought home, I do not believe any material interest of the country would suffer.

Mr. KASSON. But the national honor would.

Mr. RANDALL. I know not in what respect. Perhaps there might be an allowance for the minister to the Court of St. James, a temporary minister in connection with the Winslow extradition case, though I am advised that that is being arbitrated directly between Washington and London by the respective secretaries of the two governments.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the gentleman does not desire to advertise our partisan dissensions to every country in the world by a proposition to withdraw our representatives abroad.

Mr. RANDALL. I believe the consular service is of great benefit to the commercial interests of the country; but I cannot see the use of the diplomatic service to the same degree. I believe I have stated correctly, as far as I am able, the differences between the two Houses.

Mr. SINGLETON. I want to make a few more remarks and then I will yield the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has fifteen minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] will allow me a part of the fifteen minutes or ask leave to have the time extended.

Mr. SINGLETON. Does the gentleman want it now?

Mr. FOSTER. I will take it when the gentleman pleases.

Mr. SINGLETON. I will yield to the gentleman now for ten minutes.

Mr. FOSTER. I may want more time than that. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] I think, has correctly stated the difference between the two conference committees on the diplomatic bill, although my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON,] in the fervor of his stump speech, forgot to state the ground of difference entirely.

Mr. SINGLETON. I intended to do it before I got through, but I was interrupted so much I could not do it.

Mr. FOSTER. As I understand it, this is the difference: The two conference committees, at the suggestion of the conference committee of the Senate, agreed to appropriate a gross sum, aggregating the amount appropriated in the House bill for the diplomatic service. I think I may say that it was understood that for the consular service a gross sum should be appropriated amounting to the gross sum of the House bill and dividing the difference between the two Houses, with the further provision that the President of the United States should be authorized to reduce salaries and to withdraw the diplomatic-consular service to the end that the total cost of that service should not exceed the amount appropriated. I do not believe that there was a single member of that conference committee who believed that under the provision proposed one dollar more would be used by the President or the Secretary of State than the amount agreed upon by the conference committees.

But the House, determining to humiliate the Senate and to compel them to eat their own words, so to speak, insisted upon the clause that this aggregate sum should be a payment in full; in other words, that the law known as the Orth law should be repealed. To that the Senate conferees totally dissented from.

Now, there is no difference between these two committees; there is no difference between the House and the Senate as to the amount to be appropriated. I do not suppose that the gentleman from Mississippi or the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] believes that the President would use one dollar more than we shall agree to appropriate.

Mr. RANDALL. That is not the point. The point in controversy is whether these officers would not have a claim.

Mr. FOSTER. They would not have a claim, because we authorize the President to reduce their salaries; we authorize him to withdraw the service. They could not have a claim if this proposition becomes the law.

Now, the Senate took the position that they are not to be dragooned into legislation to which they object. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the remarks of the gentleman from Mississippi justify me in going into the history of this diplomatic bill to a certain extent. I think I am justified in this by the statements which he has made and by his arraignment of the Senate. Now, I want to ask the gentleman from Mississippi whether he was not the chairman of a subcommittee who had charge of this matter, and whether he did not report to the Committee on Appropriations the identical amount of the Orth bill?

Mr. SINGLETON. I did not.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I am greatly mistaken.

Mr. RANDALL. Well, suppose he did?

Mr. FOSTER. I want to find out exactly when the yearnings of the gentleman from Mississippi for economy had their origin. I dislike to refer to matters which occurred in committee, but if I am not mistaken the gentleman from Mississippi was the chairman of a subcommittee having this matter in charge, and did make to that committee a report substantially in accordance with the Orth bill; and it was not until after the committee had a conference with one Keim that the reductions were made. I do not say that the committee got all their information from this man Keim, and I do not undertake to say a word against him. He may have known more about the proper appropriations to be made in this bill than the Secretary of State and everybody else; but until he was consulted no reductions were made. I want to say further that I do not believe the Secretary of State was consulted in a single instance on this matter after the reductions were determined upon. We took that man Keim into our committee-room, and accepted his suggestions as to what these appropriations should be.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of Pennsylvania. Who is Keim?

Mr. FOSTER. He is a gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. I do not think he ever gave any testimony——

Mr. FOSTER. He came into our committee-room and stated item by item what appropriations should be made and what should be withheld.

Mr. RANDALL. He had been sent out by your administration to inspect the consulates. We consulted your own agent for the purpose of getting information as to the requirements of the service.

Mr. FOSTER. I want the House and the country to understand how this appropriation bill was made up.

Mr. SINGLETON. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] say that the Secretary of State was never consulted?

Mr. FOSTER. The Secretary of State was consulted by the gentleman from Mississippi; and after that consultation he reported to the main committee appropriations precisely in accordance with the Orth bill.

Mr. SINGLETON. That is not true.

Mr. FOSTER. Practically it is.

Mr. SINGLETON. No, sir.

Mr. FOSTER. There may have been slight differences, but substantially the report was in accordance with the Orth bill. I think my friend from Maine [Mr. HALE] will corroborate me in this statement.

Mr. SINGLETON. Let me state the facts. The Secretary of State was consulted on two or three occasions, as the gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] very well knows, and we did to some extent conform to his views upon that matter. But afterward when we came into the committee-room we got other light.

Mr. FOSTER. You found Keim.

Mr. SINGLETON. We found Mr. Keim, whom your administration had sent out to make a report upon these very things. He came before us, and after we heard what he had to say there were changes made.

Mr. FOSTER. I yield to my friend from Maine, [Mr. HALE.]

Mr. HALE. As this matter has been brought up, I will state what were the facts. The gentleman from Mississippi and myself were appointed a subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations to mature and report this appropriation bill to the committee. In conjunction with him, (for we worked together,) on full conference with the Secretary of State, and upon examination of the matter, we did report the consular and diplomatic bill to the whole committee, changing only certain discretionary appropriations or not interfering with any salary whatever. Our report was taken (as the committee had the right to take it if they chose) and was so torn and dismembered that I have never recognized it since.

Mr. RANDALL. That was all right; that is the way we ought to have done.

Mr. FOSTER. That may be all right; but I want to get at the facts and to show the precise time when my friend from Mississippi was attacked with this spasm of economy. It was certainly after the report of the subcommittee was made, and it required one Keim, of Pennsylvania, to enlighten the gentleman on that subject.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Keim is a very well informed gentleman.

Mr. FOSTER. I know nothing about him.

Mr. RANDALL. He has visited nearly all these consulates; he was sent there by the Government.

Mr. FOSTER. He may know more about them than the Secretary of State; he may know more about them than the Committee on Foreign Affairs who two years ago made the present arrangement.

Mr. RANDALL. If the Administration did not think him competent for this service, why did it send him out? Was it not our duty as legislators to hear the judgment of your own appointee?

Mr. FOSTER. I want the country to know how this bill was made up. I want the country especially to understand just when my friend from Mississippi was attacked with this spasm of economy.

Mr. SINGLETON. And I want the country to understand how you came in here and voted for this bill, and how afterward you "turned tail" and took the directly opposite view. I want the people to understand that.

Mr. FOSTER. Now, Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Appropriations reported this bill under the circumstances I have named. It went to the Senate. The Senate amended it, making the appropriations conform to the law as contained in the Orth bill.

It has been stated here this morning that the Orth bill was passed by being put upon an appropriation bill. Now, how was the Orth bill passed? The Committee on Foreign Affairs, of which I remember my distinguished friend from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] the present chairman of that committee, was a distinguished member, had this matter under consideration for six months. They were in daily consultation with the Secretary of State. They came into this House and asked one Monday morning that the rules might be suspended so they could offer this bill as an amendment to the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill. It was offered as such an amendment. It went on the appropriation bill under those circumstances after most mature and careful consideration, and was passed. And it is a law today. Now the Senate are surrendering——

Mr. SINGLETON. I want ten minutes myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired, and the gentleman from Mississippi has five minutes left.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am informed that I have but five minutes left, and therefore I cannot yield any further.

Mr. FOSTER. The time of the gentleman I have no doubt will be extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired, and the gentleman from Mississippi has but five minutes left.

Mr. CONGER. I move by unanimous consent the gentleman from Ohio be allowed five minutes longer.

Mr. SINGLETON. I do not object if it does not interfere with my time.

Mr. CONGER. I ask this inasmuch as this is one of the conferences upon which there has been a republican member, and I learn there are several upon which there was not any member from this side.

Mr. RANDALL. What is that last statement? I should like to have the gentleman from Michigan make it again.

Mr. CONGER. I understand there are several conference committees upon which there are no members from this side.

Mr. RANDALL. That is a reflection that ought to be met right here. What is the history of the conferences on the part of the two Houses?

Mr. FOSTER. Let that go.

Mr. RANDALL. We have in every instance conferred with that side of the House as to who should be the minority member of the committee of conference. I appeal to the gentleman from Ohio and the gentleman from Maine if that is not true.

Mr. SINGLETON. Does this come out of my time? If it does I must insist on going on.

Mr. RANDALL. No; the gentleman from Michigan made a charge and it is one which ought to be answered right here. He made the charge that upon every conference committee——

Mr. CONGER. No, I did not make any such charge.

Mr. RANDALL. I know you made it loosely.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This discussion is out of order.

Mr. RANDALL. I dare not speak of any other body, but I can imagine a body doing the thing referred to. They have not put a representative democrat upon committees of conference. But in this House I defy any member of the Committee on Appropriations to say we have not in every instance consulted the minority as to whom they wanted as the minority member of the committee.

Mr. HALE. I believe that has been done.

Mr. FOSTER. That is true so far as the Committee on Appropriations is concerned.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Mississippi has five minutes of his time left.

Mr. FOSTER. I understand that my time has been extended.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent. How much time does the gentleman want?

Mr. FOSTER. I should like to have five minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the gentleman from Ohio going on for five minutes longer?

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. CONGER. I do not withdraw what I said.

Mr. RANDALL. It does not matter whether you withdraw it or not; it is not true.

Mr. FOSTER. Does any one object?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the time of the gentleman from Ohio five minutes. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman will proceed.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Speaker, I was saying I believe that the Senate, exercising the prerogative to which they are entitled and which no one denies, amended this diplomatic bill in accordance with existing law. That is the sum of their offending; nothing more and nothing less.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the House takes the position that unless the Senate yields this bill shall fail. The Senate meets us in conference, and says to us, "We will agree to appropriate a gross sum, to be placed in the hands of the President, that sum aggregating the amount appropriated by the House bill to be used for this purpose, and we will permit the President to curtail both salaries and service to the end that the service may not cost more than the appropriation made." The Senate meets us in that spirit, and then say to us, "Do not ask us to repeal existing law; we stand there, and we object to that." They say, "The House will come to us next and ask us to reduce the Army; that you will come to us and ask us to transfer the Indian Bureau."

Mr. RANDALL. Let me ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. FOSTER. They will say that "you will ask us to repeal the enforcement act, by which we only can have a fair election in New York and Mississippi." They say "we are compelled to make a stand somewhere, and we object to this legislation. We will give the money, we will appropriate the money according to the House bill. We will give you every guarantee that not one dollar more will be expended," but the House comes in and says "unless you repeal the existing law we will not accept your proposition." That is where we stand to-day, and the country will understand it as well as the gentleman from Mississippi or the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. RANDALL. Now will the gentleman answer me a question? Does not the proposition of the Senate conference committee give the President the right to change the law as to the amounts of salary and as to the continuance of certain officers?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. RANDALL. Now we only want it to go a step further and say it shall be in full of the salaries.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senate does not want to go that far. That is what the Senate objects to. It is the repeal of existing law. And that is where we stand now.

One House or the other must yield, or the diplomatic and consular service will not be provided for.

According to all precedent this House must in the end fail to coerce the Senate to give legislative sanction to measures obnoxious to them.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] yields to me for a moment. I want to make a single remark. I have been learning something this morning as to the appointment of these conference committees. I understand they are appointed by the Speaker on the suggestion of the Appropriations Committee; the democratic members on that side and the republican member on this.

Mr. RANDALL. Who said so?

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I judged that to be the case from the colloquy between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. RANDALL. That has not been stated.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Now I wish further to say that if you want an agreement on this bill—and a similar course might bring about an agreement on other bills—I would mildly suggest that the chairman of the Foreign Affairs Committee, the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. SWANN,] the gentleman from New York on that committee, [Mr. HEWITT,] and the gentleman from Massachusetts on that committee, [Mr. BANKS,] be appointed, or that some similar appointment be made outside the Appropriations Committee, if there be any wisdom outside of it. If such gentlemen were appointed they might mature a proposition to be submitted to the House and the Senate and let us vote on it.

Several MEMBERS. Good!

Mr. SINGLETON. I would like to know upon what authority the gentleman from Illinois makes the charge that the members of the conference committees on the part of the House were suggested by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I said that because of the statement of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. RANDALL] that he deferred to the gentlemen on the republican side to name the republican member of the committee of conference.

Mr. RANDALL. I did not say that. I said the minority member had always been put on after conference with the minority of the House.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. The minority of the House; who are they? The gentleman from Maine [Mr. HALE] and the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. FOSTER?]

Mr. RANDALL. The minority of the Appropriations Committee, of course.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Is that not precisely what I said?

Mr. SINGLETON. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] has thought proper to assail the course taken by the conferees on the part of the House. I wish distinctly to state here that so far as that gentleman is concerned he has not once nor twice, nor a dozen times, but perhaps fifty times during this session of Congress, surprised the members of the Committee on Appropriations by the course he has pursued. He has shown himself the most pliable gentleman in the committee-room I ever knew in my life. But when he comes into this House he goes back on everything done in the committee-room; and in doing so he has surprised the members of that committee time and again. We do not know where to find him. What he says in the committee-room gives us no idea of what he may say when he comes into the House.

Mr. FOSTER. I say that the gentleman absolutely and intentionally misstates.

Mr. SINGLETON. Misstates what?

Mr. FOSTER. Misstates my position.

Mr. SINGLETON. Do you charge me with a lie?

Mr. FOSTER. I do if you say that.

Mr. SINGLETON. I say again what I have just stated. I say that time and again the gentleman has agreed to a proposition in the committee as understood by all the members, and when he has come into the House here he has risen and attacked it.

Mr. FOSTER. I say that is absolutely untrue.

Mr. SINGLETON. Very well, sir. We will have something to say about that after a while and elsewhere.

Mr. FOSTER. Here or elsewhere.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Order, gentlemen.

Mr. SINGLETON. So far as the gentleman's statement here to-day of what has taken place in the conference committee is concerned, let me say that he knew nothing about what took place in the first conference, because he was not upon it.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not say I was.

Mr. SINGLETON. And yet he undertakes to state what took place in that committee on the part of the Senate and on the part of the House. I make the statement that, when we met together the proposition was made by the conference on the part of the Senate that they would take the amount which was intended by the House bill to be appropriated to the diplomatic service, provided we would give it to them and allow it to be paid out to the different officers upon account. It was not to be a final settlement. In other words, they would take $175,000, or about that amount, and would use it; but all the officers to whom it was paid were after all to have a claim upon the Government for the balance of their salary under the old law. Now, am I right about that? I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to say if that is so.

And when we proposed that this amount should be a finality, that they might take the whole sum and use it as the President and Secretary of State thought best for the service, but that was to be the whole amount appropriated for that purpose, the Senate conferees declined to accept it, and said that they would leave the whole question open. The proposition was then discussed of a commission to consist of two members of the House and two members of the Senate who should determine the question of whether anything more should be paid in this way of salaries, and if that committee composed of members of the Senate and of the House declared that nothing more should be paid, then the appropriation was to be a finality; but if they disagreed among themselves, the law was to stand as it now stands, and the salaries were to remain as at present.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SPRINGER. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Mississippi.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois then takes the floor in his own right.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. I have no objection to the gentleman from Mississippi continuing his remarks; but this is a report, as I understand it, from a committee of conference, and according to the rule enforced against me when I was cut off the other day there can be but one hour for debate upon such a question, and therefore the gentleman from Illinois can have no time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Illinois that the Chair ruled as to him that he could control the floor but for an hour, and he has now made the same rule that the gentleman from Mississippi now surrendering the floor, his hour having expired, has given it into the hands of the gentleman from Illinois. The Chair did not limit debate, and he had no right to do so.

Mr. RANDALL. The Chair will recollect that he stated to the gentleman from Illinois, who the other day made a conference report, that he was compelled at the end of the hour to call the previous question or else yield the floor.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He must have called the previous question or surrendered the floor; but the Chair did not limit the debate.

Mr. SINGLETON. The proposition to appoint two members of the Senate and two members on the part of the House to whom this matter should be referred was of course with the understanding that it would result in a disagreement, and then under the old law these officers would have power to institute suits against the Government for the balance of the salaries due them under the old law. It would have engendered such a number of suits as would have cost us more than if we had given up the whole amount demanded by the Senate. We could not agree to that, as a matter of course. We wanted to make the appropriation a finality. When the Senate conferees said that they were willing to take for the diplomatic service the amount which the House proposed to give to that service but leave the matter open for further claims, I submitted an amendment which I ask to have read as a part of my remarks.

The Clerk read as follows:

And the President is hereby authorized and empowered to discontinue such missions as he may think will not be detrimental to the foreign service of the country, or he may apportion the salaries in such manner as he may in his judgment deem equitable and just, and the amount so appropriated shall not exceed the amount provided for in the House bill, and shall be in full of all services and expenses for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, so far as the diplomatic service of the country is concerned.

Mr. SINGLETON. A word more. It will be observed that in order to enable the Senate conferees to get out of the difficulty in which they had placed themselves, we proposed to give them exactly the amount appropriated by the House bill, but at the same time to give power to the President to continue the salaries of the first-class ministers at $17,500 and withdraw certain other unimportant ministers, or he might apportion the amount as he thought best for the public foreign service. We proposed to make it purely a matter of discretion with the President whether the one course or the other should be adopted; but the Senate conferees declined to agree to that proposition and so the matter ended, and this disagreement is here reported to this House for its action.

Mr. Speaker, let me state one fact in conclusion. I find that we receive twenty-two ministers and we send out thirty-one. There is not a nation on the earth that sends out as many ministers to foreign governments as the United States. We receive but twenty-two from all the world, and yet we send out thirty-one. Now, it is not necessary that this should be done. As already remarked by gentlemen to-day, our Government has been negotiating with Great Britain with regard to the matter of extradition of certain escaped criminals from the United States in the absence of a minister to the court of St. James in just as satisfactory a manner as if we had a minister there. What we need is not ministers at a salary of $17,500, but intelligent consuls at reasonable pay.

I believe that the whole service could be carried on satisfactorily with but two ministers, one in England and the other in some part of Germany. That is all that is absolutely necessary. I think that we ought to stand by our bills. The people are at our backs in this matter. We ought not to yield, and I trust the House will show in good faith an earnest desire to keep the pledges which every one of us made in our canvasses, and which have been made in the platforms both of the republican and democratic parties to cut down expenditures so that they shall not reach a larger amount than is absolutely necessary for the public good.

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, I propose on this occasion to submit some remarks in reference to the difficulty in which the two Houses of Congress now find themselves upon this and other appropriation bills, and to refer to some authorities in support of the views which I shall offer. The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the consular and diplomatic appropriation bill have just submitted their report to the House, in which they state they are unable to come to any agreement thereon. The gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] has stated the position of the House and also that of the Senate in relation to this particular bill. It appears that the same difficulty has been made in the consideration of the disagreeing votes upon this bill that arose upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill heretofore reported to this House; and a similar state of affairs exists with reference to the other appropriation bills pending and not yet passed by the two Houses.

The position of the two Houses at this time, as it appears from the discussions had in this House, on this and other bills, is substantially this: The House of Representatives, acting under the provisions of the great rule of retrenchment adopted by this House at the commencement of the session, which is, that provisions may be inserted in appropriation bills changing existing laws which are germane to the subject-matter of the bills, and which shall retrench expenditures—the House acting under this rule has passed the usual appropriation bills for the support of the Government, by reducing salaries of nearly all officials, including the President of the United States, members of Congress, and diplomatic and consular officers, as well as the heads of the bureaus and the clerks in the various Departments of the Government. These reductions change the existing law in relation to salaries, but such changes have been made in every instance in the direction of the retrenchment of expenditures.

It has been estimated that these reductions in the appropriation bills already passed are $64,000,000, in round numbers, below the estimates of the various Departments for the fiscal year in which the Government has just entered, and also that the appropriations made by this House are over $39,000,000 less for the year ending June 30, 1877, than were the like appropriations made by the last Congress for the year ending June 30, 1876. I know that this statement has been controverted by gentlemen on the other side of the House; but even upon that side of the House it is admitted that the reductions made by this House of Representatives are thirty millions below the appropriations made by the last Congress for the fiscal year just ended. The reduction of the expenditures of the Government for a single year of $30,000,000 even is a matter of the greatest importance to the tax-payers of the country, and one which was hardly anticipated by the people who elected us. It is equal to the interest at 6 per cent. upon five hundred millions of the national debt; and the annual saving of that amount is a practical reduction of the national debt so far as the annual interest upon the same is concerned to the amount of one-fourth of the bonded debt.

On the 9th day of February last I had the honor to address the House upon the bill now under consideration. It was then pending in this House and under discussion. On that occasion I said:

And this House will not have finished its work until it shall have cut off all manner of official extravagance, abolished all sinecures, exposed corruption and peculation, reduced the public expenses $30,000,000, and thus have carried out the pledges made to the people when we were elected, to establish in all the branches and departments of the Government retrenchment, economy, and reform.

Therefore the reduction of expenditures as is admitted upon the other side of the House to the amount of $30,000,000 below the expenses of last year is as much as I expected at the commencement of the session could be accomplished, and even more than was anticipated by a large majority of members upon this side of the House.

Such is the position which the House has assumed in reference to appropriation bills, and such is the amount of the reduction that has been accomplished in the bills as passed by the House. The House insists upon its right to originate these bills and to reduce the salaries and other expenses of the Government in the manner provided.

Upon the other hand, it is contended by the Senate that all appropriations made by the House of salaries below those heretofore established by law, unless voluntarily agreed to by the Senate, cannot be insisted upon by the House; and this House is admonished that to adhere to its reductions of official salaries will be an act of revolution. A distinguished gentleman has said elsewhere than upon this floor—for I desire to make no references not according to parliamentary rules—that such action on the part of the House of Representatives would be nullification. I had the privilege of hearing some remarks made upon the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill when the conference report upon that bill was submitted in the other branch of Congress.

I presume it will not be unparliamentary to refer to the present Secretary of the Treasury. When he announced the disagreement of the two Houses upon that bill he occupied a most anomalous position. I know of no parallel in the history of legislation in this country. I see a partial analogy in the position which he occupied to that of the "mighty angel" of the Revelations, who came down from heaven clothed with a cloud, having a rainbow upon his head, and with one foot upon the sea and the other upon the earth, swore by Him that liveth forever, and with other solemn asseverations, that there should be time no longer. The Secretary on this occasion, standing with one foot upon the turbulent sea of legislation and the other upon the firm vaults of the Treasury Department, announced that there was an end of all agreement between the two Houses upon that and other bills changing existing laws by the reduction of salaries of public officials. Having made this announcement, he left the subject and the Senate, and immediately repaired to the other end of the Avenue, and took the oath of office as Secretary of the Treasury.

In order that the position of the honorable Secretary of the Treasury may not be misunderstood, and regarding him as a representative of the party in power, I will quote a portion of his remarks. He said:

The Senate could not recede from its amendments and take the action of the House of Representatives changing by absolute law the entire salaries of the whole civil service in the Executive Departments. The Senate could not do that; especially the Senate could not do that if demanded as the price of any appropriation at all. To do that, was to concede that we were no longer a co-ordinate branch of the legislative department of the Government. It was abdication, as my honorable friend sitting near me [Mr. SHERMAN] says, absolute abdication. Well, if adhered to it is revolution. As long as the House of Representatives simply insists, we are to confer; but when the House of Representatives gets so far that it adheres, it is revolution. That is what it is, absolute revolution. It is a defiance of the law, and that is revolution in this country. I maintain that in the Senate, in the House of Representatives, or out of it, the rule of right for our action here or elsewhere is the law, and it is equally obligatory on all; and whoever rebels against it is revolutionary.

Here it is asserted that the House of Representatives may simply propose reductions of salaries, may propose to the Senate what amount of money shall be expended by the Government, and as the money which is to be expended is also to be raised by taxation the House would thereby be limited to the power to propose to the Senate what amount of money should be contributed by the tax-payers of this country. It is asserted with great confidence that while this House may propose amendments to existing law it may also insist upon its amendments and ask a committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes. But should this House, the immediate representatives of the people of this country, adhere to their measures of retrenchment, adhere to the bills which have been passed reducing the expenses of the Government at least $30,000,000 below the past year, adhere to the position that the House of Representatives has the exclusive power to originate money bills, such adherence on our part would be absolute revolution. From this position I most respectfully dissent. This House, if it understands its proper functions and powers, will also dissent; and I am sure that the people of this country, already bowed down by the weight of taxation which has been heaped upon them year after year in the past, struggling now for a reduction of public expenditures, as well as denying themselves the luxuries of life by a reduction of their domestic expenses, will also dissent from this position.

I desire to call the attention of the House to another position assumed by the honorable Secretary of the Treasury. He said on the occasion above referred to:

Where an amendment of a statute is proposed by one side and the other side dissents, the party proposing is the innovating party, and so far as I know in the whole history of the country the innovating party always retires.

This brings me to the consideration of the question of the power of the House of Representatives over money bills. The first clause of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States declares:

All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments, as on other bills.

The term "revenue bills" used in this connection was meant to include all bills on the subject of taxation and governmental supplies. Such bills are technically called "money bills," and the provisions in our Constitution in reference to them were borrowed from the British House of Commons, which body for five hundred years has exercised the right to originate all bills for raising revenue and meeting the necessary expenses of the government. For three hundred years previous to 1671 the House of Lords had exercised the right of amending such bills; but the right to originate them by the House of Commons had never been disputed. The Commons, however, in that year took an advanced position, to the effect that the House of Lords could not amend revenue or supply bills, but must pass them as they came from the Commons or not at all.

On the 3d of July, 1678, the following resolution was adopted by the House of Commons:

Resolved, That all aids and supplies and aids to His Majesty in Parliament are the sole gift of the Commons; and all bills for the granting of such aids and supplies ought to begin with the Commons; and that it is the undoubted and sole right of the Commons to direct, limit, and appoint in such bills the ends, purposes, considerations, conditions, limitations, and qualifications of such grants, which ought not to be changed by the House of Lords. (3 Hatsell, page 440.)

This resolution has ever since been accepted by the House of Lords as part of the British constitution. Since that time it has been held "that the Lords could not amend so as to alter the intention of the Commons with regard to the amount of the rate or charge, whether by increase or reduction, its duration, its mode of assessment, levy, collection, appropriation, or management, or the persons who shall pay, receive, manage, or control it, or the limits within which it is proposed to be levied."

In commenting upon the above resolution of the Commons, Mr. May, in his work on Parliamentary Law, page 407, says:

It is upon this latter resolution that all proceedings between the two houses in matters of supply are now founded. The principle is acquiesced in by the Lords, and, except in cases when it is difficult to determine whether a matter be strictly one of supply or not, no serious difference can well arise. The Lords rarely attempt to make any but verbal alterations in which the sense or intention is not affected; and even in regard to these, when the Commons have accepted them, they have made special entries in their journal, recording the character and objects of the amendments and their reasons for agreeing to them.

Mr. Blackstone, in his Commentaries, (volume 1, page 168,) says:

It is the ancient indisputable privilege and right of the House of Commons that all grants, subsidies, Parliament aids, do begin in this House and are bestowed by them.

The general reason given for this exclusive privilege of the House of Commons is that the supplies are raised upon the body of the people, and therefore it is proper that they alone should have the right of taxing themselves.

It would, therefore, be extreme'y dangerous to give the Lords any power of framing new taxes for the subject. It is sufficient that they have the power of rejecting, if they think the Commons too lavish or improvident in their grants.

But it is unnecessary to quote further upon this subject. The uniform practice of the House of Commons for two hundred years past has been in correspondence with this principle. It was well known to the framers of the Federal Constitution, and was the subject of much discussion in the constitutional convention. In fact the subject of taxation and the manner in which revenue should be raised was the most difficult subject before the convention. At that time it was not anticipated that the revenue arising from tariffs would be sufficient to meet the requirements of the General Government. Under the Articles of Confederation the expenses of the General Government were apportioned among the several States, to be raised in such manner as the States themselves might indicate. But this manner of raising revenue was found to be inefficient and impracticable, and the failure of this feature of the Articles of Confederation was one of the chief reasons for the formation of the Federal Constitution. The discussions in the convention all go to show the delicacy and importance of the question. The contest was between the larger and the smaller States. The equal representation in the Senate and the representation in the House of Representatives according to population and the manner of providing for the original revenue bills were subjects of compromise and concession. Inasmuch as the smaller States are allowed equal representation in the Senate with the larger ones, the larger States insisted upon retaining the power of originating money bills in the House of Representatives. So intimately is the subject of appropriation connected with the raising of the necessary revenue to meet such appropriations that the phrase "bills for raising revenue" has always been construed to cover all bills making appropriations.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman if he maintains that the Senate has no power to originate bills to appropriate money, no power to act upon or pass an appropriation bill originating in the Senate taking money out of the Treasury?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will answer that question. I understand that by virtue of the Constitution of the United States all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives, but the Senate may propose or concur in amendments as in other bills.

I understand also that the writers on constitutional law almost universally construe the term "revenue bills" to include appropriation bills, and that the power and authority of the House to originate appropriation bills is exclusively in this body, although the Senate may propose amendments thereto.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman if it has not been the practice for nearly a century past for the Senate to pass bills and send them to the House, and the House to concur in those bills, appropriating money out of the Treasury, pension bills and other bills appropriating money, not general appropriation bills; and if that has not been the practice from Congress to Congress?

Mr. SPRINGER. I will state that during the past ten or fifteen years, since the party of which my colleague is a member has been in power, it has been the practice to violate the Constitution on nearly every occasion when it was in their power to do so, and that we are not responsible for the repeated violation of that instrument by the gentleman's party. And yet we have the statement from the other end of the Capitol that if the House of Representatives shall insist upon its right to have control of revenue bills we will become revolutionists and nullifiers of the Constitution.

But my colleague has asked the question in good faith, and I will answer him in the same spirit. He desires to know whether it has not been the practice for nearly a century past for the Senate to originate and pass appropriation bills. I answer that such has not been the uniform practice of that body; on the contrary, from the adoption of the Federal Constitution down to the year 1832, the right of the House of Representatives to originate not only revenue bills, but also appropriation bills, was universally conceded to this body. I believe there is no instance on record from the adoption of the Constitution to 1832 where such bills have originated in the Senate of the United States. This fact is of the highest importance. It shows the contemporaneous interpretation of the Constitution by those who framed it, for many framers of the Constitution were afterward members of the Senate and of the House of Representatives. It shows also that the framers of the Constitution, by incorporating that clause in reference to the origin of revenue bills in the House of Representatives, had in mind the practice of the British Parliament on this subject. This provision was taken from the British system, and it was well known to the framers of the Constitution. The only modification in our Constitution of the British system is the incorporation into the Constitution of the right of the Senate to alter and amend money bills, which right was denied by the Commons to the House of Lords. Acting upon the theory of the British constitution, and with a full knowledge of the debates in the constitutional convention on this subject, the uniform practice of both branches of Congress from the organization of the Federal Government to 1832 was in favor of the origin in the House of Representatives of all money bills. At that time Mr. Clay, then a Senator from Kentucky, submitted a resolution in relation to the tariff, which proposed to reduce or repeal certain tariff duties. Mr. Clay's resolution was introduced in the Senate on the 9th of January, 1832, and is as follows:

Resolved, That the existing duties upon articles imported from foreign countries, and not coming into competition with similar articles made or produced within the United States, ought to be forthwith abolished, except the duties upon wines and silks, and that they ought to be reduced; and that the Committee on Finance be instructed to report a bill accordingly.

This resolution provoked an exhaustive discussion. There were in the Senate at that time Daniel Webster, William Marcy, George M. Dallas, Theodore Frelinghuysen, Felix Grundy, Thomas H. Benton, and many other distinguished statesmen. In this debate, while some affirmed the right of the Senate to originate bills for reducing taxation, as contradistinguished from bills for raising the revenue, yet the weight of authority was upon the side of those who maintained that all bills in any way affecting the public revenues and taxation ought to originate in the House of Representatives. In pursuance of this resolution a bill was reported, and that bill was also discussed at length; but on the 22d day of April, 1832, the bill was, on motion of Mr. Dallas, laid upon the table by a vote of 27 in the affirmative to 19 in the negative. Mr. Tazewell, a Senator from Virginia, just previous to the vote on laying upon the table, entered into a full and luminous exposition of the constitutional question, and after concluding his remarks he proposed that the bill should lie on the table, with the understanding that it was not to be taken up until the com mittee had a reasonable time to make additional reports, or until a bill came from the other House. The bill having been laid upon the table, as stated, the question was disposed of for the present.

On the 12th of February, 1833, Mr. Clay addressed the Senate at length on the subject of the tariff, and submitted a bill "to modify the act of the 14th of July, 1832, and all other acts imposing duties on imports." The discussion on the merits of the bill and on the constitutional question was again renewed. The discussion extended over several days, and took a wide range, and questions not immediately connected with the bill were extensively discussed. The arguments on the constitutional question are not reported at length.

Mr. Chambers, of Maryland, said it was impossible for him to vote for the bill, as a measure originating in the Senate, while it contained a provision for increasing the duties. By the Constitution, he contended, the Senate could originate no such measure. He regarded the constitutional objection as insurmountable. (February 23, 1833.)

Mr. Dickerson, of New Jersey, said whether the rate of duty was raised or lowered the law was equally one for raising revenue within the Constitution. The distinction he regarded as an absurdity.

Mr. Silsbee, of Massachusetts, said he could not vote for the bill in the face of the Constitution, which expressly prohibited its originating in the Senate.

Mr. Frelinghuysen, of New Jersey, regarded the constitutional difficulty as altogether insuperable. He said, having taken a solemn oath to support the Constitution he could not, agreeable to his wishes, give his assent to a measure originating in the Senate in violation of its express provisions.

Mr. Webster was one of the principal characters in this great debate. He said:

The constitutional question must be regarded as important, but it was one which could not be settled by the Senate. It was purely a question of privilege, and the decision of it belonged alone to the House. The Senate, by the Constitution, could not originate bills for raising revenue. It was of no consequence whether the rate of duty were increased or decreased; if it was a money bill it belonged to the House to originate it. In the House there was a Committee of Ways and Means organized expressly for such objects. There was no such committee in the Senate. The constitutional provision was taken from the practice of the British Parliament, whose usages were well known to the framers of the Constitution, with the modification that the Senate might alter and amend money bills, which was denied by the House of Commons to that of Lords. This subject belonged exclusively to the House of Representatives. The attempt to evade the question by contending that the present bill was intended for protection and not for revenue afforded no relief, for it was protection by means of revenue.—February 23, 1833.

In this debate Mr. Clay insisted that the main object of the bill was protection and not revenue, and upon this ground he maintained that such a bill might originate in the Senate. He had presented the measure as one of conciliation and compromise, and urged its passage upon that ground. The question was never taken in the Senate upon the final passage of the bill, nor was any test-vote had upon the constitutional question, independent of the merits of the bill. But Mr. Clay, on the 26th of February, 1833, abandoned his bill, giving as a reason that the House of Representatives had just passed a bill of substantially the same purport, and that the Senate could take up and consider the House bill, stating that this would "supersede the objections of some Senators who believed the Senate was not the proper place for the origin of this bill." Thus ended the attempt of the Senate in 1833 to originate and pass a bill not for raising revenue but to reduce taxes and for protection. The Senate bill was laid on the table, and the House bill taken up, considered, and passed, the vote being—yeas 29, nays 16. The abandonment by Mr. Clay of his bill and the taking up and passage of the House bill to the same purport constitute a strong precedent in favor of the right of the House to originate such bills.

The Senate on the 26th of March, 1838, passed a bill for the establishment of the independent treasury. This bill was entitled "A bill to impose additional duties as depositaries upon certain public officers, to appoint receivers of public money, and to regulate the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursements of public moneys of the United States." The vote upon the passage of it was—yeas 27, noes 25. This was not a bill for the raising of revenue, nor for repealing or reducing taxation. It was, however, regarded by the House as a money bill, having reference, as its title indicates, to the safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursements of the public moneys of the United States. Mr. Pickens, of South Carolina, said in the House that he considered this a question which, according to the theory of our Government, was peculiarly under the jurisdiction of the House, and upon that consideration alone he preferred to consider the House bill on that subject instead of the Senate bill. Mr. Cambreling, of New York, a member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the House, said that he could answer for himself as well as every one of his colleagues on that committee, and that the committee infinitely preferred the House bill to the Senate bill. He said they had seriously and thoroughly examined all the provisions of the Senate bill, and they had serious objections to many of its details; that some of its details besides those advanced by the member from South Carolina involves principles of a very grave importance. For one, he said, he should not depart from one single section or feature of the House bill, and he certainly felt it his duty as a measure of this character should emanate from the House to give the House bill the preference. A motion was made thereupon to lay the Senate bill upon the table; which was agreed to—yeas 106, noes 38. While the vote upon laying this bill upon the table cannot be claimed as a test-vote upon the constitutional question, yet it certainly indicated that the House regarded this bill as embracing the subject of legislation which should originate in the House of Representatives. So the bill was laid on the table. (Congressional Globe, second session Twenty-fifth Congress, volume 6, page 267.)

This question was again brought before Congress at the first session of the Twentieth Congress. Mr. McDuffie, of South Carolina, introduced into the Senate a bill to revive the compromise tariff act which was passed on the 2d of March, 1833. This bill was referred to the Committee on Finance in the Senate. The Committee on Finance at that time consisted of Mr. Evans, of Maine, chairman; and Messrs. McDuffie, Huntington of Connecticut, Levi Woodbury of New Hampshire, and John J. Crittenden. On the 9th of January, 1844, Mr. Evans, from this committee, reported that a majority of the committee had instructed him to ask that it be discharged from the further consideration of the subject, stating that the committee had come to this conclusion under the impression that the bill could not originate in the Senate, being one within the meaning of the Constitution to raise revenue; and for the purpose of enabling Mr. McDuffie to discuss the question, reported the bill back without amendment, and submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill entitled "A bill to revive the act of the 2d of March, 1833, usually called the comqromise act and to modify existing duties upon foreign imports in conformity with its provisions," is a bill for raising revenue within the meaning of the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, and cannot, therefore, originate in the Senate: Therefore,

Resolved, That it be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. Berrien, a Senator from Georgia, discussed these resolutions at length on the 9th of April, 1844. He said that it was not on account of the representation of the people in the Senate or the House in different modes that he opposed the initiation of the bill now the subject of discussion. It was because the restriction was plainly written on the face of the Constitution; and however important might be the discussion on the merits of the bill, there stood in advance of it a question far more important, which was whether the Senate of the United States would confine its legislation within the limits of the Constitution or usurp a power which the Constitution had not conferred upon it. He is thus reported in the Globe:

Entertaining these opinions, not only upon the question itself but upon its comparative importance, he desired to state as briefly as possible the question involved in the inquiry whether the Senate had the constitutional power to entertain this bill, to originate a bill, which was now under discussion. He did not refer Senators to that particular clause in the Constitution, because it was well known to all present. It was simply that "All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur in amendments as in cases of other bills." Now here was a bill which was for raising revenue. He spoke of it in these general terms. The question involved was, what was a bill for raising revenue? The Senator from South Carolina [Mr. McDuffie] said if it were in any article essentially such a bill, the Senate had no right to entertain it. But he [Mr. McDuffie] denied that it was so; because, in the first place, it did not propose to raise by the imposition of new or increased duties, but to reduce taxation by the reduction of duties. Mr. Berrien maintained that this distinction was more specious than solid, inasmuch as the bill proposed a repeal of one kind of duty and prescribed that of another. Mr. Berrien proceeded to show that the bill would necessarily in its progress have to be so amended as to impose a different rate of duty; and therefore would be a bill for raising revenue. He next examined the argument that, the object being to reduce duties, not to increase them, the bill could not be within the terms of the inhibition in the Constitution; and he referred to the journal of the debates of the convention which framed the Constitution to show that the object of the inhibition with regard to the Senate was to prevent the Senate from originating bills for raising or appropriating money for revenue—a power that was reserved for the House of Representatives. He quoted several motions for amendment in the debates of the convention to show that such bills were always spoken of as money bills, including all revenue bills, the object of which was to raise money by taxation for revenue. Hence he argued there was no constitutional authority for the origination of this bill in the Senate.

Mr. Benton, of Missouri, in this debate said:

In all cases of doubtful jurisdiction between the two Houses, my rule is to solve the doubt in favor of the House, which, by the Constitution is charged with the general subject. Taxation and representation go together. The burdens of the people and the representation of the people are put together. The immediate and full representation of the people is in the House of Representatives.

The resolutions reported from the Committee on Finance of the Senate, after a debate extending through a period of sixty days, were finally, on the 31st of May, 1844, adopted—yeas 33, nays 4.

The sole question involved in this discussion was as to the constitutional power of the Senate to originate such bills, and the emphatic vote agreeing to these resolutions which they received establishes a precedent of the greatest importance. When it is considered that this vote denying jurisdiction in the Senate was given by the Senate itself, which body, like all other legislative bodies, is disposed to assume all the jurisdiction which the Constitution will give it, the precedent becomes all the more important and conclusive upon this subject.

I will now cite another important precedent in the legislation of Congress upon this subject. On the assembling of the first session of the Thirty-fourth Congress in December, 1855, there was a contest in the election of Speaker, lasting until the 2d day of February, 1856, at which time the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, [Mr. BANKS,] now a member of this House, was chosen. The Senate being impatient on the subject of the appropriation bills, Mr. Brodhead, of Pennsylvania, on the 11th of December, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Finance be directed to inquire into the expediency of reporting the appropriation bills for the support of the Government or adopting other measures with a view of obtaining more speedy action on said bills.

Upon the introduction of this resolution Mr. Brodhead said that he did not ask the Senate to consider the resolution at that time, but when he did call it up he would ask the Senate to consider the question of the power and the right of that body to originate the general appropriation bills. On the 7th of January Mr. Brodhead called up his resolution for consideration. He discussed the subject at length, stating that his object was to have these bills considered by the Senate in consequence of delay on the part of the House of Representatives in considering and sending to the Senate appropriation bills. In order to illustrate this delay on the part of the House he submitted a statement showing the days on which the principal appropriation bills for the support of the Government were received in the Senate from the House of Representatives, and the number of days of each session expended by the House of Representatives before maturing and passing each bill, and the number of days left of each session to the Senate for its action upon each bill. He also argued that the Senate had power to originate appropriation bills. The same view was taken by Mr. R. M. T. Hunter, Senator from Virginia; by Mr. Toombs, of Georgia; by Mr. Clayton, of Delaware, and others. But Mr. Seward, of New York, arguing upon the subject from a constitutional stand-point, took a different position. He said:

It is true that according to the letter of the Constitution appropriation bills may be originated by the Senate, for they are not strictly revenue bills; yet we all know that in point of fact they have come into the place of revenue bills. We make a revenue bill but once in ten or twelve years, and these appropriation bills are in fact what were intended, I suppose, by the framers of the Constitution as bills of revenue. They appropriate the revenue which is only regulated by a bill passed once in a period of several years. Now, notwithstanding all the inconveniences attendant on the present mode of transacting business, I am quite satisfied that this branch of the national legislation is more safely reposed in the House of Representatives of the United States—representatives from limited districts, the direct representatives of the people themselves and not of the States; representatives responsible to the people directly and immediately at the expiration of every two years. I think it would be very much to be deplored, so far as concerns the appropriation of the public money, that it should in any degree be withdrawn from that House and concentrated in the Senate of the United States. As the tendency of things strikes me it is now, as it has for many years been, to concentrate in the Senate a larger share than in the House of the various legislation which the country requires. That happens so because the number of this body is smaller; because its rules, therefore, are more practicable and business can be more feasibly transacted; while, on the other hand, the constitution of the other House is such that the business is more slowly transacted and with great difficulty. But if I know anything of the constitution of the two Houses, what I do know has led me to believe that proposed appropriations are more carefully examined by committees in the House of Representatives than they naturally would be here; and that if this be not the fact, and if our committees are equal, yet there is a more strict sense of accountability on the part of members of that House in regard to the fiscal affairs of the Government. It is for these reasons, while I think some remedy is necessary for the inconveniences which have been suffered—and I am willing to vote for this resolution of inquiry—I yet at the same time am far from believing it will be right or safe or judicious or strictly within the spirit of the Constitution for us to assume this great branch of business, which properly belongs to the Commons of the country, the House of Representatives, according to the previous settled habit of the country.

Mr. Sumner, of Massachusetts, discussed the subject at great length, citing numerous authorities from the debates in the constitutional convention and from writers on parliamentary and constitutional law. His speech will be found on page 379 of the Congressional Globe, first session of the Forty-Fourth Congress, volume 32. I may be pardoned for quoting from this speech somewhat extensively from the fact that it bears directly upon the question which my colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] has put to me, and also is a subject of the greatest importance at this time. Mr. Sumner said:

We are carried first to the words of the Constitution, which are as follows:

"All bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives; but the Senate may propose or concur with amendments as on other bills."

Under this provision the annual appropriation bills for the Army, Navy, Post-Office, and civil and diplomatic service, from the beginning of the Government, have originated in the House of Representatives, and this has always been done, I believe, without question. It is now proposed to reverse this standing policy and to originate these bills in the Senate; and this proposition has the sanction of the Committee on Finance of this body.

The proposition is a clear departure from usage, and on this account must be regarded with suspicion. A slight examination will demonstrate that it tends to a subversion of well-established landmarks.

Mr. Sumner then proceeded to discuss the subject in the light of the debates on the Federal Constitution, showing that the provision in the Constitution which he had quoted was the result of a compromise between the larger and the smaller States; and also showing that the phrases "revenue bills," "money bills," and "appropriation bills" were used as synonyms in all the debates on this subject. He also showed from these debates that great stress was placed upon this provision of the Constitution in reference to revenue bills, Colonel Mason having stated in the convention that "to strike out the section was to unhinge the compromise of which it made a part." After citing these authorities, Mr. Sumner further said:

And this brings me, sir, to the precise meaning of this provision. The seeming indefiniteness of the term "bills for raising revenue" may perhaps furnish apology for the present effort. It may be argued that while the Senate is placed under certain restrictions it may nevertheless originate "appropriation bills." This of course is a question of interpretation. Does this interdict upon the Senate extend to the bills by which money is appropriated to the support of the Government as well as by those bills by which it is directly obtained? Are appropriation bills included under the term "bills for raising revenue?" Now, I cannot join in the opinion so confidently expressed by the Senator from Virginia [Mr. Hunter] and the Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] that it was clearly the intention of the Constitution to concede to the Senate the power of originating all appropriation bills; nor on the other hand do I assert that such exercise of power is in the strict sense unconstitutional. I approach the question as an inquirer anxious to find the real purpose of the fathers. There are several considerations which seem to shed light on the path to our conclusion.

First. The compromise between the small States and large States can be made completely effective, according to the obvious intent of the authors of the Constitution, only by interdicting the Senate from originating the great appropriation bills. If this interdict is restrained simply to tariff bills, which occur only at rare intervals, it becomes only a very inadequate compensation for the surrender made by the larger States to the smaller States in the constitution of the Senate. According to the reason of the rule the great appropriation bills must be equally within its intendment; the reason is as strong in one case as in the other.

Secondly. There is a second consideration, founded on the familiar use of the term money bills throughout the debates in the convention, as applicable to the bills which the Senate cannot originate. I need not occupy time by reference to instances, but whoever takes the trouble to investigate the matter in Mr. Madison's reports of the debates, and also in the report of the Virginia convention, will find that this term is universally employed, unless indeed where Mr. Gouverneur Morris uses the broader term "money plans," (ibid., page 282;) and Mr. Gerry "money matters," (ibid., page 283.) Now, all of these phrases are already applicable to "appropriation bills," by which the Government is carried on, and the inference seems irresistible that the parties who used them must have had such bills in mind.

The third reason advanced by Mr. Sumner was founded on the example of England, which was obviously in the minds of the framers of the Constitution; and he proceeded to explain the English system at length. He then said:

Thus on three accounts, first, by the reason of the thing; secondly, by the familiar use of the descriptive term "money bills" in all the debates; and, thirdly, by the example of England, the conclusion seems irresistible that "appropriation bills," by which the Government is carried on, are within the spirit of the interdict upon the Senate, and that this body cannot originate such bills without a violation of a well-established principle inherited from English jurisprudence, and also without unhinging, according to the language of Colonel Mason in the Federal convention, that compromise by virtue of which the small States are admitted to an equality of representation on this floor.

Then follow in the course of Mr. Sumner's remarks the following question and answer:

Mr. TOUCEY. I would beg leave to ask whether he denies the power of the Senate to originate appropriation bills?

Mr. SUMNER. I have already said that the language in the Constitution seemed to me indefinite. It is not on the face of it clear. I am driven therefore to contemporaneous evidence in order to seek its precise meaning; and referring to that, my conclusion is that according to the spirit of the Constitution it does not belong to this body to originate appropriation bills.

Such was the position of Mr. Charles Sumner, of Massachusetts, upon this subject in 1856. At that time the Senate had a majority of democrats, while the House of Representatives had elected a republican for Speaker, and that party had a controlling majority in the House. While the views of Senator Sumner at that time, or even now, may not be conclusive upon democrats, yet I insist that they ought to be sufficient to satisfy my colleague and the gentlemen upon the other side of this House and the dominant party in the Senate.

But there was further discussion upon this subject at that time. Senator Wilson, of Massachusetts, late Vice-President of the United States, was then a Senator. He said that he should not detain the Senate at length by entering into a further discussion of the question. He only desired to say that he should vote against the proposition; for, said he—Whatever may be the constitutional powers of the Senate to originate general appropriation bills, there can be no doubt of the fact that when the Constitution of the United States was framed, its framers supposed that this was a compromise between the States and the people, that the theory settled in the Constitution was that money bills—general appropriation bills—should originate in the House of Representatives. The debates in the convention referred to by my colleague—the debates in the State convention, as will appear if Senators will examine those debates—abundantly sustain that position.

He further said:

The practice of the Government, of the wise men who framed the Constitution, from the year 1789 to the year 1856, during two entire generations, has been to adhere to this policy.

He also said that he preferred that the House of Representatives, representing the people, should mature the general appropriation bills of the country and take the lead in the appropriation of the money of the country; therefore he hoped that the Senate would make no change whatever.

I commend these views to the gentlemen on the other side of the House. The resolution, however, being one simply of inquiry, was adopted without a division, and the Senate did actually prepare and pass at that session two of the general appropriation bills; but it appears upon examination of the records of Congress that the House paid no attention whatever to the appropriation bills which originated in the Senate, but proceeded, as was the unbroken custom of this body, to mature and pass all the great appropriation bills in the first instance. The House at that session, by disregarding the bills that came from the Senate, asserted its power over appropriation bills and its right to originate such bills to the exclusion of the Senate; and I may here remark that that was the first House of Representatives that ever assembled in this country in which the republican party had a majority sufficient to elect the presiding officer. In fact it was at the very organization of the party, if indeed it can be said to have been organized at all at that time. The majority of that House was rather an opposition majority, composed of all elements then in opposition to the administration of Mr. Pierce.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. Will my colleague inform me what party had control of this House when it passed a joint resolution in regard to the Washington Monument, requiring an appropriation, which originated in the Senate?

Mr. RANDALL. There was no appropriation in it.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. It looks to an appropriation and promises one. Several pension bills have been passed that originated in the other House.

Mr. SPRINGER. Many things of that kind may have been done. I do not refer to penion bills and other minor matters. The Constitution, by its spirit, was framed with reference to the great appropriation bills—the supply bills of the House of Commons. In the Forty-first Congress the question was raised whether the Senate had the right to originate an act to repeal the income tax after the 31st day of December, 1869. The Senate passed the bill and sent it to this House. When it was taken up here, on the 27th of January, 1871, the House passed the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Senate bill (S. No. 1083) to repeal so much of the act approved July 14, 1870, entitled "An act to reduce internal taxes, and for other purposes," as continues the income tax after the 31st day of December, A. D. 1869, be returned to that body, with the respectful suggestion on the part of the House that section 7, article 1, of the Constitution vests in the House of Representatives the sole power to originate such measures.

The bill was returned to the Senate with a copy of said resolution The Senate thereupon asked for a committee of conference on the resolution, with which the House at once complied, as an act of courtesy, the question involved being the prirrilege of the House.

The House conferees were Messrs. Samuel Hooper of Massachusetts, (now deceased,) WILLIAM B. ALLISON of Iowa, and Daniel W. Voorhees of Indiana, and the conferees on the part of the Senate were Messrs. Scott, CONKLING, and Casserly.

At the meeting of the conference committees, the Senate conferees submitted and maintained throughout the conference the following propositions:

First. That the words "all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives," in the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, mean only bills the direct purpose of which is to raise revenue by the levy of taxes, imposts, duties, or excises.

Second. That a bill may originate in the Senate to repeal a law or portion of a law imposing such taxes, duties, imposts, or excise, even if the repeal of such repeal render necessary the imposition of other taxes; and Senate bill No. 1083 being such an act, it is within the constitutional power of the Senate to originate it.

The committee on the part of the House maintained in reply:

That, according to the true intent and meaning of the Constitution, it is the right of the House of Representatives to originate all bills relating directly to taxation, including all bills imposing or remitting taxes; and that in the exercise of this right the House of Representatives shall decide the manner and time of the imposition and remission of all taxes, subject to the right of the Senate to amend any of such bills originating in the House, before they have become a law.

The conference committees were unable to agree, and on the 27th of February Mr. Hooper, in behalf of the House conferees, submitted an elaborate report to the House, which was signed by all the House conferees. This report was printed, (Report No. 42, Forty-first Congress, third session,) but for want of time, the Congress expiring on the 4th of March thereafter, there was no action of the House thereon. But it is important for its intrinsic worth, as well as on account of its presenting the views of the distinguished gentlemen who signed it, if not of the whole House of that Congress. I commend it to my colleague and those upon the other side of this House. This report reviewed the whole history of the clause in the Constitution on this subject, and cited numerous extracts from the debates on the Federal Constitution in support of the position of the House conferees. I may be pardoned from quoting from this report, as its conclusions are important at this time. The House conferees, after the review of the constitutional history, thus present their conclusions in the report to which I have referred:

We have thus given a brief history of the first clause of the seventh section and the compromises and adjustments which led to its insertion in the Constitution. A careful study of the debates will disclose that in all the discussions the words inserted were used as synonymous with the words "money bills" as used in the British constitution. It seems to us, therefore, that a fair interpretation of this clause, whether derived from the interpretation given to it by reason of its analogy to the British constitution or from the debates of the convention, is, that all bills directly affecting the revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives.

And the report of the House conferees, as if in anticipation of just such questions as that which my colleague [Mr. BURCHARD] has put to me, further states:

There are instances where the House has acquiesced in the Senate bills merely for the purpose of facilitating legislation, as, for example, during the present Congress the Senate passed what was known as the funding bill or loan bill and sent it to the House, where it was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; but the committee considered and matured a bill of their own, which was reported to the House and passed. Immediately afterward the committee reported back the Senate bill and moved the bill that had passed the House as a substitute, for the purpose of getting a ready conference upon the bill, thus on the record apparently acquiescing in the action of the Senate; but this could not be quoted as a precedent against the privilege of the House, because, for reasons of convenience, the question was not raised.

The report contains among other and numerous citations of authority the following:

The commentators upon this clause of the Constitution, so far as they have undertaken to interpret its meaning, we think, sustain your committee in their interpretation.

Mr. Justice Story, in discussing this clause, says, (§ 876 of Story on the Constitution:)

"That it is fit the House should possess the exclusive right to originate money bills, since it may be presumed to possess more ample means of local information, and it more directly represents the opinions, feelings, and wishes of the people; and being directly dependent on them for support, it will be more watchful and cautious in the imposition of taxes than a body which emanates exclusively from the States in their political capacity."

Judge Tucker says:

"Now, as the relation between taxation and representation in one branch of the Legislature was fixed by an invariable standard, and as that branch of the Legislature possesses the exclusive right of originating bills on the subject of revenue, the undue weight of the smaller States is guarded against effectually in the imposition of burdens." (1 Tucker's Blackstone, appendix, 195.)

I call the attention of the House and the Senate also, where at least one of its members will recognize in this document principles which he so recently cherished, to the conclusion of this able report:

Your committee think the assertion of the proper privileges of this House in relation to money bills important, in order to preserve that balance of power and influence which the framers of the Constitution intended should be maintained when the clause under consideration was inserted in that instrument, and therefore present, for the consideration of the House, the accompanying resolution:

Resolved, That this House maintains that it is its sole and exclusive privilege to originate all bills directly affecting the revenue, whether such bill be for the imposition, reduction, or repeal of taxes; and in the exercise of this privilege, in the first instance, to limit and appoint the ends, purposes, considerations, and limitations of such bills, whether relating to the matter, manner, measure, or time of their introduction; subject to the right of the Senate to "propose or concur with amendments, as in other bills."

This is the last of the numerous precedents furnished by the legislation of Congress, so far as I am advised, in favor of the position now occupied by the majority of this House.

Mr. HURLBUT. Does the gentleman recognize no difference between an appropriation bill to pay money and a revenue bill to raise money?

Mr. SPRINGER. I recognize the difference that there may be in the provisions of the bills.

Mr. HURLBUT. Does the gentleman recognize the fact that an appropriation bill is not a revenue bill?

Mr. SPRINGER. I recognize the fact that an appropriation bill is that very kind of measure which was intended to be embraced by the terms of the Constitution, and especially in the clause which provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. At least such is the interpretation given to the clause by the framers of the Constitution, by the most authoritative writers on that instrument, and by the most enlightened statesmen of our country.

Mr. BURCHARD, of Illinois. If my colleague will allow me, I will say that I have been familiar with the discussions that have occurred upon this subject some years ago, and I never knew it maintained in the House that the Senate could not originate bills appropriating money. But it was contended that they had no right to originate revenue bills, and in the Forty-first and Forty-second Congresses we sent back to the Senate bills which had been passed by that body for the raising of revenue, tax bills, which we claimed that they had not the right to pass. But it was never held that the Senate had not the right to originate an appropriation bill. It has been a practice that the general appropriation bills should originate in this House, and it is a practice worthy of being maintained; but I never heard it claimed upon this floor until this session that they had no right to originate appropriation bills, and I think that if the gentleman will examine the debates on the Constitution and the original draught of the Constitution he will find that the power was conceded to the other branch to originate an appropriation bill. The practice in the British Parliament is different, for it is provided there that "all grants and subsidies for parliamentary aid shall begin in the House of Commons," and that language applies to appropriation bills as well as revenue bills. But the language of our Constitution is confined to bills for raising revenue. I hope the gentleman will answer this point in his remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. I think I have cited authorities which are conclusive upon this subject. Appropriation bills which originate in the Senate have been uniformly rejected in the House. The constitutional right that the Senate has is to propose amendments, but when "it adheres it is revolution; that is what it is; absolute revolution." This House has the sole right to originate revenue bills. The Senate has the right to propose amendments to them, but if they are not acceptable to the House the Senate must recede. That is the condition of this bill and other appropriation bills. The Senate has exercised its constitutional right to propose amendments and this House insists on the passage of the bills as they came from the House. Now the Senate must recede or they will become responsible for all the consequences that may follow.

I have been somewhat lengthy in my remarks concerning the power of the House to originate all money bills. The question between the two Houses of Congress at this time does not turn upon the power of the House to originate the appropriation bills, for all these bills have originated in the House without question. But the question is of the highest importance in the present dead lock between the two Houses for this reason: If it be conceded that the House has the exclusive right to originate these bills, then the right of the Senate is limited to the power of proposing amendments. The party proposing is the innovating party; and after conference between the two Houses, if the House should insist upon its original bills, the Senate ought to recede. It must recede, else the power of the House to originate money bills is of no importance whatever; for the Senate may amend by incorporating upon the House bills amendments entirely changing the character thereof. The Senate, under the Constitution, may propose such amendments; but it cannot adhere to them. The Senate may propose and may insist and ask a conference, but to adhere is revolution; yes, it is nullification. It would render null and void one of the most important compromise provisions of the Constitution.

I thank the Secretary of the Treasury for his admission that the party proposing an amendment was the innovating party, and that the innovating party must in the end retire. The Secretary referred to appropriations which changed existing law in reference to salaries. But as to these, his innovating theory is not correct. There are but two classes of salaries protected by the Constitution, the salary of the President and those of the judges of Federal courts. Members of Congress are elected for a stated period, but their salaries have so often been changed during their terms of office that the subject is wholly within legislative control. So far as other officers of the Government are concerned—officers appointed by the President and removable almost at his will—there is no obligation on the part of the Government to pay any sum of money beyond what Congress may from time to time appropriate. If Congress does not appropriate a sufficient sum, any official who feels aggrieved may resign. The Government has no contracts to carry out in reference to such salaries.

I have been amazed at the assertion that the Government owed these officials the sums heretofore fixed by Congress, and that we must vote those amounts and continue to vote them until both Houses of Congress and the President should conclude to pass a general law changing such salaries. Upon this theory, should the House and the Senate both concur in reducing the salaries, the President would have the right to veto such bills, and thus prevent all measures of retrenchment, changing existing law, unless two-thirds of each House should override the executive veto. That the President might do this, that he has the power to do so, cannot be denied. But it is not a question of power; it is a question of right, of justice. Would the President be justified in such an unwarrantable exercise of the veto power? Upon questions of revenue and appropriations, I maintain that the House, in the exercise of its constitutional prerogatives, can alone originate the general measures of legislation; and that, when so originated and submitted to the other departments of Government, after all propositions of amendment and conferences have been ended, its judgment ought to be respected.

Gentlemen may quibble about the power of the Senate as a coordinate branch of Government and the power of the President to veto any measure, and use these terms with various and varied meanings. But when it comes to a disagreement between the two Houses upon revenue and appropriation bills, which House, I ask, by all the rules of legislative propriety, ought to have the controlling influence? The House is the most numerous body. It is elected directly by the people for a term of two years only. Its members are apportioned among the States according to population, giving an equal representation to all sections. By all the authorities it is agreed that bills to raise revenue must originate in the House, and that this power was conferred upon that body in order to give it the controlling influence upon such bills. Whether this includes appropriation bills or not, the spirit of the Constitution would include such bills. The Congress cannot appropriate a greater sum than can be raised by taxation or loans. If the Senate can insist upon larger appropriations than can be met by the revenue of the Government, the bills for which, the House alone can originate, then the superior power of the House over revenue bills becomes a meaningless platitude, a "barren ideality." For this reason, then, as a matter of common sense and legislative propriety, if for no more sacred reason, I maintain the superior authority of the House over all money bills.

The Senate is elected by the respective States. The little State of Rhode Island has the same voice in that body as does the great State of New York. Upon these appropriation bills and the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, the two Rhode Island Senators claim the same influence and voice as that exercised by the thirty-three Representatives of New York upon this floor. In the one State there is a population of 217,353; in the other of 4,382,759. In this House the representation is according to population, and the right of voting away the people's revenue is equalized. But when the Senate sets itself up upon this question as superior to the House it asserts the voice of two Senators as equal to that of thirty-three Representatives in a matter affecting taxation and appropriations. If there were no provision of the Constitution on the subject, which body ought to yield on a question of this kind? I appeal to the candid judgment of members upon the other side of this House on this subject; I appeal to the judgment of the Senate itself; and above all and before all, I appeal to the great body of the American people, who furnish the revenue to support the Government, for their decision upon this question of retrenchment. In reference to taxation and appropriations, which of the three law-making powers, the House, the Senate, or the President, should have the superior voice? The immediate Representatives of the people, in the most numerous branch of the legislative department, in the contest between the two Houses and before the country at this time, will insist upon their superior control over the purse-strings of the people.

We have tendered to all the Departments of the Government a sufficient sum of money for an honest and economical administration of every branch of the public service. In reducing salaries and other expenses, we are but carrying out the popular will and responding to the depressed condition of all the business interests of the country. We think we know what the people desire in this matter. We believe we are representing them and their best interests They have been compelled to reduce their own expenses. Merchants and manufacturers have reduced the salaries and the per diem of their clerks and employés. Thousands are out of employment and other thousands are begging for bread. The price of living has largely decreased in every part of the country. All classes and conditions of society, without exception, have been compelled to retrench and economize. But one class has defied hitherto hard times and the House of Representatives. I refer to the office-holders of the Government. These are merry and fat while the people mourn and are depleted of their substance.

Let panics come and sweep down the great business houses of the land like a tornado does the giant oaks; let the floods descend and destroy whole regions of growing crops; let the grasshopper, like the plagues of Egypt, light upon the Western States and consume every green substance; let debts oppress and mortgages harass; let crops fail and railroads go into the hands of receivers; let all these things and worse befall others, there is one class of our people who are undisturbed. They are the office-holders. They care not "for the pestilence that walketh in darkness, nor for the destruction that wasteth at noonday." Come what may they are still happy and still rely with confidence upon the credulity of the people and the Senate of the United States to protect them. They have eaten of the imperial meat of Cæsar—our Cæsar—until they have grown exceeding great, at least in their own imaginations. They bestride the continent, like a Colossus, and overshadow all interests and control all sections. Their name is legion. They elect Senators, nominate Representatives and Presidents, and control wards, cities, counties, and States. There is no place "where their voice is not heard." They are now demanding their usual allowances from the people's purse. They will suffer no reduction; they must have enough for themselves and for the campaign committees also. Now, of all other times, would be most inconvenient to them to submit to a reduction of salaries. The election must be carried for their favorite candidates, and this will cost money. The usual assessments for campaign purposes will soon be made. Every man must pay up or lose his official head. Hence no reductions will be tolerated. The Senate must stand firm for high salaries. The House must yield. The people's money must be appropriated for the benefit of those who live upon the taxes.

Such is the contest now presented to the country by the two Houses of Congress. It is to be remarked that no bill has passed this House at this session reducing taxation. And why? Because no such reduction is possible in the present condition of the country. We have cut down appropriations between thirty and forty millions of dollars, but this reduction was necessary to meet the falling off of the revenue consequent upon the general depression of business through the country. The Senate must agree to the reductions proposed by the House, or else both Houses must agree to increased taxation to the amount of these reductions. This is the alternative. The House, in the exercise of its constitutional prerogative, has not originated and passed any bill to raise additional revenue. The appropriation bills as passed by the House will consume all the revenue that existing laws will produce. How unreasonable, then, is it for the Senate to insist upon appropriating more money for the ensuing year than will come into the Treasury from the taxation provided by law. Will the Senate force a deficit, or acquiesce in such appropriations as can be met by the existing law of the land?

Sir, history repeats itself. In 1858 this House was engaged in a similar contest with the Senate, at least it would so appear to one who should read the debates of this House at that time. A distinguished leader of the party in power, Hon. JOHN SHERMAN, of Ohio, was then a Representative of the people upon this floor. No stronger argument in favor of the power of the House over money bills can be cited than the speeches of this gentleman at that time. I fear he has changed with the changing times; but the great principles which he then uttered will never change. On the 27th of May, 1858, Mr. SHERMAN, rising to the sublime height of a true Representative of the people and speaking more for posterity than for the then present, said:

> Sir, retrenchment and reform are now matters of imperative necessity. It is not the mere cry of demagogues, but a problem demanding the attention and worthy the highest ability of the representatives of the people. No party is fit to govern this country who cannot solve it. It is in vain to look to executive officers for reform. Their power and influence depend upon executive patronage, and while we grant they will squander. The Senate is neither by the theory of our system nor by its composition fitted for the task. This House alone has the constitutional power to perfect a radical reform. The Constitution provides that no money shall be drawn from the Treasury but in consequence of appropriations made by law, and that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. These provisions were designed to invest in this House the entire control of the public purse, the power of supply. This is invested in the House of Commons and has been jealously guarded by it. It is the pearl beyond price, without which constitutional liberty in England would long since have fallen under the despotism of the Crown. By the exercise of this power we may hold the Executive and the Senate in check. But instead of using it this House has by slow degrees allowed the other departments of the Government to evade and virtually overthrow its constitutional power.—Congressional Globe, first session Thirty-fifth Congress, volume 36, page 2432.

In what way had the House allowed the Senate thus to overthrow its constitutional power? Mr. SHERMAN answered this question fully. He said:

> The Senate also has been guilty of an invasion of our privileges. When we send bills there they are returned to us loaded down with amendments for the very sums which we refused to give. They send these amendments here, and we are impliedly told that unless we agree to them the entire appropriation bill will fall and Congress be called back in extra session.—Ibid. page 2432.

This exactly expresses the situation at this time between the two Houses of Congress. The Senate has returned every general appropriation bill passed by this House loaded down with amendments. The legislative, executive, and judicial bill was literally snowed under with senatorial amendments to the number of nearly one thousand, and the amounts appropriated by the House bill were increased by these amendments nearly $4,000,000. If Representative SHERMAN could see in 1858 such an overthrowing of the constitutional rights of the House as eloquently described by him, what must be his utter horror at this time when he beholds the Senate of to-day piling Ossa on Pelion, amendment upon amendment, and heaping up millions on millions. Such conduct on the part of the Senate was fitly described by Mr. Representative SHERMAN in the speech on this floor from which I have already quoted. At that time Mr. SHERMAN said:

The Constitution of the United States gives to the Senate power to propose amendments to revenue bills, but expressly withholds from it power to originate such bills. But by the abuse of their limited power to amend they defeat the exclusive power of the House. But not only that, the Senate at this session by direct usurpation has exercised the power which the Constitution confers upon this House alone.

And further:

Instead of a representative republic we are degenerating into a bureaucracy governed by red tape and subaltern clerks. While the powers of the House are invaded the Executive takes care to extend by construction his just powers.

I have thus quoted from the distinguished author of these extracts and from Seward, Sumner, Henry Wilson, and others for the purpose of showing that the House of Representatives in its present efforts in behalf of retrenchment is sustained on principle by the very highest authorities in the republican party; not the republican leaders of to-day, perhaps, but as they represented themselves in the infancy of the party, that infancy which implies purity and honesty of purpose. If the authorities shall be sufficient to convince the gentlemen upon the other side of this House, or those at the other end of the Capitol or at the other end of the Avenue, I shall be more than repaid for the effort I have made to throw some light on this subject.

The present position of the House has been assailed on account of provisions ingrafted upon appropriation bills changing existing law. With a few exceptions, such provisions are reductions of official salaries, and all such provisions are in the line of retrenchment. No provision has been ingrafted upon an appropriation bill by this House which did not come within our new Rule 120. This rule has been strictly construed by this House, and in every instance it has appeared upon the face of the provision itself that it did retrench expenses. But whence came this new light upon this subject? Of all bodies in the country the Senate is the last that should complain of such legislation. It has been the uniform practice of the Senate and the House for many years to ingraft new legislation upon appropriation bills. But the difference has been this: At former sessions of Congress such new provisions invariably increased expenditures or had no reference to expenditures whatever.

To cite instances of such legislation by previous sessions of Congress would be almost a waste of time. The glaring cases of general legislation forced upon appropriation bills since the close of the war are too fresh in the minds of the people to need any specific reference to them. Provisions the most odious, the most extravagant, the most disgraceful I had almost said, have, from time to time, been forced through Congress on appropriation bills by means of conference committees and otherwise. The various bills raising the salaries of members of Congress and other officials, giving back-pay, &c.; the increase, in the interest of express companies, of the postage on third-class mail matter; the re-organization of the consular and diplomatic service by the first session of the last Congress, in which the salaries were largely increased; the provision for the appointment of a Public Printer, at the same session; and the provisions classifying postmasters; the first act ever passed giving colored persons the right to testify in the courts, and innumerable other acts of general legislation were all passed as parts of general appropriation bills.

If Representatives on the other side of the House and Senators desire to examine a notable case of this kind, I refer them to the post-office appropriation bill which passed June 23, 1874. (Statutes at Large, volume 18, pages 232 to 237.) Here will be found five pages of general legislation, and some of it of the most vicious character, all tacked upon an appropriation bill. But while a vast amount of legislation has been accomplished in this way, both Houses of Congress have, from time to time, and notably at the close of the last Congress, attempted to ride appropriation bills with the most obnoxious partisan legislation. These attempts failed, but no thanks to those who are now so earnest in denouncing the retrenchment legislation of this House upon appropriation bills. Nothing could defeat those attempts but the most stubborn resistance on the part of the minority on this floor and in the Senate.

In conclusion, and by way of recapitulation, permit me to say further that the Constitution of the United States, if not by its strict letter, at least by its evident intent and spirit, having lodged in the House the sole right to originate all money bills, and the Senate having only the right to propose amendments, it becomes important to consider the relative positions of the two bodies on the pending appropriation bills. The House has originated and passed these bills as provided by the Constitution and in pursuance of the unbroken practice of this House from the adoption of the Federal Constitution to the present time. The Senate has proposed numerous amendments to these bills. What is the meaning of the word "propose?" Webster defines it thus:

To offer for consideration, discussion, acceptance, or adoption; as, to propose a bill or resolve to a legislative body; to propose terms of peace; to propose a question for discussion; * * * to propose alterations or amendments in a law

The power of the Senate, then, so far as appropriation bills are concerned, is limited to that of proposing amendments for the consideration, acceptance, or adoption by the House. If the House concur, very well; if not, the Senate must recede. It has no right to adhere to amendments; only the right to propose.

I know of no parliamentary meaning which the word has different from that which is here given from Webster. We are told that our bills change existing law in reference to salaries. But so far as this is concerned, I answer that we must change the law as to salaries by reducing them or we must change the laws in reference to taxes by increasing them. Shall we have reduced salaries or increased taxation? That is the question to be decided by this House. That is the question involved in the present dead lock.

In this centennial year of our nation's existence let us emulate the example of our fathers in their contests for the right.

In their ragged regimentals
Stood the old Continentals,
Yielding not.

So let us, their descendants, now enjoying the fruits of their sacrifices, stand firm for the right, "yielding not." If we do, I am sure we will receive the approval of a tax-burdened people and prove ourselves worthy of the new century upon which we have just entered.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. Will the gentleman allow me a single question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I cannot yield. I have agreed with the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] to move the previous question at the close of my remarks.

Mr. RANDALL. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. SPRINGER] will now call the previous question.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. I desire to ask the gentleman a question in the line of his remarks.

Mr. SPRINGER. I see the House is impatient; I do not desire to exclude any question of the gentleman.

Mr. CANNON, of Illinois. It is a little bit of a question.

Mr. SPRINGER. I must insist upon the previous question.

Mr. FOSTER. Before the previous question is put I desire to make a statement to the House upon a question of privilege, and I ask the attention of the gentleman from Mississippi, [Mr. SINGLETON.]

There was no objection, and leave was granted accordingly.

Mr. FOSTER. In the heat of the moment I applied epithets to the gentleman from Mississippi which after reflection I wish to retract and withdraw. I do not believe he intended to charge me with falsehood and deceit, as I at the moment thought he had. I wish no personal unkindness with the gentleman from Mississippi, or in any way to violate the proprieties of debate.

Mr. SINGLETON. I am very glad indeed the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FOSTER] has said this. We have heretofore been upon the best footing in the world, and have never before had any misunderstanding. The gentleman pitched into me in a pretty strong way, and I came back at him in the same way. Now, as he withdraws his language, we are on exactly our old footing. I do not desire to have any difficulty with any one, but I have always felt it to be due to myself to maintain my rights.

Mr. SPRINGER. I now move the previous question, as I promised the gentleman from Mississippi to do so at this time.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. SINGLETON] that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and request a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

PUBLIC PRINTING.

Mr. RANDALL. I desire to report a bill from the Committee on Appropriations which should be passed to-day.

There was no objection, and the bill (H. R. No. 3884) to continue the act entitled "An act to continue the public printing" was received and read a first and second time.

The question was upon ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill provides that the provisions of an act entitled "An act to continue the public printing," approved June 30, 1876, shall be extended and continued in full force and effect for a period of ten days from and after the 10th day of July, 1876, and no longer.

Mr. RANDALL. I now call the previous question on the bill.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPEAL OF RESUMPTION ACT.

Mr. HOLMAN. I ask unanimous consent to submit a resolution for adoption at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the resolution, after which objection to its present consideration will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Banking and Currency be, and they are hereby, instructed to report to the House the following bill, and that the same be made the special order for Thursday next after the morning hour and be open for consideration and amendment, to wit:

A bill in relation to the currency.

Mr. KASSON. I object to that resolution.

Mr. RANDALL. Let the bill be read.

Mr. KASSON. I will object to it any way.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., That so much of the act entitled "An act to provide for the resumption of specie payments," approved January 14, 1875, as authorized the Secretary of the Treasury to redeem in coin United States notes be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. HOLMAN. This is simply to give the Committee on Banking and Currency authority to report such a bill for consideration and amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I object; the committee has ample power now.

Mr. HOLMAN. I move that the rules be suspended and the resolution be adopted.

Mr. SEELYE. Will the gentleman allow me a single inquiry?

Mr. RANDALL. Debate is not in order; I call for the regular order.

Mr. EAMES. I move that the House now adjourn.

The motion to adjourn was not agreed to.

The question recurred upon the motion of Mr. HOLMAN to suspend the rules and adopt the resolution read by the Clerk.

Mr. HOLMAN and Mr. HOSKINS called for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and there were—yeas 105, nays 96, not voting 86; as follows:

So the motion was not agreed to.

During the roll-call,

Mr. COCHRANE said: My colleague, Mr. STENGER, is absent on account of ill health.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HOLMAN. I wish to say that to-morrow can be very conveniently employed by the committees of conference; and if the House will adjourn till the day after to-morrow it is believed that business will be thereby very materially facilitated. I therefore move that when the House adjourns to-day it be to meet on Wednesday next.

IN SENATE.

TUESDAY, July 11, 1876.

The Senate met at twelve o'clock m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read.

CORRECTION OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I rise to the Journal. I think, in regard to a report of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. THURMAN,] from the Committee on Private Land Claims, the Santillan land grant, the Journal does not show that any action was taken on the report. My recollection is that the report was adopted and the bill was indefinitely postponed, if it was a bill.

Mr. THURMAN. Yes; the bill was postponed indefinitely and the committee were discharged from the further consideration of the petition.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move the Journal be amended so as to show the fact.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That correction will be made.

The Journal was approved.

PROPOSED LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

Mr. THURMAN. I rise to request that half an hour be taken for legislative business before we proceed to the trial. There are several bills which ought to be considered to-day—it is very important that they should be—and there are some reports that ought to be made. I do not know whether we must first go into trial before we can postpone it or whether such an order can be made now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It will be necessary to go into trial before the motion can be entertained.

Mr. THURMAN. Then I give notice that when we proceed to the trial I shall move that a recess be taken for half an hour.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived, the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

Mr. CONKLING. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask the Senator to withdraw his motion for a moment.

Mr. CONKLING. For what purpose?

Mr. ALLISON. In order to make a report from a committee.

Mr. CONKLING. I withdraw it for a report from a committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask the Senator who made the motion to adjourn to withdraw it in order that I may move that when the Senate adjourn its legislative session it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. What is the special object of that?

Mr. THURMAN. It is necessary for the purpose of disposing of the legislative business of the Senate pressing upon us.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New York moves that the Senate do now adjourn, the Chair understands.

Mr. CONKLING. I do. I do not want to meet to-morrow at eleven o'clock.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask leave to make a report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from New York yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. CONKLING. I do, for the purpose of allowing the Senator to make a report.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. ALLISON, from the Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, reported it with amendments.

Mr. OGLESBY. I ask leave to make a report. I am directed by the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2284) to amend section 2324 of the Revised Statutes concerning mineral lands, to ask to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Mines and Mining. The subject is one entirely under the control of that committee, and has no relation to public lands whatever.

The report was agreed to.

AMENDMENT OF BANKRUPT LAW.

Mr. THURMAN. The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States,' approved March 2, 1867, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, direct me to report it back to the Senate with the recommendation that the Senate disagree to the amendment made by the House, and ask for a committee of conference. I hope that it will be done at once. The bill ought to be passed as soon as it can. I ask that the bill may be considered for that purpose and that the recommendation of the committee may be agreed to.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio moves that the Senate disagree to the amendment of the House to the bill and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the committee of conference on the part of the Senate; and Mr. EDMUNDS, Mr. THURMAN, and Mr. WRIGHT were appointed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to ask to be excused from service on that committee, certainly as its chairman. My honorable friend from Ohio has had charge of the matter, and I ask of the Chair that I may be either excused or put at the foot of the committee, one or the other, as he understands more about it than I do.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to reversing the order. The Chair hears none, and the committee will stand thus: The Senator from Ohio, Mr. THURMAN, the Senator from Iowa, Mr. WRIGHT, and the Senator from Vermont, Mr. EDMUNDS.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

Mr. CONKLING. Pending that I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to; there being on a division—ayes 15, noes 25.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, that when the Senate adjourns it be to meet at eleven o'clock to-morrow.

The motion was agreed to.

JOHN S. DICKSON.

Mr. HOWE. Last evening I asked the Senate to consider House bill No. 2404, but it was in a little too much of a hurry to do it then. I ask the Senate to take up the bill now.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the Senate now adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I object to any business being interposed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator cannot make an objection. The Senator from Wisconsin has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. HOWE. For what purpose?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. For an objection to the Senator introducing the business he proposes.

Mr. HOWE. The business is already introduced. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 2404.

Mr. ROBERTSON. What is it for?

Mr. HOWE. Simply to pay a soldier for a few months' service. It is a House bill.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Is the bill on the Calendar?

Mr. HOWE. Yes, sir.

Mr. ROBERTSON. Will one objection carry it over?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is for the Senate to decide.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the title of the bill read.

The Chief Clerk read the bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners, by its title.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. GORDON. Will the Senator allow me to have an order made?

Mr. HOWE. Will the Senator from South Carolina withdraw his motion?

Mr. ROBERTSON. The Senator's bill can be passed to-morrow in the morning hour.

Mr. HOWE. I hope the Senate will not adjourn now. I was coaxed out of pressing the motion to take the bill up last night. We should have passed it before this time, if the Senator had not interfered.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is a little bill. Let us consider it.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I will yield, then.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from South Carolina yields to the Senator from Wisconsin, who moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill which he has named.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners. It authorizes the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to John S. Dickson, late captain of Company B, paroled prisoners of Wisconsin Volunteers, the full pay and allowances of a captain of infantry for the period of nine months and twenty days, this being the time he served as captain of Company B, paroled prisoners, deducting therefrom the amount of pay received by him as sergeant of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment Wisconsin Volunteers.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What does it mean? I wish the Senator would explain it in a word.

Mr. ALLISON. Is there a written report?

Mr. HOWE. There is a written report, which is very brief.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Tell us in a word what it is.

Mr. HOWE. Mr. Dickson was a paroled prisoner of war. He was a sergeant in the company mentioned in the bill. He received the pay of a sergeant, but he was put on duty against the Indians with the rank of captain—while he was paroled—somewhere up in the Northwest. The report states the facts. This bill proposes to give him the pay of a captain, deducting the pay of a sergeant.

Mr. WITHERS. Was he ever commissioned as captain?

Mr. HOWE. No; he was not commissioned by the President as a captain.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then we cannot pay him.

Mr. HOWE. But he was serving by the direction of the commander of the department, I think General Pope; I am not certain who the general was.

Mr. OGLESBY. What committee does the bill come from?

Mr. HOWE. The Committee on Military Affairs of the Senate, and it has passed the House.

Mr. LOGAN. We adopted the House report.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us hear the report.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The report will be read.

The Chief Clerk read the following report, submitted by Mr. BANNING from the Committee on Military Affairs of the House of Representatives April 7:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, having had the same under consideration, report back the accompanying bill and recommend its passage.

The committee find that John S. Dickson, late a sergeant of Company C, Eighteenth Regiment of Wisconsin Volunteers, was, on or about the 9th day of October, 1862, appointed, by order of Major-General John Pope, then in command of the Department of the Northwest, a captain of Company B, of Wisconsin Paroled Prisoners of War. That he, in obedience to the order, entered upon the discharge of the duties of such captain, having a full captain's command, and serving in the field against the Indians, this being a command separate and distinct from that of his regiment during the war of the rebellion, and clothed and subsisted himself as such, and took all the responsibilities of a captain. That he continued in the discharge of these duties for the period of nine months and twenty days. He, upon being relieved, returned to his regiment, and has received no pay except such as he was entitled to as a sergeant in his regiment. The evidence shows that he did his duty regularly and honorably. He earned the pay of a captain, and should have it. The committee regard this case as an exception to those cases in which the duties of officers have been discharged by soldiers without commissions or regular commands. This duty was a special one; was, under the circumstances, one that could be performed by no other officer at hand. This peculiar service of an officer of paroled prisoners by special order is as worthy of recognition and compensation as any other official military service.

Mr. MAXEY. I ask the Senator from Wisconsin if at that time a major-general had any authority of law to appoint a man a captain.

Mr. HOWE. None of law that I know of.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

IN SENATE.

WEDNESDAY, July 12, 1876.

The Senate met at eleven o'clock a. m.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. BYRON SUNDERLAND, D. D.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After four minutes spent in executive session the doors were re-opened.

AMENDMENT OF PACIFIC RAILROAD ACTS.

The bill (H. R. No. 3672) to amend the act approved July 2, 1864, entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes,' approved July 1, 1862," and other acts in relation to the railroad companies therein mentioned, was read twice by its title.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be referred to the Committee on Railroads, if there be no objection.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I move that the bill be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary. The Committee on the Judiciary was instructed by a resolution of the Senate to inquire into precisely the condition of things that this House bill covers. We have been making that inquiry and have perfected a bill upon the subject which is analogous to this bill in its main features, looking in fact to the same object and in a large degree in the same way. I think it more convenient to get the two Houses to united action upon one bill that this bill should be considered, after the resolution of the Senate which was adopted some time since by that committee, rather than by the Railroad Committee. Therefore, I feel it to be my duty, in the interest of getting the united action of the two Houses, to make this motion.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I do not know that it is material to what committee this bill shall be referred. I do not know that any more speedy action can be anticipated through the efforts of the Judiciary Committee than of the committee indicated by the Chair as the one to which it should be referred.

With respect to what the Senator from Vermont, the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, has said, I merely wish to reply that, although the matter was originally committed to his committee by a resolution of this body on the 7th of January and by some subsequent proceedings, yet up to this hour we have heard nothing from the Judiciary Committee in connection with this proposed legislation. It would seem as if after a certain consideration of the subject the committee itself tired of it, because after it had the subject under consideration for some three months the chairman of the Judiciary Committee himself introduced a measure in this body looking to similar legislation, and asked that it should be referred to the Committee on Railroads. Thus the Committee on Railroads was charged with the investigation and consideration of this measure at the request of the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, though acting in his individual capacity as a Senator. It took the matter under consideration; it devoted time and labor to it, and reported a measure to the Senate. That measure lies upon your table, sir, liable to be called up at any time. If there is any analogy in the legislation it is quite as competent to be referred to the Committee on Railroads as to the other committee. I must contend, however, that where a committee is intrusted once with a question, pending action in another committee, when it has reported its action, any subsequent proceedings would naturally devolve upon it.

A reference of this bill to the Committee on Railroads would not interfere with any action by the Senate or by the Judiciary Committee. If, in pursuance of a duty with which they have been charged, the Judiciary Committee are ready to report any measure, doubtless it will receive the consideration of the Senate; but all the usual comity of this body, I think, is in favor of the committal of this bill to the committee which has been suggested by the Chair.

Mr. EDMUNDS. My friend from Louisiana exhibits a little more interest in this subject than I thought he would, which has led him to make use of an argument that is very far from being sound. That argument is that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee has done something in this body tending to show that the Judiciary Committee were desiring to get rid of doing a duty that the Senate, by an absolute order in the form of a commanding resolution, had required them to do, because the Senator who happens to be the chairman of that committee afterward introduced a bill on the subject of the Pacific Railroad and had it sent to the Committee on Railroads. My honorable friend could not have heard me then; somebody must have told it to him, for if he had heard me he would not have stated what he did. If he will look at the RECORD he will find that I stated when I introduced the bill that I introduced it by request, and moved that it be referred to that committee.

Mr. WEST. Where did the request originate for the reference?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The request for the reference originated with the railroad gentlemen who got up the bill, with whom I am acquainted, and who had been before the Judiciary Committee over and over again upon the subject that we had in our charge, and upon which we were commanded to act, and upon which we were getting facts. Then when they brought me this bill and asked me if I had any objection to introduce it, I said, "Not the slightest," and I stated to them that I should do it by request; that I did not choose to examine it, and judging from their conversation as to what it contained it would not be at all agreeable to my mind; but that whatever they wanted done with the bill, as they were respectable gentlemen, of course as a Senator I would do it with great pleasure. They wanted it referred to the Railroad Committee. I said, "Very well; it is nothing to me in introducing your bill by request. I do not care; the Senate has commanded us to do a certain thing that we shall undoubtedly do."

That bill was referred to the Railroad Committee. The Senate will remember that it was the bill which provided for the Government taking back the lands upon which it already has a complete lien in satisfaction of its debt, as far as they would go, or for a sinking fund; I do not remember the details, and of course should not go into them. It went to the Railroad Committee. The Railroad Committee has reported upon that bill favorably, changing it so that it is less obnoxious than it was before; but still to my mind it is very obnoxious in respect of the general method that it proposes to compel these railroad companies to do justice to the people of the United States, the tax-payers, and the Treasury.

Then, Mr. President, as I have said, acting under the express order of the Senate and not by the mere reference of a bill, we have endeavored carefully, faithfully, and patiently to do our duty in examining into the judicial situation—and that is all there is to it—between these companies and the United States, to find out what their legal rights are and what are the legal rights of the Government, and then to adopt the necessary legislation to have those legal rights put into due order and force for the benefit of all concerned. That we have endeavored to do, and we are ready to report. As I say, this House bill is a bill similar to that which we have agreed on. It is a bill to regulate the judicial rights of these parties and to bring them to a focus, and is not a bill to take back lands, or anything concerning the general policy of railroad management. Therefore, in the nature of the thing, it is a bill that properly belongs to the consideration of the Judicial Committee of this body, if we care anything about the substance rather than the name of questions that are to be covered. Of course in the personal sense it is far from being of the slightest consequence to me.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, there are several considerations that make a reference of this bill to the Judiciary Committee the proper reference. In the first place, a bill was referred to the Railroad Committee; that committee has reported upon it, and its reference is exhausted; but the matter referred to the Judiciary Committee has not been reported upon yet, and will be this morning only in part, leaving the subject still before that committee, which makes it proper that this bill should go to that committee which still has the subject under consideration.

In the second place, it has been truly said by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee that the only questions likely to give rise to difficulty in the minds of Senators are legal questions, and those questions properly belong to the Judiciary Committee.

But, in the third place, it is a fit rule of parliamentary law not to send a child to a nurse that cares not for it, to use a quotation from the parliamentary manuals so often repeated to us by the late Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. Sumner.] Now the Railroad Committee has reported a bill altogether inconsistent with the provisions of this House bill. To send this bill to the Railroad Committee is to send it to a nurse that cares not for it, nay, more, that is hostile to it. The report that the Judiciary Committee will make as soon as the committees are called for reports will show that in the main the House and the Judiciary Committee of the Senate concur; and therefore it is proper that this House bill should be sent to that committee. It is certainly a fixed rule of parliamentary proceeding to send a measure to a committee that is not hostile to it, but to one that is in favor of it, or at least that is indifferent.

For these reasons I hope that this bill will be sent to the Judiciary Committee. If sent to the Railroad Committee, you are sending the bill to a hostile committee.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, the assumption made by the Senator from Ohio is scarcely warranted by the facts. There is no reason to know that the Committee on Railroads would be any way hostile to this arrangement.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What you have reported is altogether inconsistent with it.

Mr. WEST. The Committee on Railroads are quite as anxious and have spent more time and have given greater consideration to the settlement of this matter, I am sure, than the Committee on the Judiciary, because in six weeks we came to a conclusion, when the Judiciary Committee has not done it in six months.

Mr. THURMAN. That only shows that we gave greater consideration.

Mr. WEST. I do not know that. We worked, and perhaps the Judiciary Committee had something else to do. The proposition that we had before us was one concerning the return of the lands. We considered that. Now if another proposition comes before us we may consider that; and there is no reason in the world to suppose that we shall not act with as much regard for the interests of the Government of the United States as the Committee on the Judiciary. But I say it is something beyond my experience in this body that a committee shall be used for the convenience of any other committee. I say that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee referred this question by his own action to the Committee on Railroads. He did say that he introduced the bill by request, but he did not say that he asked for the reference by request. I waived the point when these questions were introduced, and allowed them to go to the Judiciary Committee until the Judiciary Committee returned them back upon us. I am speaking for my committee, and at their request, and by their direction, not that I have any personal feeling in it at all; but as the representative of the Committee on Railroads I am bound to represent their views here, and they ask, and have by a vote of the committee asked, that this bill should take the regular course suggested by the Chair.

Mr. THURMAN. Mr. President, I am wholly unconscious of having uttered a word that by any possibility could be construed into a reflection upon the Railroad Committee.

Mr. WEST. I did not say the Senator had.

Mr. THURMAN. When I spoke of that committee being hostile to this measure which has come from the House of Representatives, I spoke with regard to the bill which the Railroad Committee has reported; and any Senator who will take that bill and the House bill will see that the views of the Railroad Committee and of the House are almost, if not altogether irreconcilable, and, therefore, I say again that to send this bill to the Railroad Committee is to send it to a nurse that not only cares not for it, but that dislikes it.

Now, sir, one word as to the Judiciary Committee. The Judiciary Committee has not turned off any work; the Judiciary Committee has not brought back any bill into the Senate and asked that it might be referred to the Railroad Committee. The bill that was referred to the Railroad Committee was introduced by a Senator; it never went to the Judiciary Committee at all; but on that Senator's motion, and for reasons that he can explain, it was sent to the Railroad Committee.

But there is no necessity for going back into that. Here is a subject that is still before the Judiciary Committee, but upon which the Railroad Committee has exhausted the reference to it. That of itself is a sufficient reason for sending it to the Judiciary Committee. But when you consider that the questions really are legal questions, at least those about which there will be any material discussion, and when you consider that the bill which the Judiciary Committee will report will be more in accordance with the House bill than the bill reported by the Railroad Committee, I do not see how there can be the slightest doubt as to the parliamentary rule that this bill should go to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. KELLY. Mr. President, I differ with my friend from Ohio, and think that the appropriate committee in this case is the one that has been considering a kindred bill or a bill for the settlement of the financial matters between the railroad companies and the United States. That committee has had this matter under consideration not only for weeks but for months, investigating the whole matter, and as every Senator here is aware it is a matter of no little complication. The adjudications of the Court of Claims, affirmed by the Supreme Court, settle certain rights of the companies and of the United States as to the 5 per cent. that the railroad companies must pay to the United States. This and other questions have been fully investigated by the Railroad Committee, the appropriate committee, the committee to which these railroad matters have ever been referred.

Now, why should the subject be taken away from that committee and transferred to the Committee on the Judiciary? It is very true that some questions, questions of great importance, I admit judicial questions, might be referred to that committee; but here is not a question simply of law, it is a question of the best policy for the United States to pursue in the settlement of this controverted matter; and as that has been heretofore the appropriate committee to refer railroad matters to, I do not see why we should depart from it now. It is very probable that our Railroad Committee may differ from the Railroad Committee of the House; but why not? Have we not a perfect right to differ?

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Railroad Committee of the House did not report this bill, but the Judiciary Committee of the House.

Mr. KELLY. That is true. But there is no reason when a bill relates to railroad matters, why it should not go to the Railroad Committee, as it seems to me. I think it was an improper reference in the other House, but that is a matter for them and I have nothing to say about it. I only allude to it now when the bill comes here in order to say that I think the bill ought to go to the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. EATON. Mr. President, I only desire to say a word upon this matter. I cannot well see, I confess, in this warm weather why there should be an unaccountable desire to take from the appropriate committee, the Committee on Railroads, this bill. I understand my honorable friend from Ohio to say that it ought not to go to the Railroad Committee because the Railroad Committee is hostile to this bill. Now, I beg to say to my friend as one of that committee that that charge ought not to be made. In the first place, I do not know as a member of that committee the terms of this bill; I have not seen it; have not read it; I do not know its details. I only know that it relates to railroads and relates to an adjustment between certain roads and the United States. Now, it ought not to be said that the Railroad Committee is hostile to the bill. What right has any Senator to make that charge against a committee of this Senate that has not had the bill in charge?

Mr. THURMAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. EATON. Certainly.

Mr. THURMAN. I thought I explained that. I can very well see why the Senator thinks that there may be no hostility to this bill on the part of his committee; but if he will take the bill reported by his committee, which we all have a right to suppose is the expression of its opinion, and compare that with the House bill, he will certainly see that the opinion of his committee is hostile to this bill.

Mr. EATON. I have not read the bill, as I observed, and it cannot be expected that every member of the Railroad Committee shall know what a bill is that may have been passed by the other House but not yet considered here.

My friend says that it is unparliamentary to send this bill to the Railroad Committee. I take issue there. In my judgment, it is unparliamentary to send it anywhere else except to the Railroad Committee. If it is a matter that relates to railroads, that committee is the proper committee to entertain and consider it.

But, says my honorable friend, there are grave judicial questions connected with it. There are grave judicial questions connected with almost every railroad matter that is brought before Congress; but it is not less proper that the matter should go to the proper committee, and if the committee require the opinion upon any judicial question of the Judiciary Committee, they will ask for that opinion. In my judgment the bill should go to the legitimate committee, the Committee on Railroads.

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. President, of course no one will question the perfect good faith of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee in moving the reference of this bill to that committee; but, sir, as one of the members of the Railroad Committee I should be very loath to see any action on the part of the Senate in reference to this matter that would place or have a tendency to place the committee of which I am a member in any false position before the Senate or before the country, in a position, as has been suggested by a Senator, of hostility to this bill, and which might perhaps go further in the estimation of some, and place that committee in a position of hostility to the general interests of the Government and of the Treasury of the United States in reference to the dealings of the Government with these railroad companies.

Now, what are the facts in reference to this matter bearing upon the question of the proper reference of this bill?

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Oregon if the Railroad Committee was not first directed by the Senate to consider this matter?

Mr. MITCHELL. Certainly, by the reference of a bill to that committee which was considered at length and reported by that committee with amendments, not the original bill.

Mr. PADDOCK. That was the fact which I wished to elicit.

Mr. MITCHELL. I did not intend to say a word on this matter of reference, nor would I, had it not been for the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio in which he stated that it would be improper to refer this bill to a committee that was hostile to the measure, to a nurse that would have no proper care of the child. Are these remarks justified by anything that has taken place either in the Senate or before that committee? It appears to me not. We have a railroad committee. What are the uses or purposes of that committee? To consider railroad matters, I presume, to protect the interests of the Government wherever the interests of railroads come in conflict with the interests of the Government; having regard always, of course, for any vested rights of the companies. This is that case. Here is a great controversy existing to-day and for a number of years past between these railroad companies and the Government of the United States. These companies were organized by the Government of the United States; the breath of life was breathed into them by the United States; great charter rights were conferred upon them by the Government of the United States. They have become strong and powerful; and a conflict has arisen between them and the United States in reference to the rights of both parties.

Now then, a bill is introduced in the beginning of the session by the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee himself, and upon his motion that bill is referred to the Railroad Committee, the proper committee as I contend. He does not ask that it be referred to the Judiciary Committee, although it refers to the very identical subject upon which the House bill treats that is now before the Senate. It is true a resolution had been introduced and referred to the Judiciary Committee calling upon that committee to investigate the same general subject as to the legal rights of the Government and of these companies and as to the conflict existing, and they were called upon to report their views to the Senate. Notwithstanding that resolution, this bill providing the solution of the difficulty is referred by the motion of the honorable chairman of the Judiciary Committee to the Railroad Committee. The Judiciary Committee proceed to investigate the general subject which they are called upon to investigate by the resolution; but up to this hour no report has been made by that committee. We know nothing of the views of that committee on this general subject. We do not know, so far as any action of that committee is concerned, whether the Judiciary Committee is hostile to the interests of the Government or friendly to the railroad companies. We know nothing on that subject so far as any action of that committee is concerned, because they have not spoken to the Senate as a committee.

But, again, as I was about to say, the bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont [Mr. EDMUNDS] was referred to the Railroad Committee, and the Railroad Committee took it up and after diligent examination for two long months they reported that bill with a great many amendments to the Senate, submitting the views, it is true, of the Railroad Committee upon this general subject.

Well, sir, it is said by the honorable Senator from Ohio that this is a different proposition; that here is an irrepressible conflict between the views of the House as presented in the bill under consideration and the views of the Senate Railroad Committee. There may to some extent be a conflict; there unquestionably is to a certain extent a conflict, but they both bear upon the same general subject; and what is that subject? It is the solution of this controversy between the railroad companies and the Government. That bill bore upon the same general subject; and I undertake to say that while it might perhaps have been proper enough originally to have referred this matter to the Judiciary Committee, and let that committee present their views and their theory of the solution of this matter, any such action now would have the effect to place the Railroad Committee, of which I am an humble member, in a false position in reference to the controversy between the Government and the railroads both before the Senate and before the country; and for one I do not see proper by keeping quiet, by remaining silent in my seat when a motion of this kind is made, to permit myself as a member of the committee, or the committee, to be placed in any such position.

Why, sir, there is no trouble about this matter. Taking it for granted for the sake of the argument that the views of the railroad committee are not in consonance with the views of the House in reference to this general subject, the same subject-matter is being considered by the Judiciary Committee. Their views will be presented to the Senate in reference to this matter in answer to the resolution that has been introduced and referred to that committee, and been under consideration by that committee for months past, I think since February.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Long enough, undoubtedly. We have been teased off a good while.

Mr. MITCHELL. It has been before the Judiciary Committee several months. Therefore I say the Senate of the United States will have the views of that able committee both in reference to the policy and the power of the Government, because they both come in for consideration and determination in this matter, and then the Senate can have the benefit of the views of both committees upon this subject and can act as would seem to be proper under all the circumstances. But I do say that after the Railroad Committee has been charged with this general subject, has considered it for two or three months, and has reported its views to the Senate, as a matter of simple courtesy the general subject should not be taken out of their hands now by what would seem to me to be an inappropriate reference of this bill at this time.

That is all I desire to say, and I did not intend to say one word, and would not have done so had it not been for some remarks made by the honorable Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DAWES. I am quite sure that personally as a member of the Committee on Railroads, if I were to consult my own ease and my own wishes, I should prefer to have the motion of the Senator from Vermont prevail; but it is quite worth while for the Senate to inquire whether it is well to charge two committees, at the same time, with the same duty, and the more complex and difficult the duty the more serious the question. The Senate charged the Railroad Committee with the consideration of the very question involved in this bill. They did it upon a vote of the Senate; and it has not any the less significance that they did it on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, himself representing the Judiciary Committee at all times and ready to assert at all times the prerogatives and jurisdiction of that committee. With the matter before him, and after the Senate had by a simple general resolution instructed his committee to inquire into these things, the conclusion of the Senate was that it was after all a matter within the jurisdiction and proper for the Railroad Committee to consider; and that was done with the approval and upon the suggession of the Senator from Vermont.

Now that committee has undertaken to discharge that duty. It has not completed its work. Some of the members of that committee, I happen to know personally, have devoted a great deal of time to the consideration of the difficult questions involved, not only of law but of fact, and not only in reference to this particular bill, but its effect upon all the relations of the Government to all this class of railroads. In the midst of this work there comes up from the House a cognate measure having reference to the same subject, differing in the questions of law that are involved not one particle from that which the Senate charged this committee to investigate, having somewhat a different plan from that which was suggested in the bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont and which he thought the Railroad Committee was the best of all the committees to investigate and in which the Senate concurred with him, and in obedience to which judgment of the Senate the committee undertook the task. Then there comes up this House bill, and somebody has informed the Senator from Ohio or the Senator from Vermont that it is not according to the views of the Railroad Committee, or they have some apprehension lest a conclusion after investigation may not be entirely in accordance with the views of some members of the Judiciary Committee before the investigation.

Mr. EDMUNDS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. DAWES. Certainly.

Mr. EDMUNDS. He wishes to know whether the Judiciary Committee has polled the members of the Railroad Committee. I will state that on the 26th of May the chairman of the Railroad Committee reported to the Senate that he had polled the members of the Railroad Committee on this bill that I introduced about one of these railroads, and as far as it appears from the report every one of them was of opinion that Congress had not a particle of power to do anything without the assent of the company, and so they reported the bill with an amendment that it should not have any force at all unless the company did assent to it. That is the way we know how the Railroad Committee stands.

Mr. DAWES. I was speaking not of what the chairman of the Railroad Committee had said, so far as the report he has made or any other measure was concerned, but I was speaking of an assertion made by the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, and seconded by the Senator from Ohio, about the views which they entertained of what sort of a conclusion the Railroad Committee would come as to another measure. How they ascertained these views, or what propriety there is in either polling that committee upon any measure, or calling the attention of the Senate to it as a basis for a vote of want of confidence in that committee, is for older Senators than myself to determine for themselves. For my part, I have to say that no action of mine, and, so far as I am able to judge, no action of any other member of the Railroad Committee in reference to any other measure, reflects at all the views of those members of the committee, certainly not my own, for this is a new and distinct proposition, and no Senator has any authority to state to the Senate that the views of any member of that committee are such that that wonderful parliamentary axiom, so often quoted here, that it will not do to send a child for nursing to a hostile mother, must be applied to this Railroad Committee, so that after the Senate has set them to work upon this measure, and before a conclusion of their work, the Senate must come in and by a direct vote intercept and interdict any further investigation on their part, and turn over measures that belong to that committee to the Judiciary Committee.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, my good friend from Massachusetts says that I represented the Judiciary Committee in having this bill which has been spoken of referred on the 3d of April to the Railroad Committee. He has no authority to make that statement. It is not true in point of fact.

Mr. DAWES. The Senator has mistaken what I said. I did not say you represented the Judiciary Committee in that particular thing. I said you represented it in all matters pertaining to its prerogatives and jurisdiction.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The Senator said it in such very close connection with the circumstance of this bill being referred to the Railroad Committee that the unsophisticated mind of an honest man would have supposed that he meant that; but the Senator withdraws that part of it, as he of course knows that when a Senator gets up here and introduces a bill by request and lets it take the particular reference that the man who wanted it introduced wishes it to take, if that is not necessarily an improper one, there is not a great deal of game to be caught by pursuing that animal any longer. I think I can dismiss that part of it now.

But what was the bill that went to the Judiciary Committee and upon which they have reported? It was a bill to create a sinking fund for the liquidation of the Government bonds advanced to the Central and Western Pacific Railroad Companies, and that was all as it was introduced, in respect to these two companies alone. What was the attitude of this general question between the people of the United States and the five or six railway companies that have got bonds at that time? The Senate before that time had by a resolution that I hold in my hand directed the Judiciary Committee—not introduced, as the Senator says or insinuates, by me at all, but introduced by the Senator from California [Mr. SARGENT] without any knowledge or consent of mine—"to inquire what legislation, if any, is necessary to secure indemnity to the United States for advances of interest paid and to be paid by the Government on account of subsidy bonds issued to the several Pacific railroad companies, and to secure indemnity against liability to pay the principal of such bonds by requiring the creation of sinking funds, or otherwise."

"By requiring," you will perceive, not at the option of the company, but doing something that binds, pledges.

Also whether the issues of the companies' mortgage bonds under the act of 1864 were in excess of the amount.

And a great variety of other subjects which did require much time to consider. In this state of things the bill went to the Railroad Committee. It is the only bill that I have heard of that they have had under consideration about it. They reported this bill on the 26th of May, with a report in writing, and which is now in print; and I beg to ask the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, if it is parliamentary to do so, whether he concurred in that report?

Mr. DAWES. It depends upon my answer, does it, whether by a vote of the Senate I shall, as a member of that committee, have anything further to do with railroads?

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the answer. Then I take it the honorable Senator did concur in the report, and certainly the report appears to be a unanimous one; and, unless he corrects me, I shall say that he did concur in it, and, as far as we have any right to know anything about it, all the members who were present at the meeting concurred, which must have been a majority. Now, what does that report say? It says in substance, and there is no dodging it, that this House bill ought not to pass under any circumstances unless the railroad companies are willing it should and are willing to agree to it. They say:

The first question is—

On this bill for a sinking fund introduced by the Central and Western railroads themselves—

The first question is, have we any power to change the relations with these companies at all, without their assent?

The honorable committee go on to discuss that question. They then wind up in this way:

In the view of the committee it—

Speaking of the act of 1864—

In the view of the committee it is a contract modifying the provisions of the former contract, and cannot be altered, amended, or repealed without infringing upon the provisions of the Constitution.

The Railroad Committee has solemnly and formally reported to the Senate that no bill can meet its approval that alters, amends, or repeals any provision in any of these acts granting bonds. Now if that is their opinion, as we know it is their formal and official opinion, what is the object of sending this bill to them? This bill does not ask any assent of the railroad companies; it undertakes to exercise a power by Congress that the Railroad Committee says Congress does not possess in any degree.

The Senate then, laying aside all questions of courtesy that have been pressed in here—and there is nothing in them—has a right to refer a bill to any committee that it likes. It may refer this bill to the Committee on Contingent Expenses if it chooses, without any discourtesy to anybody. It is a matter of judgment. Now what does the Senate say by sending this bill to this committee? Does it not say that, in the judgment of the Senate, Congress has no power to pass the bill at all, and do you not say to the people of the United States that, in the opinion of the Senate, no matter how great the wrongs may be that are inflicted on you under these grants and charters, you are utterly remediless, unless it is with the royal assent and pleasure of the corporations which Congress has reserved the right to control by its legislation?

Now, in accordance with that report, this honorable committee reports and with the assent of the honorable Senator from Massachusetts, and undoubtedly drawn by him, that even this little act got up by the Central Pacific Railroad Company itself, and therefore, as I suppose, just what it wanted—that even this little act shall not be "operative"—I read from an amendment of the committee:

That this act shall not be operative unless the same shall be accepted by the said Central Pacific Railroad Company within four months of the date of its passage by votes of the directors and stockholders at regular meetings duly called.

Mr. President, this has got to be a matter of substance. If the Senate wish to consign this bill to its grave, to its official grave—not a question of guess or intendment or discourtesy to a committee that has formally and unanimously reported so far as we can know, certainly a majority of it, that we have not any power to touch the House bill except with the assent of the parties to be affected by it—the Senate can do it. That is all I have to say, and I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to refer.

Mr. HAMLIN. The morning hour has so nearly expired that I ask the indulgence of the Senate to allow me to present the credentials of my colleague.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think we had better have a vote, because we shall lose the time.

Mr. WEST. You will not get any vote before twelve o'clock.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the regular order, and we shall see.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say a few words on this question.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then I hope the Senator will withdraw his objection and allow these credentials to be presented. Will the Senator from Ohio allow me?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask that they be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be read.

CREDENTIALS.

The Chief Clerk read the credentials of James G. Blaine, appointed by the governor of the State of Maine, to fill, until the next meeting of the Legislature of that State, the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Lot M. Morrill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The credentials will be placed on file.

AMENDMENT OF PACIFIC RAILROAD ACT.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes the consideration of the motion to refer the bill received from the House of Representatives.

Mr. SHERMAN. I desire to say a few words. I ask the Senator from Vermont whether this matter had not better go over now?

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should like to hear my friend. It will never go over with my assent. It is a matter of the utmost importance, and it is very hard to get it before the Senate. That is my only reason. I should be very glad to hear from my friend from Ohio.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. ROBERTSON. I have a petition. I present a petition of citizens of the District of Columbia, praying the passage of a law for the introduction of the metric system of weights and measures. I move that it be referred to the Committee on Finance.

The motion was agreed to.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVALS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had on this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 176) to authorize the Northwestern Improvement Company, a corporation organized under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, to enter upon the Menomonee Indian reservation, and improve the Oconto River, its branches and tributaries;

An act (S. No. 369) to exempt vessels engaged in navigating the Mississippi River and its tributaries above the port of New Orleans from entries and clearances;

An act (S. No. 435) to amend section 5546 of the Revised Statutes providing for imprisonment and transfer of United States prisoners; and

An act (S. No. 454) for the relief of the sureties of J. W. P. Huntington, deceased, late superintendent of Indian affairs in Oregon.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; and they were thereupon signed by the President pro tempore:

A bill (S. No. 872) for the relief of the family of the late John T. King and of L. B. Cutler;

A bill (H. R. No. 1668) to supply an omission in the enrollment of the deficiency bill approved March 3, 1875;

A bill (H. R. No. 3200) to change the name of the steam-barge Dolphin, of Clayton, New York;

A bill (H. R. No. 3884) to continue the act entitled "An act to continue the public printing;" and

A joint resolution (H. R. No. 134) donating two cannon and carriages to the warden and burgesses of Stonington, Connecticut.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask the Senator from Ohio to yield to me a moment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Ohio has the floor.

Mr. SHERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock has come.

Mr. WEST. I insist on the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of twelve o'clock having arrived——

Mr. PADDOCK. I hope to have an opportunity——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I object; meaning no disrespect to anybody; but this bill now stands at the head and will by the rules until it is disposed of. I do not mean to be put to the trouble of trying to get to it. I intend, if sticking to the rules will enable me, that this bill shall stay where it is until it is disposed of. Therefore I object to all other business.

Mr. INGALLS. Does this bill come up to-morrow morning as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not necessarily.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I think it does.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not within the morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. We will try that when it comes up.

Mr. PADDOCK. I appeal to my friend from Vermont——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Ohio yield?

Mr. INGALLS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded.

Mr. PADDOCK. I wish simply to take a bill from the table and refer it to a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order is demanded. Twelve o'clock having arrived, the legislative and executive business will be suspended and the Senate——

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask unanimous consent to present the request of the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT,] who is sick, that he may be relieved from further service on the conference committee on the part of the Senate on the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request? The Chair hears none.

Mr. WINDOM. I merely make the statement that I have such request from the Senator from California, [Mr. SARGENT.]

Mr. SARGENT was excused; and the President pro tempore being authorized to fill the vacancy, Mr. WINDOM was appointed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask, before we go into the trial, by unanimous consent to be allowed to make a report from the Judiciary Committee on this Pacific railroad matter, that it may be laid on the table and be printed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. THURMAN. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate of the 6th of January, instructing the committee to inquire into various matters relating to the Pacific railroads, and to whom were also referred the bill (S. No. 275) to amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and to amend the act amendatory thereof approved July 2, 1864; the bill (S. No. 316) to amend an act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 2, 1862, and to amend an act amendatory thereof approved July 2, 1864; and the bill (S. No. 564) to amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and the several acts amendatory thereof and supplementary thereto, to report a bill, and, accompanying that, a written report, which I ask to have printed.

The bill (S. No. 984) to alter and amend the act entitled "An act to aid in the construction of a railroad and telegraph line from the Missouri River to the Pacific Ocean, and to secure to the Government the use of the same for postal, military, and other purposes," approved July 1, 1862, and also to alter and amend the act of Congress approved July 2, 1864, in amendment of said first-named act, was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask unanimous consent to make a report from a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 902) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to ascertain the amounts due to citizens of the United States for supplies furnished to the Sioux or Dakota Indians of Minnesota subsequent to August, 1860, and prior to the massacre of August, 1862, and providing for the payment thereof, asked to be discharged from its further consideration and that it be referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 738) for the relief of Withenbury & Doyle, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 185) declaring the effect of permits to purchase products of the insurrectionary States in certain cases granted by the President of the United States, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was ordered to be printed, and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

EQUALIZATION OF BOUNTIES.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask unanimous consent of the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 58) to equalize the bounties of soldiers who served in the late war for the Union. I will say to the Senate that I do not desire to take it up for the purpose of having it discussed now, but merely to have it in order, so that it may be hereafter in the order of business to be voted on.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would close within the morning hour. The Senator would gain nothing by that.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is one bill already up.

Mr. LOGAN. It would be business in the morning hour, would it not?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would have to be called up afresh.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask that it be made a special order; it is the bounty bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. O, no; we cannot agree to that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objects.

Mr. LOGAN. I ask the Senate to vote on it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The regular order having been called for, one objection carries it over.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not object to my friends having a vote on the question whether that bill shall be made a special order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The objection is withdrawn. The Senator from Illinois moves that the bounty bill be made a special order.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I object.

VOLUNTEERS FOR SIOUX WAR.

Mr. PADDOCK. I ask unanimous consent to take up joint resolution No. 20 from the table and refer it to the Committee on Military Affairs.

There being no objection, the joint resolution (S. R. No. 20) to authorize the President of the United States to accept the services of volunteers to aid in suppressing Sioux Indian hostilities in the Northwest was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. LOGAN. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Illinois calls for the regular order. The legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Legislative and executive business will now be resumed.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, which was laid aside yesterday morning.

The motion was agreed to.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The joint resolution (H. R. No. 146) to amend the act approved June 18, 1874, relating to the admission of articles intended for the international exhibition of 1876 was read twice by its title and referred to the Committee on Finance.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Mr. BOUTWELL (by request) asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 985) for the relief of Charles P. James; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Claims, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate will come to order.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Mr. WINDOM. The Committee on Appropriations, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 982) providing for the construction of the Washington Monument, have directed me to report it without amendment. This is the bill which the committee were instructed to report, or at least partially instructed. If there be no objection, I ask for its present consideration.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It had better be printed, that we may read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be printed and go on the Calendar.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I rise to inquire whether there was any unfinished business yesterday upon which we adjourned?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. None.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I make the point of order that the business the Senate was engaged upon when the court-hour arrived was the bill of the House of Representatives on the subject of the relations of the United States to the Pacific railroads, and I insist that that is the pending business before the Senate.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suggest that there is no such thing as unfinished business of the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the railroad bill referred to by the Senator from Vermont was considered in the morning hour.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Yes, sir; but I submit to the Chair that when there is no unfinished business there is not any morning hour, and there is no such thing in the rules. Therefore I submit that when we proceeded to this trial, the question under consideration, like an appropriation bill or anything else, was the reference of this bill about the railroads, and I make the point that that is the present business before the Senate when the trial is adjourned and the Senate resumes legislative business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will submit the question to the Senate, Shall the railroad bill which the Senator from Vermont has called up——

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not call it up. It was submitted by the Chair under the rules which require him to submit for reference bills from the House of Representatives. That bill has not been referred, and that was the question we were upon when the court convened.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is stating the fact. He will not differ with the Senator as regards the fact.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senate will not violate its long, its universal, and uniform practice in this case.

Mr. EDMUNDS. So do I.

Mr. HAMLIN. By the rules of the body the first thing in order is for the Chair to submit to it in the morning hour communications from the Executive and communications from the House of Representatives, and they are all limited within the morning hour; and I affirm here without the slightest fear of contradiction—and I do not know but that it is the only thing that I would not say you cannot find precedents on both sides—that there is no instance where the business of the morning hour has been treated as a question that goes over as unfinished business; not in a single instance within thirty years has that occurred.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, if I may be allowed to say a word, it did not go over. That is the point. It did not go over as unfinished business for some other day; but here is a day when the Senate has met without any unfinished business coming over from the day before, which takes precedence by our practice at one o'clock, but the way was free so that when one o'clock came or any other time came, if this bill or any other that was up in the morning hour, it would go right on because it could only be displaced by unfinished business or a special order, neither of which existed. Therefore this bill stands in exactly the attitude of any other bill that was under consideration at one o'clock when there was no unfinished business and no special order that was under consideration, when the Senate by a special order proceed to the consideration of executive business or to judicial business, as in this case which is like it. Now, then, we have disposed for the time being of this executive or judicial business, and the question is whether that bill is not before the Senate for reference just as it was before. I do not interfere with——

Mr. WEST. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Louisiana will state his point of order.

Mr. WEST. I make the point of order for the purpose of relieving the Senate; I know that it wants to retire; and my point is that that bill cannot be before the Senate because it has only been read once this day, and I object to its second reading.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I beg pardon, it was read the second time, and the question was on its reference.

Mr. WEST. No; I beg your pardon.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not think that question comes up.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let us have that decided, for that is a point of order that is good if well taken.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Louisiana states that he objected when the Chair stated that the bill would be considered read the second time and referred to the Committee on Railroads, the Chair will recognize the objection and sustain the point of order.

Mr. WEST. I did not object at the time, but I do not know that that forecloses me, because I have seen just such instances here where Senators have raised these objections. The mere fact that the Chair states that a bill will be considered as read the second time does not preclude an objection to it at a subsequent time. My point is this: that that bill, under the twenty-sixth rule, has not been read a second time, and it requires to be read a second time on a separate day. That is the point, and I raise it now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair would rule that, if the objection was made when the second reading was called for, the Chair would sustain the Senator from Louisiana. The Chai stated that the bill would be considered read the second time, and the question was upon its reference to the Committee on Railroads. No objection being made to the second reading by any Senator, it was considered as read the second time. The Chair therefore overrules the point of order made by the Senator from Louisiana.

Now, as to the point of order raised by the Senator from Vermont——

Mr. EDMUNDS. Mr. President, I believe I was taken off my feet (and I sat down in obedience to the rule) by the point of order. That being overruled, I believe I am entitled to the floor again.

I wish to show my fealty to law, Mr. President, at all times, and, therefore, when the point of order was made I sat down in as becoming a manner as I could. Now I believe I have the floor, but I do not intend to waste the time of the Senate; yet I seriously and really believe that we shall make a very extraordinary precedent, and one that has never existed before, if when there is no special order and no unfinished business a bill is taken up in the morning hour, and special business like this court or executive business intervenes and is disposed of, that bill loses its place before the Senate. That is the precise point. If my friend from Maine says there is any precedent for such a losing as that, I should like to know what it is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will here state that the Senator from Vermont has stated the fact with this exception in the judgment of the Chair, that the morning hour had expired; we had reached twelve o'clock from eleven o'clock. The practice of the Senate has been that whenever the morning hour expires no business under consideration then goes over by virtue of its being pending at that time. It did not go over as the unfinished business, but it would require a motion to take it up at a subsequent day. If the morning hour had not expired and we had returned to complete the morning hour, then the Chair would rule that the bill was pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is not my point. All there is of the morning hour is that when one hour is spent the unfinished business of the day before shall be taken up, or if there be a special order at any particular hour, that shall be taken up unless the unfinished business is proceeded with. On this day there was no unfinished business. Therefore there was no such thing as a morning hour which was to be cut off at all, for if that were so, if there had not been any court or any executive session, this bill being under consideration when twelve o'clock came it would have been the duty of the Chair to say "the morning hour expires and this bill goes over." The Chair would never say that, because there was no unfinished business and no special order to displace it. That is the point.

Mr. HAMLIN addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the Senator from Maine will allow the Chair to reply to the Senator from Vermont, he will simply state that when twelve o'clock arrived if there had been no trial session the duty of the Chair would have been to declare the morning hour expired the same as if there had been unfinished business of the day before.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What would have happened to the bill then?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then any other proposition would have been in order. The Calendar would have been next if there was no special order, for if no special order then the Calendar would be the general order.

Mr. HAMLIN. That is it exactly; we should go to the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The rule requires that if there is no unfinished business and no special order the Calendar of general orders shall be in order.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I should be very glad to hear the rule read which displaces a bill taken up in the morning hour when there is no special order and no unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read the rule.

Mr. HAMLIN. Read it in connection with the other rule, which says if it is taken up in the morning hour it shall go over.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. Before the question is put, I want to ask the Chair what becomes of the bill that the Senate voted to take up?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I made the point of order against its being taken up. ["Question."]

Mr. SHERMAN. I think we had better not adjourn.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senate will not adjourn.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. BOUTWELL] rose to the introduction of a bill. The Chair asked the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] if he would yield to the Senator from Massachusetts. The Senator from Vermont asked for order, there was so much confusion. The Chair rapped down and suspended business until order was restored. He then recognized the Senator from Massachusetts by permission of the Senator from Maine, and the bill was introduced and then the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. WINDOM] rose to make a report and was recognized.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Now, I rise to a point of order, and will state that as soon as the Chair stated the question was on this post-route bill——

Mr. SAULSBURY. I call the Senator from Vermont to order. A motion is pending for adjournment.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Then I hope the Senator will call the rest of the Senate to order, himself among the rest.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Delaware that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock and twelve minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, July 12, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. I. L. TOWNSEND.

The Journal of Monday last was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

The message also announced that the Senate disagreed to the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1867,' and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, asked a conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. THURMAN, Mr. WRIGHT, and Mr. EDMUNDS as conferees on the part of the Senate.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners.

PRINTING OF TESTIMONY.

Mr. HURLBUT. I am directed by the Committee on Civil Service Reform to report back certain additional testimony, and to ask that it be printed and recommitted.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER OF EDUCATION.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio. I am directed by the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the following concurrent Senate resolution, to report back the same with the recommendation that it be adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring,) That 10,000 copies of the report of the Commissioner of Education for 1875 be printed for the use of the Commissioner.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. VANCE, of Ohio, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—THIRD DISTRICT OF LOUISIANA.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I rise to a privileged question. I am directed by the Committee of Elections to report the resolution which I send to the desk and ask its adoption at this time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That C. B. Darrall, the sitting member, is entitled to the seat occupied by him in this House as Representative from the third congressional district of Louisiana in the Forty-fourth Congress.

Mr. HARRIS, of Virginia. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

FORT KEARNEY MILITARY RESERVATION.

Mr. CROUNSE. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table the bill (S. No. 894) to provide for the sale of the Fort Kearney military reservation, in the State of Nebraska.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill will be read for information, after which objections, if any, will be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas the tract of land in the State of Nebraska known as the Fort Kearney military reservation is no longer needed or used for military purposes, and has been abandoned by the military authorities: Therefore,

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Interior to cause said tract of land to be surveyed, sectionized, and subdivided as other public lands, and after said survey to offer said land to actual settlers only at minimum price, under and in accordance with the provisions of the homestead laws: Provided, That if any person has made permanent improvements upon said land prior to the 1st day of June, 1876, (being an actual settler thereon,) has exhausted his right to make a homestead entry, such person, or his heirs, may enter one quarter-section of said land under the provisions of the pre-emption laws: And provided further, That the heirs of any deceased person who had made settlement and improvement as above described prior to June 1, 1876, may complete the pre-emption or homestead entry of the person so deceased.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $3,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated, out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this act.

There being no objection, the bill was taken from the Speaker's table, read three times, and passed.

Mr. CROUNSE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CORRECTION OF CONFERENCE REPORT.

Mr. HENDEE. I offer the following resolution for the purpose of correcting a clerical error in the report of the conference committee on the bill for the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the conference committee on the bill of the House (H. R. No. 3411) for the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue be authorized to correct their report, namely, so that it will read, instead of "in line 22," (section 3,) "lines 16 and 22."

Also to insert in the matter inserted in lieu of lines 27 and 28, same section, after the word "Columbia," the words "from money."

Also, after the matter inserted after the word "it," line 3, section 7, strike out the rest of the sentence in line 4, to wit, the words "is necessary to make an even and regular grade."

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. HENDEE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

OVERLOADING OF VESSELS.

Mr. HOSKINS, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3885) to amend title 48 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and to prevent the overloading of vessels carrying freight or passengers; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

SURVEY OF COAST OF LONG ISLAND.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, introduced a joint resolution (H. R. No. 147) to authorize an examination or survey of the coast of Long Island between Gravesend Bay and Rockaway, for the purpose of acertaining the necessity of a breakwater between those points, and what improvements can be made to the channel of Sheepshead and Canarsie Bays for the benefit and protection of commerce, together with cost of the proposed improvements; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

JAMES A. GRAYER.

Mr. POWELL, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That James A. Grayer, an employé in the folding department, be, and is hereby, allowed pay at the rate of $3.60 per day for six days' services in the month of April, 1876.

CLERK TO A COMMITTEE.

Mr. POWELL also, from the same committee, reported the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the War Department be, and is hereby, allowed the services of a clerk for thirty days from the 30th of June, at the rate of compensation heretofore allowed him, being the sum of $4 per day.

Mr. KASSON. I would suggest to the gentleman that he add the words "provided that it does not extend beyond the session."

Mr. POWELL. I have no objection to that.

The amendment of Mr. KASSON was agreed to.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

DAMAGES BY REBEL RAIDS.

Mr. ATKINS. I ask unanimous consent to offer the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas there was a military commission appointed by Special Order No. 73, issued from the headquarters, post of Bethel, district of Jackson, Department of the Tennessee, December 2, 1862, to investigate the nature and amount of damage done by the rebel raid on Henderson Station, Tennessee, November 25, 1862; and whereas a large sum of money was collected from the citizens living in and around Henderson, Tennessee, as was said, to re-imburse the Government of the United States and loyal citizens; and whereas bills for relief have been introduced for the relief of the citizens from whom the amount was collected, and upon proper search it has been found that a very large amount of this money so collected, instead of having been used as was intended, has not been turned into the Treasury of the United States:

Be it resolved by the House of Representatives, That a committee on military affairs be directed to inquire and ascertain the amount collected, and from whom, and to what use the same has been applied; and that legal steps be taken to place the funds in the possession of the Government, so as to enable justice to be had. And further, the committee so appointed shall be authorized to summon witnesses and send for person or persons, books, and papers, administer oaths, and to do anything needful and necessary to be done so as to have the money properly accounted for.

Mr. HURLBUT. I have no objection to that resolution, but all that information is already in the Treasury Department.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Not quite; the records of the Department do not show this information.

Mr. ATKINS. The gentleman from Ohio is correct.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. ATKINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BAKER, of Indiana. I now call for the regular order of business.

EXPLORATION AND SETTLEMENT OF THE BLACK HILLS COUNTRY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The regular order is the call of committees for reports, and the morning hour begins at thirty-two minutes past twelve o'clock; and the call rests with the Committee on Indian Affairs. The gentleman from California [Mr. PAGE] has the floor upon a bill reported by that committee, and that bill is first in order.

The House accordingly resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 1335) to declare the country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, open to exploration and settlement, and for other purposes.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That all that portion of country north of the North Platte River and east of the summits of the Big Horn Mountains, in the Territory of Wyoming, is hereby declared to be open to exploration and settlement; and the true intent and meaning of the treaty with the Sioux Indians, concluded April 29, 1868, is declared to be that white men are not excluded thereby from traveling over, exploring, or settling upon any portion of the Territory of Wyoming not included within the boundaries of the permanent reservation established for said Sioux Indians by the second article of said treaty of April 29, 1868: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to impair the rights of the Indians to hunt within the limits of the Territory mentioned in this act.

Mr. PAGE. I ask the previous question on the bill and the amendment reported by the committee, for there was an amendment reported.

Mr. KASSON. Is there not a motion pending to recommit the bill to the Committee on Indian Affairs?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that a motion to recommit the bill was made by the gentleman from Iowa during the half hour allowed for debate, but the gentleman from California yielded the floor for debate alone as the Chair understood, and was to resume the floor at the close of the half hour, with the privilege of moving the previous question. It would be perfectly competent of course for the gentleman from Iowa to move to recommit, only that the previous question has been called upon the passage of the bill. The Chair is of the opinion that the gentleman from Iowa did not hold the floor tor that purpose. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa, however, that precisely the same purpose may be accomplished and no injustice done him, because if the House desires to recommit the bill it may refuse to second the previous question.

Mr. KASSON. So that if the previous question is not sustained, a motion to recommit the bill can then be made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. A motion to recommit will then be in order.

Mr. KASSON. I hope the Committee on Indian Affairs will have an opportunity to consider this bill once more.

The question was taken on seconding the previous question; and on a division there were ayes 11, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. KASSON. I now move that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs; and on that motion I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the motion to recommit was agreed to.

Mr. RANDALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was recommitted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that Mr. WINDOM had been appointed a manager on the part of the Senate on the conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the sundry civil appropriation bill in place of Mr. SARGENT, excused.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., informed the House that the President had approved and signed bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 3495) for the relief of the mail contractors on route No. 19319 in Tennessee;

An act (H. R. No. 3670) authorizing the Nebraska City Bridge Company to construct a ponton railway bridge across the Missouri River at Nebraska City, in Otoe County, Nebraska;

An act (H. R. No. 2387) to fix the retired pay of Surgeon-General Clements A. Finley, retired;

An act (H. R. No. 3858) to continue the provisions of an act entitled "An act to provide temporarily for the expenditures of the Government," &c.;

An act (H. R. No. 2676) for the support of the government of the District of Columbia for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 3263) making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes;

An act (H. R. No. 2575) to amend sections 3893 and 3894 of the Revised Statutes providing a penalty for mailing obscene books and other matters therein contained, and prohibiting lottery circulars passing through the mails;

An act (H. R. No. 3839) to authorize the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to purchase supplies for the Indian Bureau in open market; and

An act (H. R. No. 1100) relative to the redemption of unused stamps.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Committee on Indian Affairs has now had its two full hours, and the call, therefore, now rests with the next committee.

SALE OF OTOE AND MISSOURIA INDIAN RESERVATION.

Mr. MORGAN. I ask unanimous consent to make an additional report from the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. HALE. What is the report; on what subject?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The title of the bill will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

No objection was made.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, with the consent of the Otoe and Missouria tribes of Indians expressed in open council, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cause to be surveyed the reservation of said Indians lying in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

SEC. 2. That the lands so surveyed shall be appraised by three commissioners, one of whom shall be designated by said Indians in open council, and the other two by the Secretary of the Interior.

SEC. 3. That after the survey and appraisement of said lands, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and is hereby, authorized to offer the same for sale, through the United States public land office at Beatrice, Nebraska, for cash, if practicable, to actual settlers only, in tracts not exceeding one hundred and sixty acres to each purchaser: Provided, That if, in the judgment of the Secretary of the Interior, it shall be more advantageous to sell said lands upon deferred payments, he may, with the consent of the Indians expressed in open council, dispose of the same upon the following terms as to payments, that is to say, one-third in cash, one-third in one year, and one-third in two years from date of sale, with interest at the rate of 10 per cent. per annum: And provided further, That no portion of said land shall be sold at less than the appraised value thereof, and in no case less than $2.50 per acre.

SEC. 4. That the proceeds of said sale shall be placed to the credit of said Indians in the Treasury of the United States, and bear interest at the rate of 5 per cent. per annum, except such portion thereof as the Secretary of the Interior, with the approval of the President, may deem necessary to be immediately expended in removing said Indians to the Indian Territory, procuring a reservation for their use, and providing thereon homes and means of support.

SEC. 5. That the commissioners for the appraisement of said lands shall be paid for their services at the rate of $5 per day while actually employed, and their actual expenses; which sum, together with the cost of survey, and all other necessary incidental expenses of the execution of this act, shall be paid from the money realized by the sale of said lands.

SEC. 6. That certified copies of the plats and field-notes of said lands, when surveyed, shall be prepared under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, and kept in the land-office at Beatrice, Nebraska, to be used as other official plats and notes; and the register and the receiver shall be allowed such fees only for the sale of said lands as are now authorized by law in case of sales of public lands of the United States, to be paid out of the moneys arising from the sale thereof.

The Committee on Indian Affairs reported the following amendments to the bill:

Amend section 3 by inserting in the third line, after the word "offer," the following words, namely, "one hundred and twenty thousand acres from the western side of."

Amend section 4 by striking out all of said section after the words "per annum," in the third line thereof, and inserting in lieu thereof the following: "which income shall be expended for the benefit of said tribes under direction of the Secretary of the Interior.

In section 3, line 13, amend by striking out "ten" and inserting "six."

Amend by adding the following after section 6, which shall be a new section of said bill:

SEC. 7. That whenever the Sac and Fox of the Missouria tribe of Indians shall, in open council in the usual manner, express their consent thereto, the Secretary of the Interior shall be, and hereby is, authorized, in like manner and upon the same terms prescribed in the preceding section of this act, to cause to be offered for sale a portion of their reservation lying in the States of Kansas and Nebraska, not exceeding in quantity ten sections of land, to be taken from the western portion thereof, and the proceeds arising therefrom shall be used for the benefit of said tribes as the Secretary of the Interior may direct.

Mr. KASSON. I ask that the first of those amendments will be read with the context so that we may understand it.

Mr. CROUNSE. I would say that it simply provides that a portion only of the reservation shall be sold, whereas the original bill provided for the sale of the entire reservation.

Mr. KASSON. I do not understand the first amendment.

The first amendment was again read.

Mr. MORGAN. I will state that the bill as it passed the Senate provided for the sale of the entire reservation and for the removal of these Indians to the Indian Territory. There was opposition to this on the part of the Indians, and it was agreed between members of the Senate and members representing the States of Kansas and Nebraska that only a portion of that reservation should be sold. This meets the approbation of the Department of the Interior. There are 170,000 acres of land in this reservation. The first amendment provides for the sale of 120,000 acres in the western portion, leaving them 50,000 acres; and there being only three hundred of these Indians, that is a sufficient amount of land for agricultural operations. The second amendment strikes from the Senate bill the provision for the removal to the Indian Territory of these Indians. The third amendment provides for the sale of a portion of the Sac and Fox reservation upon same terms.

Mr. LAWRENCE. This bill provides for the sale of some of these lands on a credit?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes, sir.

Mr. LAWRENCE. And provides that the purchaser shall pay 10 per cent. interest on the lands for which payments are not made at the time of sale, which seems to me that that is unnecessarily burdensome on the purchasers, and I suggest to the gentleman that it would be better to strike out 10 per cent. and insert 6 per cent. I am not aware of any instance where 10 per cent. has been charged in such cases.

Mr. MORGAN. Ten per cent. interest is the usual interest on deferred payments on the sale of school and other lands.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Well, it is too much.

Mr. MORGAN. Settlers are very willing to pay 10 per cent. interest in order to secure the deferred payment.

Mr. KASSON. I think that if the gentleman will allow an amendment reducing the rate of interest to 6 per cent. it would more accord with the practice of the Government and be more satisfactory to the people who buy these lands.

Mr. MORGAN. I have not yet moved the previous question, and the gentleman can offer the amendment.

Mr. KASSON. I would not do it without the gentleman's consent; but if he will allow me I will move to strike out 10 per cent. and insert 6 per cent.

Mr. MORGAN. I am willing to accept that.

Mr. KASSON. Then I offer that amendment.

Mr. LAWRENCE. It is much better to adopt that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman cannot accept an amendment, but he can allow it to be pending under the call for the previous question.

Mr. MORGAN. Very well, sir; then I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs were agreed to.

The amendment offered by Mr. KASSON was then agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

Mr. MORGAN. I move that the title be amended so as to read:

A bill to provide for the sale of a portion of the reservations to the confederated Otoe and Missouria, and the Sac and Fox, of the Missouri tribes to the Indians of the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

The amendment to the title was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

FAVORABLE REPORTS.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I have been instructed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report favorably sundry private bills, and to move their reference to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar.

Mr. EDEN. Is that in order under this call?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Any bill may be reported under this call. Public bills are not in order on Friday, because that is private bill day; but under the general call of committees for reports of a public nature any bill can be reported.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported favorably the following bills; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

A bill (H. R. No. 1047) for the relief of Frederick Heidelman;

A bill (H. R. No. 1953) for the relief of Alfred Muller, late acting assistant surgeon in the United States Army; and

A bill (H. R. No. 3407) to cancel and remove the charge and finding of desertion against Frederick Sunkel, late private Company A, Twelfth Regiment Missouri Volunteers.

EDWARD S. MEYER.

Mr. MACDOUGALL also, from the same committee, reported back, with amendments, House bill No. 36, to restore the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer to the active list of the Army.

The bill authorizes the President to restore to the active list of the Army the name of Captain Edward S. Meyer, of the Ninth Regiment of Cavalry, who was retired on the ——— day of ———, 187-, for reason of physical disability, resulting from wounds received at the battle of Chancellorsville, from which he has since sufficiently recovered to return to active duty, and to assign him to any vacancy in his grade now existing, or which may hereafter occur in any of the cavalry regiments of the Army; and provides that the rank and pay of the said Captain Edward S. Meyer shall be and continue the same as if he had remained in active service.

The first amendment of the committee was to fill the blanks in the bill so as to read "24th day of August, 1872."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out the words "and the rank and pay of the said Captain Edward S. Meyer shall be and continue the same as if he had remained in active service."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I call the previous question on the bill as amended.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

A. S. BLOOM.

Mr. JOHN REILLY, from the same committee, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3886) for the relief of A. S. Bloom, late a major in the Seventh Kentucky Volunteer Cavalry; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. JOHN REILLY also, from the same committee, reported adversely upon the following; which were laid on the table, and the accompanying reports ordered to be printed:

The petition of John C. Hawley, late a private Eighth New York Cavalry; and

The petition of A. P. Rambo, late of the Tennessee Cavalry Volunteers.

MILITARY ROAD IN DAKOTA.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS, from the same committee, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2653) making an appropriation for the improvement and repair of the military road between Springfield and Fort Randall, in the Territory of Dakota.

The bill proposed to appropriate $5,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, for the improvement and repair of the military road leading from Sioux City, in the State of Iowa, to Fort Randall, in the Territory of Dakota, the same to be expended between Springfield, in said Territory, and Fort Randall.

The amendment was to strike out "$5,000" and to insert "$2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. A. S. WILLIAMS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MILITARY POSTS ON THE YELLOWSTONE AND MUSCLESHELL RIVERS.

Mr. THORNBURGH, from the same commtitee, reported back with an amendment the bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers.

The preamble to the bill states that Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan and Brigadier-General Alfred H. Terry have, in their reports to the Secretary of War for the year 1875, set forth the great importance and immediate necessity of the construction of military posts at certain points on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers, in the Territory of Montana, and in the Military Department of Dakota, and such recommendations have been transmitted to Congress with the approval of the Secretary of War.

The bill appropriates the sum of $300,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the construction of such military posts or depots at such points as may be selected by the Secretary of War.

Mr. MAGINNIS. I hope there will be no objection to the passage of this bill at this time.

The amendment reported from the Committee on Military Affairs was to strike out "$300,000" and insert "$200,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. THORNBURGH moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALBERT W. PRESTON.

Mr. MACDOUGALL, from the same committee, reported back, with a favorable recommendation, the bill (S. No. 928) for the relief of Albert W. Preston.

The bill provides that Albert W. Preston, who was, on December 15, 1870, duly retired from the active service and placed upon the list of retired officers of the United States Army, with the full rank of colonel, on account of wounds received in battle while performing the duties of colonel in command of his regiment, shall be excepted and relieved from the operations of the act of Congress entitled "An act for the relief of General Samuel W. Crawford, and to fix the rank and pay of retired officers of the Army," approved March 3, 1875, solely because the injuries received by him in battle are more severe, dangerous, and disabling, and more fully incapacitate and disqualify him for any service than the loss of an arm or leg, or the permanent disability of an arm or leg by resection, and that he shall hereafter hold and receive the rank and pay of colonel upon the list of retired officers of the Army.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to be read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. MACDOUGALL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ADVERSE REPORTS.

Mr. BANNING, from the same committee, reported back the following petitions, with the recommendation that they be laid on the table:

The petition of the Illinois State Medical Society, praying such legislation as will place the Medical Corps of the Army on an equal footing with the officers of the staff corps of the Army.

The petition of the residents and citizens of Santa Fé, asking favorable legislation to increase the efficiency of the Medical Corps of the United States Army.

The motion was agreed to.

PROMOTION IN MEDICAL CORPS.

Mr. BANNING. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the following resolution, and to move that it be laid upon the table, as the legislation asked for has already passed the House:

A resolution to place the Medical Corps of the Army on an equal footing with other staff corps of the Army and with that of the Medical Corps of the Navy.

The motion was agreed to.

ENLISTED MEN AS SERVANTS.

Mr. BANNING. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back an executive document relative to the employment of enlisted men as servants with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table, as the legislation asked for has already passed the House.

The motion was agreed to.

EFFICIENCY OF THE ARMY.

Mr. BANNING. I am also directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back executive document relative to the passage of House bill (H. R. No. 2935) to promote the efficiency of the Army of the United States, to provide for its gradual reduction, and to consolidate certain of its staff departments, and for other purposes, with the recommendation that it be laid upon the table, as that bill has already passed the House.

The motion was agreed to.

BOUNTY.

Mr. THORNBURGH. I am directed by the Committee on Military Affairs to report back the petition of 48 soldiers of Allegheny County, Pennsylvania, in regard to bounty, and several other petitions on the same subject, with the recommendation that they be laid upon the table, the House having passed a bill covering those petitions.

PHILIP S. WALES.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported back a bill (S. No. 123) for the relief of Philip S. Wales, medical inspector in the United States Navy, with the recommendation that it do pass.

The bill, which was read, authorizes and directs the Secretary of the Navy to place on the prize-list of the United States steamship Pensacola the name of Philip S. Wales, with the rank of surgeon in the Navy, as being entitled to receive his share of the proceeds of the prize-money awarded to the fleet under command of Admiral Farragut, to which fleet Surgeon Wales was attached during the operations resulting in the capture of New Orleans in the month of May, 1862.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. I demand the previous question on the passage of that bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Is there a report accompanying that case?

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania. There is.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Then I ask for the reading of the report.

The Clerk read as follows:

This officer asks, in his memorial, that authority be given to enter his name on the list of those entitled to a share in the prize-money awarded to the fleet under command of the late Admiral Farragut for the capture and destruction of rebel vessels during certain engagements resulting in the capture of New Orleans in 1862.

His claim is based upon the following facts, established to the satisfaction of the committee: While attached to the United States sloop Vincennes, off Pass à l'Outre, in March, 1862, Wales applied for orders to some vessel intended to go up the Mississippi River with the attacking fleet, and on the 8th of that month was ordered to and reported for duty on the Colorado. It was ascertained, however, that this vessel could not pass over the bar, and he again applied for duty, and received the following autograph letter from Flag-Officer Farragut:

FLAG-SHIP WISSAHICKON,
Pilot Town, April 7, 1862.

SIR: You will take charge of the hospital at Pilot Town, and make such arrangements as you deem most necessary for the comfort of sick and wounded that may be committed to your charge.

You can take any of the houses in the place, or the furniture or other appliances that may be essential to the comfort of the sick or wounded.

Very respectfully,

D. G. FARRAGUT,
Flag-Officer.

Surgeon P. WALES,
United States Steamer Colorado.

He at once opened a hospital, agreeably to the foregoing order, and attended to the wounded as sent him from the vessels then forcing the passage of the river, and from time to time received orders from the fleet-surgeon which show the nature of his duties and his connection with the fleet.

After receiving orders to open the hospital, the paymaster of the Colorado transferred his accounts (May 21, 1862) to the paymaster of the Pensacola, but the orders of Wales not being directly to that vessel, but on duty to the whole attacking force, that officer would not take up his accounts, and they were kept by Wales himself until sent home sick, condemned by medical survey, in August of that year.

These facts show that Wales was attached to the fleet, and is, therefore, entitled to share in the prize-money awarded. If his accounts had been taken up by the officer of the Pensacola, then his name would have appeared on the list; but being immediately under Flag-Officer Farragut's orders, and detailed as before stated, the absence of his name on prize-list is, in the opinion of your committee, satisfactorily accounted for.

The following testimonials from naval officers so clearly state the facts in this case that they are printed in full as a part of this report:

PHILADELPHIA, March 2, 1864.

I hereby certify that Surgeon Philip S. Wales, United States Navy, was attached to Admiral Farragut's squadron at the time of the capture of New Orleans. He was ordered by Admiral Farragut to take charge of the United States naval hospital at Pilot Town, at the Southwest Pass, established at the time of the attack upon Forts Jackson and Saint Philip, and New Orleans.

Dr. Wales remained in charge of that hospital for some months with most responsible and laborious duties, treating the wounded and sick of the fleet with ability and in a manner most creditable to himself and to the service.

J. M. FOLTZ,
Surgeon United States Navy, late Fleet-Surgeon, &c.

WASHINGTON, D. C., October 14, 1875.

I certify that the accounts of Surgeon Philip S. Wales, United States Navy, were transferred from the United States steamer Colorado to the United States steamer Pensacola in 1862. The surgeon, Wales, was ordered to the West Gulf squadron and assigned to duty in charge of the sick and wounded at the hospital in Pilot Town, from some cause which I do not now recollect, but presume that from the fact of his being at a distance from the fleet, and there being no regular communication with the Pensacola, is a reason why his accounts were not taken up on the books of said ship, but should have been, and I conscientiously consider him entitled to a share of the "prize-money accruing from the capture of New Orleans and its defenses by Farragut's fleet."

GEO. L. DAVIS,
Pay Inspector United States Navy.
Late Paymaster of the United States Steamer Pensacola in 1862.

The committee are of the opinion that Surgeon Wales is entitled to the relief asked for, and report the accompanying bill without amendment and recommend its passage.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBBINS, of Pennsylvania, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN P. LOYAL.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill (H. R. No. 3887) for the payment of bounty and prize-money to Benjamin P. Loyal; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee of the Whole on the Private Calendar, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

COMMODORES ON RETIRED LIST.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, also, from the same committee, reported back a bill (H. R. No. 800) relating to the promotion of commodores on the retired list of the Navy, with amendments.

The bill, which was read, provides that section 1460 of the Revised Statutes, to wit: "There may be allowed upon the retired list of the Navy nine rear-admirals by promotion on that list: Provided, That this section shall not prevent the Secretary of the Navy from promoting to the grade of rear-admiral on the retired list, in addition to the number herein provided, those commodores who have commanded squadrons by order of the Secretary of the Navy, or who have performed other highly meritorious service," be amended by adding thereto the following words: "or who, being at the outbreak of the late war of the rebellion citizens of any State which engaged in such rebellion, exhibited marked fidelity to the Union in adhering to the flag of the United States."

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I now ask for the reading of the report from the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill H. R. No. 800, recommend that the same be amended as follows, namely: In line 4, after the word "statutes," insert the words "be so amended as to read as follows."

After the word "commodores," in line 9, strike out the words "who have commanded squadrons by order of the Secretary of the Navy, or."

In the eleventh line, after the word "performed," strike out the word "other," and in the same line, after the word "service," and in line 12 strike out the words "be amended by adding thereto the following words;" so that the same shall read as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 1460 of the Revised Statutes be so amended as to read as follows, to wit: "There may be allowed upon the retired list of the Navy nine rear-admirals by promotion on that list: Provided, That this section shall not prevent the Secretary of the Navy from promoting to the grade of rear-admiral on the retired list, in addition to the number herein provided, those commodores who have performed highly meritorious service, or who, being at the outbreak of the late war of the rebellion citizens of any State which engaged in such rebellion, exhibited marked fidelity to the Union in adhering to the flag of the United States."

And the committee recommend the passage of the bill as amended.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. The purpose of this bill is in the first place to limit the power of the Secretary of the Navy to appoint upon the retired list of rear-admirals commodores who have commanded squadrons by his own appointment. And the second object of the bill is to allow the Secretary of the Navy to appoint to the grade of rear-admiral commodores who at the outbreak of the war being citizens of Southern States, of States in rebellion, adhered to the cause of the Union. I understand, and I believe that it is the opinion of the committee, that this bill cannot affect more than one or two individuals. The individual particularly aimed at was nearly forty-five years in the service of his country, and was put upon the retired list as a commodore; when, if he had continued a few months, not more than two or three months, more as a commodore, he would have been entitled to be retired as a rear-admiral. This is the object of the bill. I call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the amendments were agreed to, and the bill, as amended, was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAGE. Has the morning hour expired?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The morning hour has expired.

Mr. RICE. I move that the House now resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. No. 2893) to provide for arrears of pensions on account of death, or wounds received, or disease contracted in the service of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1861, and for the payment of the same.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I desire to call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the unfinished business before the House now that has precedence of all others is the report of the Committee on Texas Border Troubles.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] rise?

Mr. BOONE. I desire to make another effort to take up the motion I made to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman from New York [Mr. HEWITT] rise?

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. I rise to a privileged report. By order of the House the Committee on Foreign Affairs was authorized to report at any time in the matter of the investigation of the Emma Mine. I desire now to report back the report and evidence which were recommitted to the committee, and to ask for a vote on the resolution with which the report concludes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state the order of precedence in regard to these several matters, and the order in which the question of consideration can be raised between them. The gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT,] however, rises to a privileged report, and is entitled to the floor. The question will then recur on the next question of highest privilege, that of reconsideration, moved by the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. BOONE.] If the House chooses to take up that question the others will for the present be delayed. If the House refuses to consider it, the question will next recur, Will the House consider at this time the report made by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] on the subject of Texas border troubles? If the House should refuse to consider that report the question will then recur on the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. RICE,] that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the bill reported from the Committee on Invalid Pensions. The Chair will now hear the report of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. HEWITT.]

EMMA MINE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York. The Committee on Foreign Affairs instruct me to report back the report and evidence in the case of the Emma Mine investigation, to submit the resolution with which the report concludes, and to ask for a vote of the House thereon; and on that I call the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That this House condemns the action of General Robert C. Schenck, United States minister at the court of St. James, in becoming a director of the Emma Silver-Mining Company of London, and his operations in connection with the shares of the said company and the vendors thereof, as ill-advised, unfortunate, and incompatible with the duties of his official position.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this resolution the gentleman from New York asks the previous question. Is there a second?

The previous question was seconded and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the resolution was adopted.

Mr. HEWITT, of New York, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question recurs, Will the House now consider the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BOONE] to reconsider the vote by which the bill (S. No. 590) providing for an agreement with the Sioux Nation in regard to a portion of their reservation, and for other purposes, was recommitted to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

Mr. CONGER. I wish to reserve points of order on that bill.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I desire to debate that question if it is debatable.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is not debatable. This is simply a question of priority of business. It may be discussed on the motion to reconsider, provided the House agrees to take up that question. But the question now is, Will the House consider that question?

Mr. CONGER. Would that be the regular order of business, except for raising the question of consideration?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to reconsider is a privileged motion, and may be brought up at any time. This comes in among the regular orders of the day, and has the highest privilege of the various questions now presented to the House.

Mr. BANNING. I would like to have the bill again reported by its title.

The title of the bill was again read.

The question of consideration of Mr. BOONE's motion being taken, there were—ayes 30, noes 50; no quorum voting.

Mr. BOONE. I call for further count.

Mr. YOUNG. I think if the House understood the nature of this bill and its importance there could be no objection to considering it at this time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Debate is not in order.

Mr. YOUNG. It is a bill of the highest importance.

Mr. CONGER. I think we had better find out whether the Sioux have captured all our Army before we go to treating with them.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. SCHLEICHER and Mr. BOONE were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 25, noes not counted.

So the House refused to consider Mr. BOONE's motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The next question is on the consideration of the joint resolution reported by the gentleman from Texas; the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande. The question is, Will the House at this time take that resolution into consideration?

The question being taken, there were—ayes 37, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Tellers were ordered; and Mr. LUTTRELL and Mr. SCHLEICHER were appointed.

The House again divided; and the tellers reported ayes 85, noes not counted.

So the House agreed to consider the joint resolution.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande.

The motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE ARGENTINE REPUBLIC.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Before the House goes into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the Chair, by unanimous consent, lays before the House a telegram, which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW YORK, July 11, 1876.

To Congress:

Argentine congress, inspired by sacred remembrances to-day raises in freemen's souls, heartily congratulate your Congress on the glorious centenary of that great country.

Given congress in session.

MARIANO ACOSTA CARLOS SARARIA,
Secretary.

BUENOS AYRES, July 4, 1876.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The telegram will be referred to the Committee on the Centennial.

Mr. KASSON. I think it should go to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and I make that motion.

The motion of Mr. KASSON was agreed to.

VETO MESSAGE—NELSON TIFFANY.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House the following veto message from the President of the United States:

To the House of Representatives:

For the reasons set forth in the accompanying report of the Secretary of War, I have the honor to return herewith, without my approval, House bill No. 1337, entitled "An act for the relief of Nelson Tiffany."

U. S. GRANT.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, July 11, 1876.

Mr. CONGER. If the report accompanying the message is not long I would like to have it read.

The report of the Secretary of War was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, June 7, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to return House bill No. 1377 for the relief of Nelson Tiffany.

The Adjutant-General, to whom the bill was referred, reports as follows: "Nelson Tiffany, private Company A, Twenty-fifth Massachusetts Volunteers, deserted October 10, 1864, and remained absent until April 25, 1865, when he surrendered under the President's proclamation, thereby acknowledging his desertion."

If this bill becomes a law it will not only falsify the records of this Department, but will be an injustice to every man who served honorably during the war of the rebellion.

I inclose the report (No. 402) of the Senate Committee on Military Affairs in this case.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

Mr. BANNING. I move that the message and accompanying documents be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

CLAIMS FOR INDIAN DEPREDATIONS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting the claims of sundry individuals for damages from Indian depredations; which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

COST OF MILITARY COMMISSION.

The SPEAKER pro tempore also, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a report of the Adjutant-General as to the cost, &c., of the European commission, consisting of Majors Delafield and Mordecai and Captain G. B. McClellan, United States Army; which was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

PROTECTION OF THE TEXAS FRONTIER.

The House then resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MONROE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, upon which the gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] was entitled to the floor.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. Mr. Chairman, here is an evil that ought to have been remedied long ago. The marauding of the lawless characters gathered upon the right bank of the Rio Grande has been carried on unchecked from year to year until the patience of any government and of any people ought to have been long ago exhausted. Indeed, sir, were it not for the fact that we look with compassion upon the condition of our sister republic upon the other side of the Rio Grande and consider her to be in the condition of a human frame so affected by disease that the blood circulates but feebly in the extremities, war should have been declared long since. Had these outrages been perpetrated for six months continuously from the Canada border where we have adjoining our Republic an enemy worthy of our steel, war would have been declared and the wrongs would have been avenged by the strong hand, the ultima ratio of all people, as well as of kings. But, sir, I rejoice that war has not been declared. I rejoice that we have exhibited to the world a specimen of the forbearance of the Republic toward a neighbor that has intended us no wrong. And even now, if these resolutions are voted upon separately, I shall feel myself at liberty to vote against the second resolution. But I say without hesitation that if the majority of this House are in favor of adopting the second as well as the first resolution, I shall vote for them both, I am prepared to swallow the whole.

Sir, the highest duty of a government to her citizens is protection. She has not the right to sit still and say, "You owe me your allegiance; your property is mine, if I ask for it according to the forms of the Constitution; your lives are mine, if I call upon you for the defense of the Government; but your protection shall be left to your own hands." Sir, I care not whether the citizens who claim the protection of the Government live in Texas, live in Louisiana, live in Mississippi, live about Augusta, upon the borders between Georgia and South Carolina, I am ready to use the ægis and the power of the Government to defend the citizen that is attacked and marauded on.

But it will be said, and I concede it, that the acts authorized by the second resolution, i. e., the authorization by the President to the Army to follow red-handed robbers and murderers across the border may lead to war. They may very possibly lead to war, and were these acts so frequently perpetrated upon our brethren of Texas authorized to be done upon our northern border, and they were accomplished, they would lead to war. I have not forgotten, sir, how the United States fermented and heaved with excitement when a band of men from Canada came over to Schlosser's, just about the Falls of Niagara, and cut out the steamer Caroline in our waters. This was a vessel that had been engaged in marauding across the river into the British possessions. Upon that vessel was one individual. The vessel, being cut out, went over the Falls of Niagara, and a human life was lost, not hundreds, as in the case of Texas, but one life was lost, and I know that at that time, as a citizen of the State of New York, I would have sacrificed everything that I possessed and everything that I hoped for to have had that insult to our flag avenged.

But Mexico has no right to complain. We forbear simply because of her weakness. We should be doing ourselves injustice if we waited a single day before declaring war if Mexico was a power that we thought was fully able to do what a neighboring nation ought to do, and to vindicate her own soil from being the refuge of robbers and murderers who commit their depredations upon a neighboring state.

But, it is said, your Army is weak. Yes, we have but a small Army; we have scarce twenty-five thousand men in our Army. We have a war upon our hands in the Northwest, a war as well foreseen in December last as it is to-day, a war that has been threatening, a war that has been notified to this House and to this nation. And yet we have but 25,000 men in our Army. Not only have we but 25,000 in our Army, but this House, in so far as it was able to do so, has engaged in the unholy task of cutting down that pitiful number. We have an Army of but 25,000 men to guard a frontier of sea and land against foreign nations of more than fifteen thousand miles; an Army of 25,000 to keep in order 200,000 savages, professed savages, savages that nobody has any doubt about, in addition to other savages that have their defenders. This House has endeavored to cut down that Army by something like four thousand men.

But there was a glorious object connected with that; in cutting down the Army two blows could be struck. In 1866 the Government of the United States, feeling that 4,000,000 of men who had been enfranchised by the events of the war were entitled to join with others in bearing arms in the defense of their rights; feeling that it was a violation of duty and a violation of the principles of equality to deny to any citizen of the country the right to bear arms, although they knew it was done in some countries—they knew that when that horde of godless robbers, the Turks, from the interior of Asia invaded the east of Europe and conquered the Christian countries there as well as in the west of Asia, they denied to their Christian subjects the right to bear arms; but those who in 1866 sat in these Halls did not propose that this nation should be a body of Turks, and they created two colored regiments.

In 1869, believing that the proportion of colored men in the Army was not sufficient to give them their fair opportunity to learn the art of war, to be instructed in the means of personal defense, to bear arms in the cause of a country which we may presume they love as well as we, we created two more regiments. Therefore, when this House met in last December we had two regiments of infantry of colored men and two regiments of cavalry of colored men. And the work of this House has been to legislate these men out of the rights which we conferred upon them by the legislation of 1866 and 1869.

Now, there is no mistake about that. We hear a great deal upon the other side about legislating in the interest of economy. This is not merely legislating in the interest of economy. The bill itself as it passed this House—(I hope to God it will be stopped in the other body)—the bill itself as it passed this House was drawn I presume by the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs in such wise that there should be no mistake either as to the object or purport of the proposed legislation. Sections 1104 and 1108 of the Revised Statutes, providing that the enlisted men of certain regiments shall be colored men, are thereby repealed. But we are not left there. Mr. SMALLS, of South Carolina, moved that hereafter enlistments in the Army may be without respect to color, and this House voted it down so quick that it made his head swim.

Mr. BANNING. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I have no time. The gentleman will excuse me; I have but my hour.

Mr. BANNING. I will not take a minute.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I will not allow you a minute. I have had to sit here for the last seven months with my mouth closed without an opportunity from month to month to utter one word. I have been compelled to listen to the tirade of abuse and misrepresentation poured upon my party until at last I am on the floor. [Laughter.] Now wait your time, introduce your resolution, move the previous question on it, shut my mouth, and then tell your story. [Laughter.]

Now, this is all very well. These men are nothing but "niggers." They hold an inferior position; they are not as wise as we are; they are not as intelligent as we are; they are not as rich as we are. If some of us did a short time ago love these colored men better than the chairmen of some committees do to-day, before they got into their present company and their present association, still they are nothing but "niggers" after all.

But I never pass out of yonder door into the Hall where the House of Representatives were wont to meet until a recent date, but what I am filled with an emotion such as I rarely feel in this world, in looking upon the features of that lovely face hanging there portraying the lineaments of Thomas Jefferson. I learned my politics of him, and he learned his at the source of all good, whether he knew where his teaching came from or not.

More than fifty years ago, yes, sixty years ago, I read in the writings of that man, when speaking of the treatment by the American people toward these blacks, these words: "When I remember that God is just, I tremble for my country."

It has been a long, long time since that utterance. God's providence has moved slowly but it has moved surely. It never fails. When in the spring and summer of 1864 I saw those immense bodies of men on the one side and the other gathered at Charlottesville, at Gordonsville, in the Wilderness and all the way to Richmond, in Richmond and around Richmond, I thought I could see the shade of Thomas Jefferson standing at Monticello looking about him upon the serried ranks and the monstrous slaughter and saying: "When I remember that God is just, I tremble for my country."

Gentlemen, every suffering of that war, every noble spirit upon the southern side, every noble spirit upon the northern side that has been quenched, every limb that has been lost, every family that has been widowed, every little cluster of orphans owe it all to the wrong which under God the people of this country have done to the colored man. And continue it, and I tell you, although "the mills of God grind slowly," the time will come when you will find "they grind exceeding small."

Why, sir, there stands now in the world an illustration of how slowly and yet how finely God's mills do grind. Four thousand years ago there was a family of guests in Egypt that had come in there perhaps two thousand strong to seek bread in a dreadful famine. The Egyptains had the power; these men were weak and they were reduced to slavery. For nearly four hundred years they were enslaved. By and by the time came when I presume the chairman of some committee on military affairs in Egypt proposed a bill which was adopted by which the males were directed to be stifled by the midwives at their birth. How powerful Egypt was at that day! How improbable it was God could ever avenge the wrong! Yet that people, whose males were to be exterminated at birth, have been kept by God in the hollow of His hand. They have been persecuted by Christian nations in modern times until we gave them the first real enfranchisement. Latterly all western Europe has put them upon a footing of equality; and now after four thousand years the nation that persecuted and oppressed them only exists in a few starved villages upon the banks of the Nile; blear-eyed, dirty, hopeless, they are starving in that land of eternal plenty, while the oppressed race has risen and flourished and bids fair in the next fifty years to absorb the majority of land in your commercial metropolis.

Ah! not only so, but this inferior people, who were not capable of understanding the wisdom of Egypt, stands to-day in the three great nations of western Europe as the interpreters of the principles of government. Castellar in Spain, Gambetta in France, Disraeli, prime minister in England, are of this race that was put down four thousand years ago, and whose wrongs it was believed God never would avenge.

But, Mr. TOWNSEND, are you opposed to legislation in the interest of economy? Mr. Chairman, there are other things in government besides economy. The people of this country understand that there are other things in this Government besides economy. It was believed in 1860 that the great body of this nation was so wedded to the almighty dollar that it would consent to have that judgment passed which the false mother asked Solomon to execute—that we would consent to have the professedly beloved child cut in two because it could be done in the interest of economy. Sir, our people rose as one man, and we pursued the democratic party, for it was the democratic party that did it, until we reversed the judgment which this woman proposed to have entered. Ay, sir, we expended over $5,000,000,000. We not only expended that money, but, thank God and the brave spirits of the country, we paid over three thousand millions of money. Five thousand millions we expended, and we have actually paid and wiped off the slate three thousand millions, so that there are but about two thousand millions remaining to be paid, and by God's help that sum shall be paid to the last dollar.

"In the interest of economy!" Has God made a true and loyal American who would be willing to see our ministers and consuls degraded in foreign courts and before foreign governments? Let the work go on, cripple the Government to your will, disgrace the Government before foreign nations; but you will find it will awaken a spirit such as was awakened in 1860 and has never been put down, and will not be put down to the end of time, certainly not until another Centennial.

I read in a newspaper the other morning a speech, made, as was stated, by Hon. JOHN RANDOLPH TUCKER, from Virginia, and I think I have a right to presume it was made by the same gentleman who represents the Appomattox district in this House. He says that we must carry out the principles of economy; that under Buchanan's administration the expense of this Government was but $2 to the individual, while under this Administration it is eighteen. I do not know whether his figures are correct or not; I do not care whether they are correct or not. But, sir, I put it to you and the country to know whose fault it was that the expenses of this Government are what they are?

Is it the fault of the republicans? We had an election in 1856. The republicans cast nearly as many votes as the democrats. James Buchanan, a democrat, was elected. Did not the republicans submit? Were not the four years of Buchanan's administration perfectly peaceable, so far as the minority were concerned? And yet in 1860, when the republicans elected their President, the democratic party revolted; O, do not say the South; four out of five of the democratic constituency of this country revolted as democrats. And for four long years we were called to pour out our treasure and to shed the blood of our boys—O, and God forgive us, of their boys—the bravest and best fell on both sides; and we have incurred a debt of five thousand millions of money. Three thousand millions have been paid off by the republican party, and about two thousand millions remain. The interest on that portion of remaining debt which bears interest is in round numbers $100,000,000 per annum, and this a portion of our annual expenditure.

Did republicans cause that? Did Grant cause that expenditure? Would not the republican party have been accursed before God and the world had not those expenditures been made? I submit it as well to men who took the southern side in that conflict as to men who took the northern side. I will not now stop to talk about the brave boys on the southern side who fill graves over which no monuments have been erected. But there is another item. We feel ourselves bound to gather the bones of the honorable dead who fell under the flag of the country into cemeteries, and we are putting head-stones over them. We are appointing keepers to those cemeteries and the American flag waves over them. And God grant that it may wave over them to the end of time.

But we have to pay thirty-odd millions—I think that amount has now been reached, it is in the neighborhood of $30,000,000—to pension the maimed, the halt, the wounded, and the blind that have come home from the war; making, with the interest on the debt, $130,000,000. And more than half of the entire clerical force employed at Washington is employed in matters connected with the administration of those duties devolved upon the country by the results of the war. And if the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. TUCKER] or any other democrat, South or North, can get any pleasure in reading up the record, God grant that his soul may be filled with rejoicing.

Let the country bear witness I have not introduced this thing. When I spoke here before, alluding to these subjects, I did it with a degree of kindness that certainly no living man can complain of. I say now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that there is not lingering in the bottom of my heart one drop of unkindness toward the men engaged in that struggle. I say to them, "Come up, gather around me, or I will go down to you if you will let me, and we will build up again the walls of our national Zion." But when from your side of the House you taunt us with the expenses you have caused us, our human nature would be craven if we did not stand up and tell whence this offense comes.

But we are all full of "economy" now. I am after economy. I want to talk a little more about economy. One of the economical propositions is to reduce the force employed in the Government offices. One is to reduce the pay of our consuls abroad. Another is to reduce the number of our foreign ministers. Another is to cut down the salaries of those that are clerks in the great national offices. But remember, O! my fellow-citizens of the country, remember it is easier for the majority of this House to do this thing than for the minority. I know that it must plague some men to walk about the halls of our public offices and see the empty sleeve and to remember who made that sleeve empty. I know that the clump of the wooden foot upon the pavement and in the corridors is not to all a pleasant sound; I know the sight of the altered figure of a man upon crutches, with the consciousness that you or I brought him to crutches, is not a pleasant sight. But I do not think the employment of such men in our national offices is distasteful to the great nation that we sit here to represent.

But our salaries must be cut down! It is a great measure of reform. It is in the interest of economy. And that man whose magic wand raised about the center of this House, a little upon the left side, whips every man that wants a party standing into line, tells us that it must be done. He admits that he thought differently three or four years ago; that he thought that, instead of a salary of $5,000 as we found it when we were elected, the salary ought to be $7,500. He admits that he has been converted! Now, sir, I love conversion. Conversion is the very life of the Christian Church. Conversion is the very life of the democratic or republican church. But, sir, in conversion we expect converts to do works meet for repentance. And if I am rightly informed my powerful and potential friend on the other side of the House carries on his work as an exhorter recently converted on this subject with $5,000 in his pocket; no restitution made in that religious church; the $5,000 received for increase of salary and back pay; while we are lectured and his own party friends are menaced if they do not vote to make the salaries $4,500. Now I will not say that the gentleman is playing against us with loaded dice. That is not quite the thing. But I say this: I say he has an advantage at the start. He goes into this fight as I saw a boy once with pieces of bread and butter in both hands going out of his father's house. I asked the man where his boy was going. He said he was going off to starve. Now our friend from Pennsylvania starts with $5,000 in his pocket to go off to starve. And I want the country to understand that this convert to the doctrine of retrenchment, "intrenchment," reform and deformity keeps his $5,000, if I am rightly informed, in his pocket. If I am wrong and any gentleman tells me so I will make the amende honorable; but so I am informed.

Mr. BLAND. The gentleman from Pennsylvania is not in his seat; he is out on a committee of conference, and I do not think it fair that the gentleman should assail him in his absence.

Mr. TOWNSEND, of New York. I shall have no other opportunity. If the gentleman from Missouri would give me the opportunity to say these things when the gentleman from Pennsylvania was in his seat, I would say them then; but this potential wand has met me here during the winter and I have not been permitted even to protest against most of the partisan measures and harangues which have been made in this House, so that I have to use the means which God and nature have put in my power to fight the Tammany savages. [Laughter.]

Now, sir, I would not do any hurt to Tammany. I do not want to say anything wrong or to do any wrong to Tammany; but inasmuch as Tammany is professedly our Indian organization, I used the term "savages" simply in that sense. [Laughter.] I do not want to say an unkind thing or an unparliamentary thing, for I have lived in this House seven months without doing so, and if I have done any one injustice or harm on this occasion just let me be corrected, and I will take back what I have said with a good will, and what I have said shall never go out to the world. So much so far as that is concerned.

Now, sir, I have said about all I have wanted to say about this matter. Is not the Government rich enough to defend Texas from the little state of Tamaulipas or against the republic of Mexico? Were it not for the fact that we have taken Texas under our ægis, covered her with our shield, Texas could take care of these men; but she pays her taxes to us; she gives us her ports in which to collect our revenue; she is a loyal State in this confederacy. I grant you that formerly Texas went out of the Union in the rebellion; but there never was a time when a majority of the citizens of Texas would not have preferred, had their position been consistent with it, that the Stars and Stripes should forever have floated over that State. But whether this be so or not, whether I am right about it or not, since reconstruction there has been no State more loyal, more true to us, more faithful to the flag, and as a consequence more flourishing than the State of Texas.

And let me say here, because I ought to say it, that if more disturbed States would faithfully and cordially accept the state of things created by the result of the last war and the passage of the amendments to the Constitution, more of those States would be at peace, more would flourish. Ay, you would have what I intimated some time ago—you would have the providence of God with you; and when God is for you, who shall be against you? and when God is against you, you may have the most flippant politicians, as flippant as on the other side of the House or on this in your favor, and yet the judgment of God will be ground out, and you will be ground under it as between the upper and the nether millstones.

Mr. STEVENSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire, before the vote is taken upon the joint resolution reported by the Select Committee on Texas Frontier Troubles, to offer an amendment striking out the second section of the joint resolution.

I shall offer this amendment, sir, for the purpose of avoiding a grave error into which we shall be led by its adoption. While I am not unmindful of the terrible condition of affairs upon our southwestern frontier and shall most cheerfully co-operate with the select committee in whatever lawful measures may be necessary for the adequate protection of our citizens upon the Mexican border, yet, sir, I am unwilling even, to accomplish a desired end, to vote for a measure which amounts to a declaration of war against a nation with which our Government is now at peace. Certainly, sir, the measure here proposed should only be resorted to when all others have failed. The section of the joint resolution of which I complain is as follows:

SEC. 2. That, in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier, above described, to order the troops to cross the Rio Grande, and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases, against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

Mr. Chairman, I confess my amazement that such a resolution should have met the grave indorsement of the distinguished gentlemen who constitute this select committee. Stripped of its verbiage, what does this resolution mean? With a preamble asserting the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, it authorizes and empowers the President of the United States to order our troops into Mexico whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of our citizens upon the Texas frontier. In other words, it authorizes the President of the United States to violate a well-settled principle of international law. It authorizes him to commit an act which, unexplained, is by all governments regarded as a sufficient pretext for war. It authorizes the invasion by an armed force of the domain of a friendly power. For one I desire, here and now, to enter my solemn protest against conferring upon the Executive a power the exercise of which may prove so pernicious in its consequences. No right is more sacredly and jealously guarded by a government than that of the inviolability of its territory. Its failure to defend this right or to secure redress for its violation is an evidence of weakness and demonstrates its incapacity for the high prerogatives of sovereignty.

Vattel, on page 169, says:

Since the least encroachment on the territory of another is an act of injustice, in order to avoid the commission of any such act and to prevent every subject of discord, every occasion of quarrel, the limits of territories ought to be marked out with clearness and precision. We should not only refrain from usurping the territory of others; we should also abstain from every act contrary to the rights of the sovereign, for a foreign nation can claim no right in it. We cannot then, without doing an injustice to a state, enter its territories with force and arms in pursuit of a criminal and take him thence. This would at once be a violation of the safety of the state and a trespass on the rights of empire, or supreme authority vested in the sovereign. This is what is called a violation of territory, and among nations there is nothing more generally acknowledged as an injury that ought to be vigorously repelled by every state that would not suffer itself to be oppressed.

Other authorities to the same point might be cited, but that to which I have referred is, the world over, a standard upon international law.

Sir, in the light of the authority I have read and of all of the recognized authorities upon this subject, how can the Congress of the United States stand justified in the adoption of a solemn resolution authorizing the President for any purpose to order troops across the Rio Grande without the consent of the republic of Mexico? The necessity of protecting our citizens from border raids does not relieve us from the question of international law involved. Mexico has sovereign rights to be considered eqnally with our own. We cannot presume that she would regard the unauthorized invasion of her territory in any other light than as an act of hostility calling for an apology from our Government, or, failing in this, in a resort to arms. An invasion of empire, not by irresponsible parties, but inspired by solemn act of Congress. Sir, it would illy comport with the dignity or power of this great Republic, with its forty-four millions of people, to trench even to a hair's breadth upon the rights or sovereignty of a friendly power. The greater the internal discord and the less able, as is the Republic of Mexico, to maintain inviolate her sovereign rights, the greater the reproach upon us, should our Government wantonly invade them.

I do not question the assertion, Mr. Chairman, that the authority conferred by this resolution would be exercised with due caution by the Executive. The danger does not rest here alone. The discretion is vested in the troops when within the domain of a foreign power "to use such means as they may find necessary" for recovering stolen property, checking the raids, &c.

Is there a Representative upon this floor who would for a moment consent that our Government should submit that the troops of a foreign power should, under the pretext of "recovering stolen property" or of "checking raids," invade the territory of the United States? Would not the attempted enforcement of such a resolution by the republic of Mexico or the dominion of Canada call for prompt and aggressive action upon the part of our Government? The golden rule applies to nations as well as to individuals.

Sir, the passage of this resolution is a step in the wrong direction. Of what avail are extradition treaties if the doctrine announced in this resolution is to become the settled or even occasional policy of our Government? The passage of this resolution calls a halt in our progress toward that glad era in the world's history when enlightened arbitration is to supplant the sword. If this resolution is to pass and the sovereign rights of Mexico to be invaded in order that cattle-thieves may be captured and raiders punished, why not reclaim and punish Brent and Winslow in the same summary manner? Why await the slow movements of diplomacy in the formation of a new extradition treaty with Great Britain? Is the answer to be found in the fact that the latter government is able, while Mexico is not, to protect itself against such encroachment?

Mr. Chairman, have we so soon forgotten the lessons of history? Have we so soon forgotten that because of the violation of the laws of nations in the seizure of Slidell and Mason in a neutral vessel upon the high seas the Secretary of State was compelled, upon the part of our Government, to disclaim the act, and that, too, after Congress had extended a vote of thanks to the captors? Sir, within a few hours this House has made final disposition of fifteen and a half millions of dollars in gold, paid into our Treasury by Great Britain because of her violation of the laws of nations.

Mr. Chairman, as to what would be the effect of the adoption of this resolution by Congress, and of its attempted enforcement by military power, I will not attempt to forecast. That it would result in a serious rupture between the two governments I can hardly believe; but that it would give the Mexican government just cause for complaint can hardly be denied. There are reasons to which I need hardly advert why Mexico would regard with grave apprehensions the invasion of her territory by our troops for any purpose, or under any pretext.

I have given, sir, briefly my reasons in opposition to the passage of the second resolution reported by the select committee. The able arguments of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SCHLEICHER] and of my colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] have failed to convince me of the propriety of its adoption. It can hardly be that this House will upon reflection commit itself to a resolution in direct violation of the law of nations. However desirable the end, it cannot be reached by the violation of one jot or tittle of the rights of a sister republic. The resolution, sir, is fraught with danger. We cannot upon the pretext of doing a great right do a little wrong.

"Twill be recorded for a precedent;
And many an error, by the same example,
Will rush into the state: it cannot be.

Mr. Chairman, the first resolution reported by the committee meets with my hearty indorsement. That resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That, for the purpose of giving efficient protection to the country between the Rio Grande and Nueces River, in the State of Texas, from the cattle-thieves, robbers, and murderers from the Mexican side of the river, the President of the United States be, and hereby is, authorized and required to station and keep on the Rio Grande River, from the mouth of that river to the northern boundary of the state of Tamaulipas, above Laredo, two regiments of cavalry for field service, in addition to such infantry force as may be necessary for garrison duty, and to assign recruits to said regiments, so as to fill each troop to number one hundred privates; and they shall be kept up to that strength as long as they shall be required in that service.

The Government owes protection to its humblest citizen. No matter what the cost, the settler upon the Rio Grande must be protected from the depredations of the thieves and robbers that have so long infested our southwestern border. No words of mine can add to the description already given of the border outrages by the eloquent gentleman who represents the Rio Grande district upon this floor.

By the resolution just read two regiments of cavalry, with such infantry force as may be necessary, are provided. To the passage of this resolution I think there can be no possible objection. If this force is inadequate to the full protection of the most remote settler between the Rio Grande and the Nueces, then let it be augmented as experience may demonstrate the necessity. The humblest settler upon the frontier must find ample protection at the hands of his Government. Far removed from the great centers of civilization he must none the less be protected by the strong arm of that Government. I agree with the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. CONGER,] that ten or even twenty regiments, if necessary, must be furnished to protect the property and lives of the settlers upon our frontiers. As to the imperative duty of the Government in this respect there can be no question whatever.

But, sir, while I shall vote for the first section of the joint resolution, I shall at the proper time, for the reasons indicated, move to strike out the remaining section. I am persuaded, Mr. Chairman, that full protection can be guaranteed to every citizen without the violation of any of the sovereign rights of the republic of Mexico.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, for one of the Representatives on this floor from Texas, I desire to say that that State feels too deep an interest in the success of this measure to allow either one of her Representatives to be drawn off into the discussion of general politics while this measure is under consideration. The gentleman from New York [Mr. TOWNSEND] will therefore fail in his object, so far as I am concerned, to lead us away from the subject under consideration.

Sir, the able and exhaustive report of the committee presents to the consideration of the House a subject of deep interest to the people of the State of Texas and should be of like importance to the people of all the States. In view of the connection of the questions presented with the State which I have the honor in part to represent I shall claim the indulgence of the House to submit some remarks upon them.

The evidence which accompanies the report of the committee establishes several propositions in connection with the Texas frontier troubles. Among them may be mentioned—

First. That for many years that section of the State which is embraced between the Rio Grande and Nueces River, immediately in front of the State of Tamaulipas in Mexico, has been subject to incursions and raids by armed bands of Mexicans, subjects of the Mexican government.

Second. That these bands and parties of armed men are organized in Mexico for the purpose of entering upon the territory of Texas to rob and plunder our citizens of their property and drive them from their homes or murder them.

Third. That these raids, with varying degrees of atrocity, have been more frequent within the last eighteen months than at any time before, and have resulted in the loss to our citizens of a large amount of property and many valuable lives.

Fourth. That so insecure have life and property become in that locality in consequence of these raids that a reign of terror exists, and this section of the State is in danger of being entirely overrun and devastated by Mexicans, subjects of the government of Mexico.

Fifth. That these armed organizations are openly formed in Mexico and that government is either powerless or unwilling to repress them.

Sixth. That the property stolen from our citizens is often openly exhibited in Mexico and sold in open market to agents and officers of the Mexican government, and the violators of the law are protected and shielded from punishment by a prevailing sentiment of hostility to the inhabitants of that section of the State of Texas.

I have said, sir, that all of these propositions are established by the evidence which accompanies the report of the committee; and inasmuch as this evidence is printed and placed on the desk of each member, I shall not trouble the House with reading at large from it, but will append to my remarks such portions of it as I may deem necessary to refer to.

Mr. Chairman, the state of affairs which exists to-day on that border, and which has existed, with more or less atrocity, for many years, has not been entirely unknown to the authorities of this Government. Governors of the State of Texas, Representatives in Congress, commissioners appointed by Congress to ascertain the loss to life and property on that border, Legislatures of the State, conventions of the people without regard to party, grand juries, and a vigilant and able public press, from time to time, have earnestly called the attention of the authorities to the condition of the people in that section, and have earnestly invoked protection against the incursions and raids of Mexicans.

The Government has not been altogether indifferent to the memorials and application for aid which have from time to time been made, but the means which have heretofore been employed to give protection have been wholly inadequate and insufficient; and the failure, so long persisted in, to adopt the proper means to suppress the outrages upon life and property has resulted in that deplorable state of affairs which the proof, now before us, shows to exist.

Sir, it is remarkable that this Government, possessing such power and strength, and always so justly jealous of its honor and the rights of its citizens, should have submitted so long to the invasion of its territory by armed bands of subjects of a neighboring power, without resorting to those means which are clearly within its power, and which are adequate to give complete protection, repose, and tranquillity to that distracted border. Notwithstanding the inadequacy of the force employed to protect it has been known and admitted for years by the highest officers of the Government, desolation and death have been allowed to riot in that locality, until one of the fairest sections of the State has been surrendered up to a reign of terror, anarchy, and crime.

We are told, Mr. Chairman, to look for an excuse for the apathy and indifference of the Government to the wrongs and outrages which have been inflicted upon our citizens in the remoteness of that border from the seat of Government and the difficulty of obtaining and transmitting correct information, the anxiety of this Government to maintain and preserve friendly relations with a neighboring republic, weak and distracted by revolutions constantly recurring, the anomalous condition of the Southern States, and the alleged conflict of evidence as to the true cause and responsibility of these troubles.

Mr. Chairman, whatever may have been the cause which has heretofore controlled the action of the Government in withholding the means of adequate and complete protection against the outrages complained of, there can be no justification for withholding them any longer. The evidence now before Congress presents the true condition of that border and the causes which have produced it, and it appeals in the strongest terms to those in whose hands rest the power and honor of the country to apply a complete and adequate remedy.

When Texas was admitted into the Union she surrendered to the General Government her right to keep and maintain an army for defense, save in one emergency named in the Constitution. Her forts and public defenses and all munitions of war were conveyed to the General Government. I beg to read a part of the second section of the resolutions of annexation, which is as follows:

> Said State, when admitted into the Union, after ceding to the United States all public edifices, fortifications, barracks, ports and harbors, navy and navy-yards, docks, magazines, arms and armaments, and all other property and means pertaining to the public defense belonging to the republic of Texas, shall, &c.

No right remains to the State of Texas to even treat with a foreign government for peace. The General Government is bound by the highest obligations of sovereignty and the imperious demands of national honor to protect its citizens from the encroachments of foreign enemies and the inviolability of its territory from invasion. No higher or more binding obligation rests upon this Government, and all who appreciate its obligations or have a due regard for the preservation of the honor of the Government will unite, or should do so, in producing a remedy which shall be ample, just, and adequate to put an end to the incursions of armed Mexicans upon the territory of Texas.

What remedy, Mr. Chairman, ought to be applied? There must be a change. The present mode of defense has proven to be wholly insufficient and inadequate. The population which has endured these wrongs so long cannot be expected to submit much longer to them, nor will it be expected that the State of Texas can much longer refrain from the application of a remedy which will relieve its citizens from a repetition of these outrages and prevent the annual recurrence of taxation to provide defense and protection to the lives and property of its citizens on that border.

The committee, in seeking a proper and adequate remedy for these evils, have gone to the very root of them and have fully investigated all the attending circumstances, so as to be enabled to present to Congress and the country the true condition of that border and the necessity which exists to apply an effective remedy. Prominent among the inquiries made by the committee were:

First. To ascertain the prevailing sentiment of the people of the state of Tamaulipas toward the inhabitants of that section of the State of Texas which lies between the Rio Grande and Nueces River.

Second. The extent of the exposed frontier.

Third. The character and peculiarities of the country contiguous to the boundary line and the character of the offending population.

These were important inquiries, for without information in regard to each one of them Congress could not intelligently adjudge the propriety of the remedy proposed by the committee.

The proof shows that there exists among the population of the state of Tamaulipas a deep-seated feeling of enmity toward the inhabitants of that section of the State of Texas which lies between the Rio Grande and the Nueces River. This feeling of hostility has existed since the close of the war of Texan independence from Mexico. It has been transmitted from sire to son and has lost none of its intensity by the lapse of time. It had its origin, mainly, in the controversy between Texas and Mexico in regard to the western boundary of Texas, and was strengthened and confirmed by the events connected with the results of the war between the United States and Mexico. The territory which lies between the Rio Grande and Nueces River, at the date of the war between Texas and Mexico, constituted a part of the state of Tamaulipas and was subject to its jurisdiction. When that war closed the republic of Texas claimed the Rio Grande as its western boundary, and this claim was recognized by Santa Anna, who was then a prisoner of war. The Mexican government, however, never acknowledged the independence of Texas.

Upon the annexation of Texas to this Government the troops of the United States occupied this territory, and war ensued. The two first battles were fought between the Nueces and the Rio Grande. The treaty of peace between the United States and Mexico established the Rio Grande as the boundary-line, but the people of Tamaulipas have always regarded the severance of this territory from the State of Tamaulipas as an especial wrong and the inhabitants of that territory as intruders and enemies. This feeling has contributed to keep up animosity and to establish a public opinion throughout the state of Tamaulipas which protects, fosters, and encourages constant raids upon that territory.

Mr. Chairman, it may be conceded that such assumptions on the part of the people of Tamaulipas are absurd and unfounded; but the evil results which flow from them exist nevertheless, and must be considered in applying a proper remedy. The raiders and robbers who commit depredations upon that territory are not impelled by ebullition of passion or by cupidity alone; but a spirit of hostility, revenge, and reprisal actuates them. This feeling of hostility is not confined to a few lawless men along the border, but pervades to a large extent the population of the state of Tamaulipas, as may be seen displayed and fully exemplified in the alacrity with which those who plunder and rob our citizens are shielded and protected by the entire population of that state.

The line to be defended is about four hundred miles long. "The river which constitutes the boundary is a broad, crooked, shallow stream, skirted by a belt of fifteen or twenty miles of impenetrable thickets, crossed by narrow ways." The officers who are familiar with the country testify that small parties of armed men can and do often pass from Mexico into Texas across this stream and thicket near the soldiers without being observed. Once in Texas, by previous concert these parties embody into bands and companies, and drive herds of cattle rapidly across the river along these paths. On the Texas side of the river the population is sparse, while on the Mexican side it is much more numerous.

The character of this population ought to be considered in making up the estimate of the means necessary to defend this border. The section of country which is the theater of these raids contains about 30,000 inhabitants. Nine-tenths of this number are Mexicans. They are for the most part orderly and law-abiding. Many of them cast their fortunes with Texas in the war of independence; and they and their descendants have faithfully maintained the character of good citizens. They are land-owners, and a large number of them own large estates in stock. The American population will compare favorably with any section of the State. They are enterprising, industrious, and good citizens. Many of them have been immensely wealthy, owning immense herds of cattle and other stocks. On the Mexican side of the river the population is quite different, and they cannot better be described that in the strong, terse language of my colleague [Mr. SCHLEICHER] in his report, as follows:

> It is shown from the evidence before us that there is on the Mexican or south side of the Rio Grande a population far more numerous than that on our side, and who support themselves mainly by robbing our people. It is shown that they possess only a scanty supply of cows; that they have a few sheep and goats; that their agriculture is not enough to support but a small portion of their number, notwithstanding which they live better, dress better, are mounted and armed better than the same class elsewhere in Mexico. From their entire impunity and the great attractions of the spoils, their numbers are continually increasing. From the oldest times, and among all people, punishment of crime has always been considered necessary to prevent its increase; but here we have the strange spectacle of a community openly subsisting on crime, while there is no punishment for them. Their own nominal government is not strong enough to inflict it, while the Government of their victims—our own Government—from a highly refined sense of international politeness, has refrained from inflicting it.
> All vagrant and dangerous elements are congregating to that paradise of robbers; a new generation is springing up, knowing no means of livelihood but robbing, aptly compared by our commanding general on that border to the pirate communities which formerly resided on the northern coast of Africa. When the robbers return with a drove of cattle, it is stated by the witnesses, old men and young boys all turn out to help the cattle out of the miry ground of the river-bank.

Such a population, encouraged by the better class, shielded and protected from punishment by the local authorities of that State, will not readily yield up their vocation. They are bold men. They have been bred in civil commotions and revolutions. They have no regard for law or government.

Mr. Chairman, a defensive policy with a reasonable force, in view of all the circumstances, will in the future, as it has in the past, prove a failure, and cannot give adequate protection. This Government is powerful enough, it is true, to police the entire line with soldiers and guard every pathway across the river, but this is wholly impracticable. It would require not less than ten thousand soldiers. This is not the opinion of a civilian, but it is the deliberate judgment of such men as General Ord and Captain McNally, who are thorougly acquainted with the requirements of that service. They are both educated and accomplished soldiers. One of them has already reached high rank in the Army and the confidence of the country; the other, though comparatively a young man, is the most trusted leader upon the border. The cost of maintaining such a force would not fall short of twelve millions of money.

If these raids were projected against certain sections of that territory only, or if the points of attack could be reasonably anticipated, if the parties who engage in these hostile expeditions embraced only a small number of the population of the state of Tamaulipas, or if these raiding parties were accustomed to make their entry upon our territory in large bodies, a strictly defensive policy with a reasonable force might be successful. But such is the length of the line and the uncertainty of the points of entry, such is the number who openly engage in these encroachments or abet and encourage them, and such is the character of their entries, in small parties, embodying in the interior of that territory, that no reasonable number of troops could successfully render adequate protection.

Mr. Chairman, I take it that there is no international obligation resting upon this Government that requires it to keep and maintain such a force upon the Rio Grande as a strictly defensive policy and adequate protection of its territory from constant recurring invasion by the subjects or citizens of Mexico would require. The honor of the nation could not remain unsullied in the face of such humiliation, even if justice to the people would tolerate the imposition of such a burden of taxation as would be necessary to support the enormous cost of such a policy. All that any government could be required to do in such case would be to provide a force reasonably sufficient to protect its territory from invasion by irregular organizations of armed men operating in such way as to escape the vigilance of their own government, though it might be able and entirely willing to repress them. But if, as in the case of these troubles, as the proof shows, these raids have occurred for a series of years, in such manner and under such circumstances as to render it utterly impossible to anticipate them from our side of the river by a reasonable number of troops, and the government of Mexico has failed to restrain them, either for want of power or from unwillingness, there is no obligation upon this Government to maintain a defensive policy, which cannot give relief and freedom from invasion except at the risk of dishonor and the expenditure of vast sums of money. As well might it be said that in order to maintain friendly relations with Mexico we should build a wall along the border which Mexicans could not scale, or that we should people the boundary-line with soldiers.

Mr. Chairman, I think in view of the condition of public sentiment in the state of Tamaulipas, the character of the population, the length of the exposed border, and the difficulty and expense attending a defensive policy, the remedy recommended by the committee is the proper one. It is just to Mexico and is delayed justice to our citizens. Two regiments of cavalry, consisting of twelve hundred men each, with infantry sufficient to garrison the necessary posts, will constitute a force sufficient, acting defensively, to repel all such attempts at invasion by the subjects of Mexico which may occur under such circumstances as would make it proper to meet them on a strictly defensive policy.

Mr. Chairman, I am led to understand, however, that even the first section of these resolutions will be opposed because it provides for a small increase (about five hundred men) to the present force of the Army. It ought to be remembered that this increase of force is not intended to be permanent but will be disbanded when the exigency of that service will justify it. It is said that the Army is already too large and too expensive, and instead of being increased it should be diminished and the expenditures thereby lessened. The assertion is also made that the military force now stationed in the Southern States remote from the borders of the country are not only wholly unnecessary for any purpose in these localities, but a serious impediment oftentimes to repose and tranquillity.

Mr. Chairman, I shall not now stop to combat either one of these propositions, for as I view them they might be successfully demonstrated to be true. It is sufficient now to say that there is a decided difference of opinion on this subject in Congress, and in view of it there is no hope of arriving at legislative concurrence in respect to it. This difference of opinion is firmly fixed and cannot be removed or overcome. If this be true, and no one can deny it, it would be the gravest injustice to Texas; a sad disregard of the honor and obligations of this Government; a folly if not a crime to defeat these resolutions because a majority of this House may believe that the Army is already large enough for all purposes. When you attempt to control the Army and place and dispose it to suit your views of economy and good administration, you will find impediments in the way which cannot be overcome during the existence of this Congress. Under the wise disposition of the powers of this Government it requires the concurrence of the legislative and executive departments to enact laws, except in such cases as are otherwise provided for.

The President has declared in his annual message that the military force of the United States disposable for service on the Texas border was inadequate to render complete protection to life and property. When the President transmitted this message to Congress there were stationed in the State of Louisiana 701 soldiers, in Mississippi 336, in Florida 245, in North Carolina 226, in South Carolina 522, in Georgia 317, in Alabama 222, in Tennessee 205, and in Kentucky 112, and with unimportant changes this disposition of troops in the States named exists to-day. The declaration of the President is doubtless intended to declare that in the judgment of the Executive the present disposition of the force of the Army could not be materially changed with safety to the service. While a majority of the House might be satisfied that none of these troops are necessary in those localities, and might well be transferred to the border, yet it will hardly be said that you can pass a law which would require the Executive to conform to your views and opinions on this subject. In the mean time, while we debate these questions and vainly strive to reach a legislative concurrence, what must become of the people on the border? Shall brigands and robbers be allowed to overrun that territorry and drive out the remaining population? Have there not been enough of bloodshed and robbery, enough of murder, arson, and anarchy, enough of terror and vandalism upon that unfortunate border to induce Congress to avail itself of the remedy which we all can agree upon and put an end to this reign of terror and crime? In a government like ours, where the co-ordinate departments are independent of each other, and each is assigned its respective duties in the division of power, tolerance of opinion must often be indulged, or the gravest evils will result. A grave public duty ought never to be left undischarged because the mode of discharging it cannot be made to conform to the peculiar views of each department of the Government in which is vested the power to prescribe the manner of peforming it. If one mode is not acceptable another may be, and where no surrender of principle is involved mere choice of expedients ought not to be allowed to defeat necessary legislative action.

It is said, Mr. Chairman, that ample provision was made in the Army appropriation bill which passed the House to meet the demands of the service on the Texas border. I do not so regard it. On the contrary, that bill leaves Texas in a much worse condition than she is under the present law.

It is true that, in order to preserve the cavalry arm of the service and to render it as efficient as possible in view of the demand for reduction in the Army, my colleague [Mr. MILLS] offered an amendment which provided that there should be eight cavalry regiments and that the President should be authorized to recruit them up to the maximum of twelve hundred men each, and that a sufficient amount of this force should be transferred to the border of Texas to give protection.

This amendment standing by itself would have, perhaps, secured to us an additional force on the Rio Grande, but it was also provided in that bill that no enlistment should be made until the Army was reduced to 22,000 men by ordinary discharges.

Thus the President was constrained to await the reduction of the Army from 25,000 down to 22,000 before he could fill up the cavalry regiments to twelve hundred men each. Instead, therefore, of increasing the force on the Rio Grande, the effect of the bill decreased it.

That bill has been amended in the Senate, and both of the provisions referred to have been stricken out at the instance and under the urgent appeals of Senator MAXEY. The bill as reported back to the House retains ten regiments of cavalry, and the maximum of each is raised to twelve hundred men. If that bill could pass in the shape now presented to the House, we might reasonably hope to secure an increased force upon our border, as the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas and adopted by the Senate provides for the transfer of a sufficient force from these regiments to our border to give protection; but there is no hope of its passage, and we earnestly insist that there should be no hesitancy in supporting these resolutions because of any provisions in that bill.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HURLBUT] endeavored earnestly to strike out that provision of the bill which reduced the Army to 22,000 men. Had he been successful in his patriotic and noble effort to serve the best interest of the country, the necessity, so far as the increased force is concerned, to defend our border would have been obviated. The thanks of Texas are due to him, and I feel authorized in behalf of over two millions of people to tender him the undivided admiration of a gallant and outraged people for his manly fight in their behalf.

Mr. Chairman, while the force provided for by these resolutions is deemed sufficient by those who are familiar with the demands of this service, the service to meet and repel ordinary disturbances on that border, it will not be sufficient to police the line and give adequate protection on a purely defensive policy. Some other provision auxiliary and in addition to this force will be necessary and ought to be provided. The committee recommend that the President be authorized, whenever in his opinion the protection of the rights of American citizens requires it, to direct a pursuit of marauders into their own territory for the purpose only of recapturing stolen property and checking the raids. In the opinion of all military men who have served on that border in recent years, such authority and the prompt exercise of it is absoluteiy necessary to secure complete protection in the absence of a force sufficient to police the entire line and guard every crossing on the river. Nothing but a display of power and authority to use the most effective measures to crush out these lawless bands can restore quiet and order.

It is said that the adoption of the second resolution reported would be equivalent to a declaration of war by this Government against the government of Mexico, or that it would lead to actual war. I do not believe either one of these propositions. It is true that every independent nation has the right of immunity from invasion of its soil by the armed subjects or citizens of other nations. This right is inseparable from independence and sovereignty and is usually guarded with great jealousy. Neighboring powers should always, under proper circumstances, recognize and respect this right to the end that peace should be preserved. But this right is founded in reason.

There are reciprocal obligations resting upon neighboring powers in respect to this right of immunity from invasion. Each nation is required to restrain its citizens from unlawful and warlike expeditions into and upon the territory of other nations. The territory of one nation cannot be made the rendezvous or sanctuary of lawless men for the purpose of fitting out and concerting warlike or hostile expeditions into the territory of another nation; and the licensed use of territory for any such purpose would be a just cause of war on the part of the nation injured. It will therefore appear that Mexico is entitled to the right of immunity from invasion if it has discharged the duty it owes to this Government of making in good faith proper efforts to restrain the lawless people who organize and concert upon its territory warlike and predatory expeditions into the territory of Texas.

If Mexico has the power to restrain and suppress the outrages which are complanined of and fails to exercise it, it would be a just cause of war, but if that government is powerless to apply the necessary force to restrain its lawless citizens a different state of case would exist and different rules should be applied. The evidence shows that the government of Mexico is wholly unable to perform and discharge her duty and reciprocal obligations to this Government. The authority of the general government of Mexico is not respected or obeyed on that border. The state of Tamaulipas, especially, for many years has been the theater of civil commotion and revolution, respecting no government for any considerable period of time and swayed alone by the power of military domination. The general government has not been able heretofore to command or enforce respect and obedience on the part of its citizens in Tamaulipas to its authority much less to enforce respect to the rights of American citizens. The state of Tamaulipas to-day is in the very throes of a revolution and the national authority is overthrown. In such case the inquiry arises what is the right of this Government? Is it to declare war against Mexico and invade its territory for the purpose of waging war? I think not; because the government of Mexico is not a party, so to speak, to the wrongs complained of. These expeditions into our territory do not operate under a flag or any symbol of national authority. It may be that those who compose or aid and comfort the participants in these outrages are as hostile to the government of Mexico as they are disrespectful and regardless of the rights of American citizens. This population of Tamaulipas takes advantage of the weakness of their own government to assail the rights of our citizens.

In such case we have choice of two remedies. We can either people the entire line with soldiers at an enormous cost to the Government and at the risk of dishonor, or we can pursue the marauders into their own territory for the purpose of recapturing stolen property and checking raids. Both remedies rest on the doctrine of national self-defense. As to the first there is no doubt expressed and as to the latter neither reason nor authority can show the non-existence of the right in this case or the want of authority to execute it. We are under no obligations to Mexico to break the pursuit of marauders at the boundary line. For years we have been accustomed to chase her subjects from our soil ladened and burdened with the spoils of plunder and sometimes stained with the blood of our murdered citizens. Uniformly we have paused at the line in respect to the nationality of Mexico only to have our officers and soldiers taunted by the Mexicans from their side of the river. The local authorities of the state of Tamaulipas receive the fleeing raiders with open arms and cover their approach into Mexico. How long ought a brave people submit to such indignities; how long ought a strong and powerful Government tolerate such invasion of its territory? Because of the weakness of Mexico and the internal troubles which have environed its government, this Government has for years endeavored to do no act which might be construed as wanting in respect to the nationality of that government although abundant cause and provocation have existed to justify an entry upon its territory and chastisement of the robbers who commit these outrages. The people of Texas insist that the weakness of Mexico shall not longer be allowed as a plea in justification for the failure of this Government to apply the proper remedy of relief.

But, Mr. Chairman, it is said that although we have this right under the circumstances to enter the territory of Mexico, the exercise of it will lead to war. As before said, I do not think so. It would, however, depend upon the conduct of Mexico. That government admits that it has no power to restrain the lawless and vicious men who engage in these expeditions or those who aid and encourage them. It has for years been advised of the existence of these troubles, and no effort has been made in good faith to suppress them. And if now, when this Government, after full notice, shall adopt a different policy and determine to put an end to these encroachments, that government shall resist the means employed, then war will and ought to come, and it ought not to cease until all Mexico should be made to feel and know that the soil of the United States is sacred against the tread of an armed foreigner, be he soldier or robber, with or without a flag. The true doctrine upon this subject is stated by Governor Coke in his letter to the Attorney-General, and I beg to call the attention of the House to the following extract from that letter, which I ask the Clerk to read:

The Clerk read as follows:

If these Mexican raids which this force is called out to repel were of recent date, of irregular occurrence, and of such character as to elude the efforts of an ordinarily vigilant and energetic government to suppress, and such efforts were being made in good faith by the authorities of Mexico, I grant, in that case, that to allow an armed force to pursue even robbers, for the purpose of recovering their booty, across the Rio Grande would be a violation of the rights of Mexico and of well-settled principles of international law. The right of the government of Mexico to immunity for its territory from the incursions of armed forces from Texas would then be based on a proper discharge of the duties of that government to Texas in repressing the lawlessness of its own people and preventing and punishing their crimes committed against the people of a neighboring state. It is because each state or nation has undertaken to restrain its people from making war on the people of its neighbors that the law of nations forbids an armed force from one entering the territory of another. The right of immunity grows out of and depends upon the performance of this duty, which each power owes to the other. No state has surrendered the right of defense of its people in its own way against aggressions from neighboring states or people except upon the promise and performance of the great duty toward itself, which all nations owe each other, of so governing their people as that they shall not depredate or make war upon other nations or any of their people or territory. I apprehend that international courtesy, comity, and amity have never been required by the law of nations, to be carried to the romantic extent of surrendering the great natural right of self-defense against the constant infliction of serious, permanent, and wrongful injury upon the people of one nation by those of another, although the attacks may be unauthorized by the government of the territory from which it comes.

Mr. CULBERSON. Mr. Chairman, the enactment of these resolutions will not lead to war, nor would the promulgation of an order as contemplated by these resolutions or the execution of such order involve this Government in a war with Mexico. I believe that the passage of these resolutions will announce to Mexicans a firm determination on the part of this Government to put an end to these invasions, and no necessity will ever arise to execute such orders. But, sir, if I am mistaken in this, and our troops should be compelled to cross the river, Mexico would treat the matter as she has done heretofore. In 1860 a detachment of troops crossed the river to repel a threatened attack upon a steamer in the river. In 1874 General McKenzie led his troops into Mexico and inflicted deserved punishment upon a tribe of Indians, subjects of Mexico. In 1875 the brave and gallant McNally led a company of Texas Rangers into Mexico and assailed the robbers in their stronghold. This gallant movement, made with a small force of State troops, was in obedience to an order issued by the governor of Texas covering a contingency precisely similar to the one contemplated by these resolutions. No war followed either of these acts of so-called invasion. Mexico will in the future, as in the past, as I believe, recognize the right of this Government to put an end to these outrages, since she is unable to do so.

It is said, sir, that it is unwise to vest the President with such discretion. I believe that the President already is vested with the authority to do just what it is contemplated by these resolutions he shall do, and I would be willing to strike out the word "authorize" and all discretion and require him to perform this duty. The surest guarantee against the danger of an improper exercise of this power and authority by the President lies in the course pursued by him heretofore in regard to these troubles. The danger is that he will in the future, as in the past, fail to deal vigorously and effectively with these invaders until the most serious complications may arise and war will be the result.

We hear it said, Mr. Chairman, that the responsibility of the present condition of the Texas-Mexican border rests jointly on the population of Texas and Tamaulipas. While it is admitted that Mexicans have committed from time to time depredations upon the territory of Texas, it is alleged that such outrages have been provoked by the bad conduct of Texans. There is no foundation for such an arraignment of the people of Texas or any part of them. We challenge the proof of any outrage upon the person or property of Mexicans. In order to show the injustice of this charge and its falsity, I beg to read to the House the following extract from the testimony of General Ord. On page 33 of the report he is reported to have said:

Question. State whether these raids are mutual from either side of the river, or whether it is possible on account of the Mexican surveillance on the frontier for American raiders to go over there. Has such a thing not come to your knowledge?

Answer. I inquired carefully when I was down there to ascertain if any raids had been committed by Americans on Mexicans, and I could not hear of a single instance. When, on the Upper Rio Grande, I suggested the possibility of outlaws on our side stealing horses and carrying them to Mexico, the people laughed at me, because, they said, the Mexicans were so much more expert in stealing, and because that class of people was so much more abundant on the other side an American who should cross with stolen property would not hold it an hour after he had crossed. Besides, on the Mexican side of the Lower Rio Grande, so far as I could see, there is nothing to steal. The people on the Mexican side are nearly all supplied with beef, or pretty largely supplied, from our side; and I was told by a gentleman who was for a long time consul at Monterey, Mr. Ulrich, that the price of beef there varies with the arrival and departure of raiding bands going after cattle into Texas. Besides this, they have a system of rural police among the population living in the villages close to the border of the river who would communicate the arrival of a party of Americans so quickly that in less than six hours after Captains McNally and Randlett crossed the river with their little force between two and three hundred of this rural police and rancheros were in front of him, and as many as five hundred would have been there in less than twenty-four hours if he had remained. So that there is neither temptation to go there for plunder nor prospect of getting it out if they should get any.

Q. Do you consider the Mexican system of surveillance of the river as much more effective than ours?

A. Yes; they keep a sharper lookout in proportion, just as a band of robbers would keep a better lookout to cover their retreat than the shepherds would keep in watching their flocks. It is hence next to impossible for anybody to go there and return without being either discovered or without a large force being gathered to resist them. That is one reason why I am anxious to have a larger military force there than we have now. The only way of recovering cattle and of preventing future raids is to cross the river; and I want a sufficient force to cross and to maintain itself on the other side for a short time if necessary.

I desire also to call attention to an extract from the letter of Secretary Fish to Mr. Foster, American minister at Mexico; and I trust that it will be remembered that no case could be named in response to the challenge of the Secretary. This letter is reported on page 157, and the extract is as follows:

It may be regarded as frivolous to seek to justify the hostile incursions into our territory on the ground of retaliation for similar excursions from this side. There have been none such, and proof of the contrary is challenged. Indeed, the charge is improbable on its face, from the fact that Mexico, near the border, holds out no temptation to plunderers from this side, while the reverse is the case in respect to baits in Texas for Mexicans.

I am, &c.,

HAMILTON FISH.

The following extracts from the letter of J. Ulrich, United States consul at Monterey, Mexico, to Mr. Hunter, Second Assistant Secretary of State, confirms the view taken by Mr. Fish. I read from the report, page 149:

If the newspaper reports of the Mexican minister's charge be true, that the raids are made by ex-confederates, no greater insult could be offered to the Americans of the Texas frontier. Such statements are constantly published in Mexican newspapers, and urged by Mexican orators who take advantage of the general ignorance of their countrymen to make assertions only ludicrous to intelligent persons, knowing well the national want of capacity to distinguish between a lie and the truth, and we, who are accustomed to seeing these tricks, have been astonished that a man occupying the position of Señor Mariscal should so mistake his audience as to make such a charge in the United States.

The writer is not an ex-confederate, but an old abolitionist of the Sumner and Greeley school. He has, however, felt the insult none the less keenly. He is personally under obligation to Señor Mariscal for making these charges, as, by so doing, he fully corroborates the opinion of Mexican diplomacy given to Department in dispatch No. 185 of July 31, 1873.

No half-way measures will answer in treating with Mexicans. There is no trait in the national character more striking, in all of them, high or low, than their utter disregard of consequences from any act. In every position of life, as servants, mechanics, lawyers, or governors, or merchants, they are never controlled in any of their doings by fear of a future responsibility. There must always be shown them that there is a watchful eye on their movements and a hand ready to strike. Fear alone will restrain them, and that must be fear of direct and immediate chastisement for misconduct. They are gamblers by nature, and are always ready to risk their all on a chance. They respect persons of no nationality but the Spaniards, and they only, as they understand from long experience their mode of treatment, which, from the conquest till now, has always been brutal; while they despise the American, who, from education and training, is disposed to treat every one on terms of equality, kindness, consideration; and a disposition on the part of any one to treat them as equals only elicits their contempt; and although these are their personal traits, they carry them into every relation of life. Nothing but the "hard hand" will keep them straight, either as individuals or as a nation.

Inspector-General N. H. Davis, writing from San Antonio, Texas, May 14, 1875, to Inspector-General R. B. Marcy, War Department, says. I read from the report, page 143:

From good and reliable information it is established as a fact that organized bands of armed Mexicans cross over the river from Mexico into Texas, where they are joined and aided by their leagued confederates, Mexicans, to steal cattle, horses, and mules, rob stores and houses, and massacre unoffending and innocent persons in the country between the Rio Grande and the Nueces River. This marauding upon the section of country named has been carried on for years, more or less, but for the past year it has been practiced to such an extent that life and property are insecure, and the better classes of people having property, and especially Americans, are fleeing to the towns for the protection of their lives; among these are persons who have lived in the country and with Mexicans for many years.

I might add much more of the very highest testimony to show that this charge is wholly false; but I am admonished that my time is limited.

The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. CONGER] is induced to vote against the second resolution, because, among other reasons, a commission organized by the government of Mexico have arrived at the conclusion that the depredations complained of are committed by American citizens, who flee across the river into Mexico for safety when pursued by their fellow-citizens or by the soldiers of our Army. I have already shown that these charges are false by testimony taken by the committee, and which cannot be impeached. If any other proof should be necessary to satisfy a reasonable man as to the falsity of this charge, it may be found in the conduct of the Mexican government. According to the argument of the gentleman, the existence of these outrages is admitted. The extent of them and the length of time in which they have occurred, with more or less frequency, are admitted by him, and he is willing to vote any number of troops and any amount of money to prevent their recurrence. Did it never occur to him that if it were true, as alleged in the report of the Mexican commission, that these outrages were committed by American citizens, who, when pursued, escape into Mexico, that the Mexican government would arrest these maranders and deliver them up to the authorities of Texas to be tried, or subject them to a trial before the tribunals of that country, the laws of which make it penal for any person to bring stolen property within the jurisdiction of that government?

In what respect, Mr. Chairman, is the attitude of the question changed when it is falsely assumed that these outrages are committed by our own citizens who escape to Mexico for safety? If this be true as stated, the duty would rest upon the Mexican government to surrender up these fugitives from justice, or repel them from its territory? What right has the Mexican government to shelter and shield from punishment from year to year criminals who use its territory as a sanctuary? Has that government the power to suppress such outrages, or is it true that she is powerless to do so? In either case this Government is compelled by no law of neutrality or of nations to submit to such grave and serious infractions of international duty on the part of Mexico.

If the gentleman had read the testimony taken before the committee of Congress with half the care he states he had read the report of the commission, he would have ascertained that that report was wholly unreliable, if not a compilation of deliberate falsehood. The committee investigated that report, and the testimony shows that it is a base and unmitigated libel upon the character of the people of Texas.

I have a few words to say in regard to this book which is called the Reports of the Mexican Border Commission. These reports were published in 1873 in Mexico. Since the organization of the committee by Congress to investigate these border troubles a large number of copies of the reports of this Mexican commission, published in New York in 1875, have been distributed in Congress and elsewhere in order to impair the effect of the investigation ordered by Congress. The book contains about four hundred and fifty pages.

I need not refer to the proof to show that hundreds of lives have been lost in Texas at the hands of Mexican banditti, thousands of dollars' worth of property stolen and carried away, towns and villages sacked, and murder most foul committed in sight of our flag, all since this report was made in 1873. But I desire to call attention to the charge made in that report, wherein it is said that one cause of provocation for such irregularities as had occurred in Texas at the hands of Mexicans was that the Mexicans had been defrauded of their lands between the Rio Grande and Nueces River by the people of Texas under color of law administered by the courts of Texas. If this charge is willfully and deliberately false, no reliance can be placed upon any other charges made by it. In order to show the falsity of this charge and a knowledge of its baseness on the part of that commission I shall simply ask the Clerk to read the following extract from the testimony of Colonel J. L. Haynes, a distinguished citizen of Texas, of long residence on that border, and one of the ablest lawyers of that State.

The Clerk read as follows:

The commission here charge a deliberate attempt on the part of the people and the Legislature of Texas to rob the Mexicans in Texas of their lands. If true, it would be a very grave charge; but it is absolutely false as to the legislation of the State. That portion of the State between the Rio Grande and the Nueces River was, previous to 1836, a part of the state of Tamaulipas, from which state the titles to the lands in this territory were issued. On the 19th of December, 1836, Texas declared the Rio Grande to be its boundary, but it was not until the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, in 1848, that this claim was finally made good. The titles issued by Tamaulipas were not known to our records nor to be found among our archives, and legislation on the subject became necessary. On the 8th of February, 1850, an act was passed by the Legislature of Texas authorizing the appointment of a board of land commissioners to investigate these titles. (Paschal's Digest of Laws of Texas, article 4440.) The board reported a part of their work, and on September 4, 1850, an act was passed to confirm the titles in Webb County, including about fifty leagues, or two hundred and twenty-odd thousand acres of land. (Paschal's Digest, article 4459.)

Upon a further and fuller report of the board, the Legislature, by act approved February 10, 1852, confirmed directly, by name, to the Mexican grantees in Nueces, Cameron, Hidalgo, Starr, Zapata, Webb, and Kinney Counties about two thousand leagues, or over eight millions of acres of land. (Paschal's Digest, article 4461.) By act approved February 11, 1858, the titles in El Paso County were confirmed. (Paschal's Digest, article 4466.) By act of February 11, 1860, parties whose titles were not confirmed were authorized to bring suit in the district courts for confirmation, and under this act over two hundred leagues, or nearly a million of acres, were confirmed by decrees of the courts. (Paschal's Digest, article 4481.) On the 15th of August, 1870, the foregoing act was substantially re-enacted, with a limitation as to time, and the district court of Travis County under this act has confirmed the titles to nearly a million of acres more of these titles. (Paschal's Digest, article 7068.) Over ten millions of acres of land have thus been confirmed to grantees of titles issued by Tamaulipas. The grantees of these lands and their heirs now own and occupy these lands, excepting a few who have sold their lands, and one reason of the prosperity of the Mexican towns on the Rio Grande in comparison with our towns is this fact, the Mexicans receiving large incomes from their lands and stock-ranches in Texas, which they spend in improving their own towns. The recent constitutional convention of Texas expressly recognized all these confirmations, and gave the owners five years' additional time within which to have their lands surveyed and plotted on our maps, a resurvey being the only condition imposed by the various acts of confirmation. The supreme court of Texas has acted with equal justice to these parties, the titles issued by the former governments having been fully sustained; and I cite, among many others, the following decisions: Hancock vs. McKinney, 7 Texas; Titus vs. Kimbro, 8 Texas; Jenkins vs Chambers, 9 Texas; Treviño vs. Hernandez, 13 Texas; and Cavasos vs. Treviño, 35 Texas. The land involved in the case of Treviño vs. Hernandez is situated in Cameron County, and the question arose as to certain acts of the Mexican authorities between December 19, 1836, and the American occupation of the Rio Grande in 1846; and the court held that these authorities were de facto in power and that their acts and decisions should be respected. There can be, therefore, no just complaint against the laws and their execution in Texas in this regard on the part of the Mexicans, and the allegation of the Mexican commission against our State and people on this subject is proven by our laws and decisions to be not only deliberately but maliciously false. * * *

Mr. CULBERSON. It is said, sir, that the people of Texas desire to involve this Government in a war with Mexico that they may avenge the wrongs they have endured and profit by the expenditures of the Government. No assertion could be more unfounded. If any such feeling existed among any considerable number of people of that State ample opportunity and abundant provocation have already been given to induce them to manifest it. The wish, and I might add the anxiety of the people of Texas, to secure the enactment of a law by Congress which will compel the authorities of the Government to render protection springs from no unworthy motive. Surely the highest evidence of the falsity of such assertion will become apparent when we contrast it with the past conduct of that people. Sir, they have submitted for many years to these raids and indignities; they have witnessed the murder of their fellow-citizens, the destruction and removal of thousands of dollars' worth of property and the surrender of one of the finest sections of the State to a reign of terror and crime, and no act of insubordination to the obligations of this Government to a friendly neighboring power can be attributed to them. They have, not without murmuring it is true, witnessed the apathy and indifference of the Government to the wrongs which have been heaped upon them by their hostile neighbors. They have borne from year to year a burden of taxation to aid in that defense which the Government by every consideration should alone have extended.

We all know that Texas has the strength and the will to avenge her wrongs. In the days of her weakness she humbled the pride of Mexico and secured an empire from it and dropped it into the lap of the United States. In her strength to-day she could sweep from the face of the earth that population which has so grievously wronged her and secure tranquility and repose for the future; but rather than violate the law of the land by assuming the right and exercising the power which belongs to the General Government, she has awaited the hour when the national honor can no longer rest unvindicated and unasserted in her behalf.

Sir, every consideration which looks to the advancement of Texas in prosperity and greatness forbids any desire for war on our part, and especially a war with Mexico. Texas is now the great hope of the Union. It is larger than all New England, and embraces every variety of soil and production. It offers to the young of all the States and the good people of all countries the finest inducements for immigration. Its advancement in wealth, population, and in all that tends to make a State rich and powerful is attracting the attention of the whole country. Our two thousand miles of railway are now in successful operation. Immense forests of timber are yielding their treasures. Mineral resources, unsurpassed by those of any other State, are beginning to render rich reward to the laborer. Agricultural interests are extending their area and will soon demonstrate the fact that Texas is capable of being ranked among the first producing States of the Union. Every train of cars which enters the State carries young, enterprising immigrants seeking homes for life.

Why should the people of Texas desire war, and of all wars, one with Mexico? If they desired to suspend the development of the grand resources of the State, stop the completion of its internal improvements, open up a vast and beautiful country beyond it where the tide of immigration would inevitably flow—offer to her young men the ways of war with its vices instead of preserving the ways of peace with its virtues—it might be truthfully said that the people of Texas desired a war with Mexico. War would inflict upon Texas the most serious evils, and her people deeply appreciate the importance of preventing it. This Government has the power and can effectually apply the means which will preserve peace, and nothing will more certainly accomplish it than the adoption of these resolutions and a strict enforcement of them.

If neither insults to our national honor nor constant wrong to the people of Texas will move this Government to assert its power and shield that people from the cruel invasions of armed Mexicans, self-preservation will require that State to take care of its border by the most effectual means. The State heretofore, under the guidance of her patriotic governor, has endeavored to keep faith with all national obligations and the relations of this Government with Mexico, and has refrained from all acts calculated to disturb those relations. Her people have not only submitted to most grievous wrongs inflicted upon them by the subjects of that government, but have sustained an annual expenditure of large sums of money from the treasury of the State to aid in a defensive policy. Neither a due regard for its relations to the Government nor of the relations of this Government to that of Mexico can require longer submission of the people of that State to such encroachments and wrongs.

In view of all the circumstances, I may be allowed to appeal to the House to adopt these resolutions.

Whatever may be the result, we feel that the Texas delegation will in the future be held exempt from all evil and disastrous consequences which may flow from a failure to secure the adoption of these resolutions.

During the delivery of the speech of Mr. CULBERSON the following interruptions were made, which are appended in their respective order:

Mr. HURLBUT. Will the gentleman allow me one moment to give an authority on this subject?

Mr. CULBERSON. Certainly.

Mr. HURLBUT. When this matter was under discussion some time ago I laid down the principle that in the exercise of the right of self-defense a nation had the right to cross into the boundary limits of a country with whom they were on peaceable terms, provided the that nation neglected to fulfill its obligations, whether under treaty or under the general laws of nations.

Mr. YOUNG. Does the gentleman claim the right to do that without first a declaration of war?

Mr. HURLBUT. Certainly. Now that point is disputed, and I desire to read for the benefit of the House the law which I find in Halleck's International Law, page 96, and the authorities which are there quoted.

But it may be asked shall the state, which is suffering from the piratical incursions organized in and emanating from a neighboring state, do nothing in self-defense and for self-preservation? Must she wait until the invading force crosses her own borders before she can attack and destroy it? Not at all. If the neighboring state, from the want either of the will or of the ability, neglects to prevent such excursions, or to suppress such organizations, the threatened state may cross the frontier and attack and destroy the threatened danger. But the act is one of hostility, and she performs it in the exercise of her belligerent rights, not in the exercise of a pacific right of self-defense. It is not necessary that such act should precede by a declaration of war, nor, indeed, that it should be followed by a public and solemn war in form; nevertheless it is a belligerent act, justifiable, perhaps, by the circumstances of the case and the culpable neglect of the other party, and, as such, belongs to that class of hostile operations known in international jurisprudence as imperfect war, and which will be more particularly discussed in another chapter. (Wheaton's Elements of International Law, part 2, chapter 1, § 13; Grotius de Jure Belli et Pacis, liber 1, cap. 3, § 1; Burlamaqui's Droit de la Naturelle, &c., tome 5, part 4, chapter 3; Vattel, Droit des Gens, liv. 2, chapter 6, § 72.)

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to ask the gentleman from Texas whether in his judgment it is not possible to defend the people there and to avoid all danger without the passage of the second section of this joint resolution?

Mr. CULBERSON. I will come to that directly.

Mr. CONGER. Will the gentleman allow me a question?

Mr. CULBERSON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CONGER. It is, whether the statement I made the other night, that the Mexican government denies the responsibility of that government for these outrages, is not a fact?

Mr. CULBERSON. I am coming to that in a moment. Now, it is said, and the gentleman over the way from Michigan [Mr CONGER] reiterates it, that the responsibility for these outrages on the Texas border rests conjointly on the people of Texas and Mexico, or else solely on the people of Texas. Now, I refer the gentleman from Michigan to the testimony of General Ord before the committee. He swears that he went down to Texas to take command. He had heard of the statements made in the book to which the gentleman referred the other night, a book printed in 1873, and he went up and down the river from Manedo to the mouth of the Rio Grande to ascertain if those statements were true, and he swears positively and unequivocally that no instance could be found where a citizen of Texas had gone upon Mexican soil and committed depredations. To the same purport is the testimony of Captain McNally, a brave and gallant soldier in command of the Texas troops on that border.

Mr. CONGER. The point is not what the facts were, but what between the two governments was the conclusion of each government; what the assumption was that the Mexican government on the report of its own commissioners stood in the attitude of denying to our Government.

Mr. CULBERSON. I am prepared to show that that is false.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Let me ask the gentleman from Michigan one question; did he ever read the report of the committee?

Mr. CONGER. I have read portions of it.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Ah! portions of it.

Mr. CONGER. Yes. Now the point I wish to call the attention of the gentleman to was that the Mexican government, as such, denied their responsibility for these acts.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand that.

Mr. CONGER. I do not know whether it is just, and I do not defend it.

Mr. CULBERSON. I understand your position. Now, sir, in addition to the testimony of Major-General Ord, who commands the Department of Texas, I want to call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the testimony of Secretary Fish.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOOKER. I move that the time of the gentleman from Texas be extended twenty minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That can only be done by unanimous consent.

Mr. CONGER. I hope there will be no objection, as the gentleman has been interrupted considerably.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think the gentleman from Texas is entitled to more time; I yielded to him a portion of my time, and I think he is perhaps entitled to an hour on his own account.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection, and the gentleman has twenty minutes longer.

Mr. CULBERSON. I call the attention of the gentleman from Michigan to the testimony of Secretary Fish.

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. Chairman, I dislike exceedingly to say anything in opposition to this joint resolution. I dislike it because the resolution is favored by all of the delegation from Texas, a delegation which is, I believe, entitled to as high respect as any other delegation in this House; every man of which is my friend. I dislike it, too, because the chairman of the committee who reported the resolution is a man whom I admire, and I know that he is with true German honesty in earnest in this matter. But, sir, I feel that it is my duty to oppose it. I cannot stand here and allow a resolution to pass this House which I believe will bring dishonor upon the American name and will make this House justly amenable to the charge of being willing to dishonor the American name.

Mr. STEVENSON. I desire to ask my colleague whether it is because he has objection to the first section of the joint resolution that he opposes it?

Mr. HARRISON. I have no objection to that; it is the second section to which I object. Sir, we are asked to allow the President of the United States to permit the soldiers of the United States to cross the Rio Grande and go into Mexico—for what purpose? In my opinion, sir, to catch, as I take from this very report itself, men who have gone from the American side, from Texas into Mexico, with Texas cattle. Sir, it is one of the most singular of the phenomena of the human mind that different men will look at the same subject apparently with equal brains and certainly with equal honesty, and they will see the facts in so different a light one from the other. The gentleman from Texas quotes from this report to prove that it is perfectly right that General Grant, at the head of the American Army, should send the soldiers of the United States into a peaceful sister-republic because of the facts that are shown in this report.

Now I have read this report with a great deal of care. I have also read the report from the Mexican side which has been animadverted upon. I do not now intend to make a speech. What I propose to do is, in a sincere and earnest belief that by so doing I will simply be doing my duty, to read from this report extracts which it seems to me ought to convince members of this House that they should vote against this second resolution.

Before I proceed to-day, however, I wish to say a word on another subject. There is another reason why I dislike to oppose this resolution; it is because it was so ably advocated by my distinguished friend from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND,] who spoke an hour ostensibly in advocacy of the resolution, but never once referred to it. I dislike to oppose anything that that gentleman advocates. To me he has the roundest head I ever saw, not a bump upon it, and a mind equally in all its characteristics as round as the head that contains it. He says that he feels kindly toward the southerners, and all his milk of human kindness flows out toward them whenever he gets up here; that he does not want to say anything disagreeable to the people south of Mason and Dixon's line.

Now, the gentleman has certainly more winning ways to make the people of the South hate him than any other man I ever saw. He never gets up here that he does not say something that is an insult to a large portion of the members of this House. I cannot account for it, for I know that he is a gentleman and a man of kind disposition, unless upon the supposition that he is a good deal like a baby well fed and dandled upon its mother's knee. When it is perfectly full of milk a little shaking causes it to gush out very freely. Now, it must be that the gentleman every morning takes a full bottle of gall before he comes up here, and when he rises in his seat and shakes himself up the gall gushes out and flows over a portion of the members of this body.

Now, I do not think that is the way to bring back the fraternal feeling which once existed. The proper way is to regard every man, whether from the North or the South, the East or the West, as an American citizen, and to hold that when he comes into this Hall he is actuated by an earnest desire to do that which is best for our common country. I do not believe the best way is to be eternally hurling epithets into the faces of those from a different section from ourselves.

It may be all correct enough to charge against republicans from this side of the House, or against democrats on that side. We are from the same common localities, and it may be that my neighbor, a representative of the district next to mine, is a republican, and a democrat may be the representative of the district next to that of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. TOWNSEND.] But the southerners on this floor are the representatives of a whole section. It is true that such expressions will have the effect of throwing a fire-brand upon this floor and of enkindling hatred between the two sections of this country, which ought to cease.

Now, to come back. I propose to take this report, signed by the gentlemen on this committee, and to read extracts from it here and there. I shall make no logical argument, but will allow gentlemen to listen to these extracts and see if we are justified in directing the President of the United States to go into the territory of a government at peace with ours, into the territory of a sister republic, weak it is true, and to violate not only the sanctity of our treaties, but the sanctity of good fellowship.

We would not dare to introduce into this House a resolution to authorize the President of the United States to follow marauders into Canada. I say we would not dare do it, not because we are afraid of England, but because we know that the moment we pass such a resolution in this House England would consider it a declaration of war. My colleague [Mr. HURLBUT] says it is the right of any government to pursue marauding parties into the territory from which those marauding parties may come. That, as an act of emergency, would probably be justifiable to the United States. If there should be a marauding party coming from Canada into New York we might be justified in following that party into Canada; but that is a very different thing from coolly and deliberately passing a resolution by the Congress of the United States authorizing the President to follow these maranders into a foreign country.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. HARRIS, of Massachusetts. I desire to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether he thinks, if the citizens of Canada committed depredations upon our northern frontier, and when we called upon England to protect our citizens from them she either neglected or refused, does he believe that the United States would not dare to invade Canada?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir; I do say that we would not dare do it in this way; and saying this I use the word dare in a proper sense. We would do it by a declaration of war, not stealthily by ordering our troops to follow them. We would demand of England that she should protect our borders, and if she did not do that we would declare war. Before we would do that, too, we would order a commission to discuss the matter with England. We are not always so mighty brave. We cried out fifty-four forty or fight, and then back down to forty-nine; we have done that before.

Now, what is it asked that we shall do? We are asked to pass a resolution providing that the soldiery of the United States—I will read the resolution:

SEC. 2. That, in view of the inability of the national government of Mexico to prevent the inroads of lawless parties from Mexican soil into Texas, the President is hereby authorized, whenever, in his judgment, it shall be necessary for the protection of the rights of American citizens on the Texas frontier, above described, to order the troops when in close pursuit of the robbers with their booty to cross the Rio Grande and use such means as they may find necessary for recovering the stolen property and checking the raids, guarding, however, in all cases against any unnecessary injury to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico.

Ah! kind Government. We will say to the soldiery, Go into our sister-republic; follow these cattle-thieves, but do not injure peaceable inhabitants of Mexico; do not use any more force than is absolutely necessary; and yet the captain of a company or the colonel of a regiment is to be the judge of what is necessary! We are asked here calmly to pass a resolution to make the colonel of a regiment or the captain of a company judge of what is necessary when he goes into this sister-republic.

Now, sir, I am for dealing out the same even-handed justice to Mexico, if we pretend to be at peace with her, that I would to England with her bayonets bristling all along Niagara and the lake shores. I say if we cannot make Mexico protect our border, then order a commission. Let this Congress direct the President to appoint a commission to meet with a commission from Mexico. If that fails, then let us be men enough to declare war. Do not let us take territory under the pretense of protecting ourselves.

The gentleman from Texas who has just taken his seat [Mr. CULBERSON] says that it will not bring on war, but that Mexico must be taught her duty. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the old hatred that was aroused at Alamo still rankles in the heart of a Texan. I do not wonder at it. The same old hatred which San Jacinto could not wipe out still rankles in him.

But my friend behind me says there is no hatred in the Texan, hatred of the Mexican. Yes, there is hatred in the Texan of the Mexican. Carthago delenda est, has been written upon the wall of every Texan's house, only the word Mexico takes the place of Carthago; and the Texan always reads it, and it will not be until Mexico, his Carthage, is destroyed that he will forget it. I cannot blame him for it. He suffered years ago outrages few civilized nations ever attempted to put on another. But it is our clear right in our calmness to prevent him from committing an outrage upon the people on the other side belonging to a sister republic.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Permit me to send to the Clerk's desk to have read a short paragraph.

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I ask the Clerk to read what I have marked.

The Clerk read as follows:

On January 16, 1873, Mr. Hamilton Fish wrote to Mr. Nelson, then American envoy in Mexico:

"The federal government of that republic appears to be so apathetic on this subject, or so powerless to prevent such raids, that sooner or later this Government will have no other alternative than to endeavor to secure quiet on the frontier by seeking the marauders and punishing them in their haunts, wherever they may be. Of course we should prefer that this should be done with the consent, if not with the co-operation, of Mexico. It is certain, however, that, if the grievances shall be persisted in, the remedy adverted to will not remain untried."

Mr. HARRISON. All right, sir. Let us then try to do something with the consent and co-operation of Mexico. Let us ask her to meet us by commission. Let us treat this weak sister-republic as we would treat proud England, with her fortresses of the sea ready to protect her honor. Then if Mexico persistently refuses, or is powerless to curb her maraunders, why then, sir, we will proceed as a proud nation conscious of the right should proceed. Then, sir, if necessary let war be Punic. Then, sir, the world will justify our cry, Mexico delenda est. But not till then.

I say, let us try something else. Gentlemen say we shall pass this resolution even with the Chief Magistrate up in the White House, who has put his name high upon the pinnacle of fame, the man who knows his name will be handed down to the latest period of time because of his military triumphs, and with military pride ready for new triumphs. But even General Grant has not asserted that we should declare war by an overt act of this sort, but told us to try something else. Let us, then, try to do something else, and then, if something else cannot be done, we may act.

Now I am going to commence to read the report of these gentlemen, and I ask this House to listen to it, and simply to do what is right. As I said, it is strange how men will learn the same facts, and yet look at them with such different eyes. Here is this Captain McNally, the chivalrous and bold, as the gentleman says, and let us see what he says about this territory.

And by the way, Mr. Chairman, as you will find in reading this testimony, there is a range of two hundred miles along the Rio Grande where cattle are permitted to range from the far northern to the far southern borders—a range of two hundred miles where they are allowed to range far from their owners, protected by nothing but marks, and, as I shall show before I get through by quotations from Texan papers, these marks are removed and others branded upon them by the Texans themselves. And these cattle, which range two hundred miles away from their owners, are stolen by men and carried across the border, as it is proved in the testimony, by men living in Texas, claiming allegiance to the United States flag, claiming the protection of the United States, and that the juries in Texas dare not convict them.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. I should like the gentleman from Illinois to tell me where he finds any such testimony.

Mr. HARRISON. I find it here in the testimony printed in this book.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Then I hope the gentleman will lay it before the House, so we may see it.

Listen to what John S. McCampbell swore to before this committee:

By the CHAIRMAN:

Question. You say that the owners of American ranches do not generally live upon their ranches?

Answer. A great many of them have removed from their ranches. There are some still living on them. Captain Kennedy and Captain King, for instance, live on their ranches; but a good many other Americans have removed from their ranches to Corpus Christi, and are living there. Nearly all above there are stock-raisers; and they would not keep their families out on the ranches at all, on account of the dangers to which they would be exposed.

By Mr. WILLIAMS:

Q. The farms there are principally stock farms, I suppose?

A. They are stock farms principally. There is some little planting done about San Diego; but the country generally is a stock country, for the raising of sheep, cattle, and horses.

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. Are the courts still held in these counties?

A. Yes; in the Rio Grande counties.

Q. You have stated that you were compelled to abandon your own law practice there on account of what you believed to be a risk to your life?

A. Yes; that is, my practice on the Rio Grande.

Q. Has there been any obstruction to the administration of justice in that region of country by the ordinary courts?

A. I cannot answer that, because the judges go and hold court; but, as a general thing, they cannot convict. They cannot well convict a man for stealing cattle there: at least it is very hard work.

Q. Why not?

A. You could not get a man indicted for cattle-stealing in some of the river counties.

Q. Why not?

A. The Mexican jurors are afraid of their lives. If they would bring a bill of indictment against a cow-thief, or a raider from the other side of the river, those raiders would kill them.

Q. Then I understand you that there is such a reign of terror there that men do not venture to appear before a grand jury, and that a grand jury does not venture to indict for fear of consequences that might follow to witnesses and jurors?

A. Yes; I make that statement in reference to these counties, especially Starr, Zapata, and Hidalgo.

Q. Does there exist in these counties any military organization under the laws of the State of Texas?

A. None, that I know of.

Q. Is there, in your judgment, sufficient force there in the form of military organizations, or posse comitatus, if ordered out by the sheriff, to repel that class of raiders whom you have spoken of?

A. No, sir; I do not think it possible to keep them repelled. It might be possible for the sheriff to get enough men together to whip one of those parties; but the Mexican citizens who live out there are very reluctant to go in pursuit of raiders, because, if they fail to catch and capture them and if their efforts are known, their ranches will be no more, and themselves, too. They have to act very cautiously. I mean the Mexican citizens who live there.

Q. Then I understand you to state substantially that the civil authority, as it exists there, is, in your judgment, powerless either to prevent or punish those raids?

A. I think it is powerless to prevent those raids; and it is powerless to punish them because the raiders cannot be caught under present organization.

Here are men on this side aiding in or directly stealing cattle, and the Texan authorities do not or cannot punish. And therefore we are asked to pass this resolution directing our soldiers to violate the territory of a sister-republic with whom we have sacred treaties.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. They are all living on the other side. There are none on this side.

Mr. HARRISON. I will get it on this side.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Excuse me. You have made a mistake. They are living on the other side, but are known on this side, because there is only a mile or two between.

Mr. HARRISON. I will give the facts as I get to them. I will commence reading at the beginning. It will not be methodical, but it will show my points. John S. McCampbell is asked, "If you could not get a man indicted for stealing in some of the river counties"—the river counties of Texas on the Rio Grande—"and why not?" He says: "Why, the Mexican jurors on this side, that is, men speaking Spanish, and claiming to be our people, are afraid of their lives. If they would bring in a bill of indictment against a cow-thief or a raider, these raiders would kill them."

Mr. REAGAN. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Certainly.

Mr. REAGAN. Does the gentleman not know that the witness is speaking of the terror produced in the minds of Mexicans on this side of the river by those raiders? It is the terror of those raiders that prevents them from indicting them.

Mr. HARRISON. I know that; but I contend if you cannot punish a thief caught on this side by your own courts, then do not ask the United States to violate the territory of a sister republic and follow the raiders into that territory. Protect your own territory; protect it by your laws, by your jurors, if possible; if necessary by your soldiery; but do not practice upon the weakness of a sister republic.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Will the gentleman allow me one moment?

Mr. HARRISON. Yes, sir.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. The gentleman says we should protect our own territory. Now he will find in the evidence of General Ord that General Ord says he has never had force enough to hold the open country against those raiders; that they held the country against even the military force of the United States.

Mr. HARRISON. I do not argue one word against the first portion of this resolution. It is the last portion that I object to. Let us see what Captain McNally says further. In speaking of this side of the Rio Grande, he says:

The country is filled with numbers of armed Mexicans.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Excuse me. That is on the other side of the Rio Grande.

Mr. HARRISON. It is on this side of the Rio Grande. And is that Mexico?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. He does not say so. Read the commencement of the sentence you have referred to, and you will find that it is on the other side.

Mr. HARRISON. I will read the whole sentence.

The country is filled with numbers of armed Mexicans; and it is a most common sight to see four or five or six men, well armed and mounted, whose business no one knows. If you ask them who they are, they will say, "We belong to a ranch fifteen or twenty miles distant," or, "We are trading stock," or, "We have been visiting Brownsville or Matamoras," or, "We belong on the other side of the river," or, "We are going to our employer's ranch in the interior," or they may claim to belong to some neighboring ranch. We know nothing of them, and if we take them to the ranch to which they say they belong the servants of the ranch generally without hesitation verify their statement, in many instances from friendship, most frequently from fear. The Mexican owners of ranches on this side of the river, those who are citizens of Texas, are almost to a man as much opposed to this system of raiding as the American citizens of Texas are. Many of them have not nerve enough to take an active, decided stand against it, either by giving information or by personal assistance.

And the witness is speaking of his endeavors to protect cattle on this side of the Rio Grande.

Why do not you kill them? Why do not you arrest them, take them and put them in jail, hang them; "shoot them on the spot?" But do not send our soldiery over to the other side to arrest them, and in doing so violate our treaty with a sister republic. She is weak and perhaps revolutionary, and would be an easy prey to us. They maraud upon us and steal cattle, and we are asked to pass a resolution here which will direct our soldiers to maraud upon them. But with Christian charity we bid them do no unnecessary act to peaceable inhabitants of Mexico! O, considerate committee! O, kindly resolution! Sir, never will I consent to so dishonor my proud country as to vote for this gentle resolution. "Get rich my son; honestly if you can—but get rich."

Mr. REAGAN. Will my friend allow me to interrupt him again? Mr. McNally in that testimony is explaining the very difficulty to which General Ord has referred, the difficulty of identifying these Mexicans among the Mexicans that live on this side of the river, and showing the subterfuges to which the raiders and murderers and cattle-thieves resort to prevent detection.

Mr. HARRISON. I admit all the gentleman says. I admit there are outrages; but I claim the American Government should protect our citizens against these outrages, but not by violating other territory. Let us have courts, and if jurors on this side, sworn to do their duty, will not convict cattle-thieves, do not let us blame the Mexicans and follow the thieves over there. Let us inflict no more hardship on peaceable Mexicans than the circumstances would demand. Captain McNally or Mr. McCampbell (I will not stop to see which) says:

A large proportion of the Mexican population on this side of the river have their homes on the other side. They live over here, and are employed on this side, but they claim no citizenship here, and they are in active, direct sympathy with the raiders. They are their kinsfolk, their cousins, uncles, and brothers—for it seems to me as if all the Mexicans on both sides of the river are relatives.

Now, sir, these men live over here; and a little further on I will show that some of them are citizens.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Does Captain McNally not say that they are in active sympathy with the raiders? Consequently they are not the raiders.

Mr. HARRISON. I admit it; but I claim that you should punish them by law on this side, and not follow them to the other side. I claim that you shall not permit the violation of the territory of a country with which we are at peace, because marauders, one-half of them living on our side, claiming when they are attacked to be American citizens, are stealing our cattle, and we cannot by Texan jurors convict them.

Now, sir, another question was put to Captain McNally.

Q. To your knowledge, is there any raiding from this side on the other side?

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Read on.

Mr. HARRISON. There is a mark in the report here, but that is not what I intended to read. He says he does not know of any.

Mr. SCHLEICHER. Read what he says about it.

Mr. HARRISON. He says:

I made inquiries about that when I went down and during the time I have been there, for the last ten or eleven months. I have not even heard of a single charge made by any Mexican either on this side or the other side of the river of any Texan crossing the river for such a purpose.

I never charged that. I do not believe it; I would not believe it; I do not want to believe it. I read further from Captain McNally's evidence. We are asked to pass a resolution to direct the soldiers to follow cattle-thieves into Mexico, to violate Mexican territory, and we are told it will not bring on war. McNally says—I think I am reading from McNally's testimony; but it is at least from one of the witnesses here in the report—page 11:

I have no idea that any number of Americans, unless, possibly, four or five or six hundred strong, could cross the river and succeed in getting back. If they did, they would have to move very rapidly.

By Mr. LAMAR:

Question. Do you mean to say that, on the Mexican side of the river, they could bring together a force which would overpower five hundred armed men?

Answer. Yes; at any time within twenty-four hours. If five hundred of the best troops we can get were to cross the river, go four miles into the interior, and remain twenty-four hours in one place, I have not the remotest idea that they would ever return. I speak as a soldier. I served four years in the confederate army. I have met some of these Mexicans out there, and they are men who stand killing splendidly. They have an organization on the other side called the "rural police." The chief man is the owner of a ranch, or the superintendent, as the case may be. He is not an alcalde. I believe they call them encargados. He is a civil officer, and has some of the functions of a civil officer. He sends an alarm to one ranch, and it is spread from ranch to ranch in every direction. Men carry the news very rapidly—at least fifteen miles an hour. The men are all mounted, and very well armed. These frontiermen are armed with Winchester rifles and carbines, and quite a number of them with Spencer rifles. I do not know where they got them, but I believe they bought them (the Spencer rifles) at Fort Brown, at some Government sale. They gather rapidly, and are very patriotic.

And yet we are asked to order our soldiers across the river to recover cattle whose owners live two hundred miles away, who have turned their cattle loose with only a small brand upon them. Our soldiers are to be ordered to follow these cattle where only four or five hundred men can go with safety, and we are told it will not bring war upon us. Your Army is to be ordered in companies to follow these marauders where Captain McNally says that in twenty-four hours they could raise enough men to overpower five hundred of our soldiers; and yet it is said that would not bring on war. In one place McNally says that it will not have any effect, and in another place he says that they will be overpowered if we send five hundred men. Suppose you send your soldiers over there and have them murdered as Custer and his command were murdered by Sitting Bull and his men, then war with Mexico will be the watchword and "On to Mexico!" will be the cry, at least until after the election is over.

Sir, let McNally be heard again as to the Texan laws:

By Mr. HURLBUT:

Q. State whether there is sufficient power under the laws of Texas to stop and investigate the character of suspected persons in that belt of country.

A. No, sir; there is not.

Q. Can you, bearing a commission as you did from the governor of Texas, lawfully stop and detain any person on the high-road whom you suspect to be in this business?

A. I cannot.

Q. State whether in your judgment it would not be necessary for the thorough protection of that frontier to give the extraordinary powers that belong to military officers in a district under martial law.

A. I think that we could find a better remedy than the declaration of martial law in that district. Martial law would certainly work a great many hardships to innocent persons, as it always does. Our civil code practice has very many objections and difficulties. These people who raid on Texas are not claimed by Mexicans as citizens of that country. They say that they are outlaws and murderers, and that as far as they are able they stop their crossing, and they want us to assist them in doing so. They desire that we shall render them all the assistance in our power to break that system up. I believe that if orders were issued to our military authorities to pursue these bands to the other bank of the river, and punish them so severely that the pay they got for crossing a herd of cattle would not compensate them for the risk they run in making the raid, it would be the most effectual and rapid way of breaking this thing up, without subjecting any innocent parties to harm. In carrying out that policy there is no probability that one innocent man would suffer.

Ah, yes! we have peaceable people on the other side of the Rio Grande wanting us to help them to break up this system. And you are told you must send your soldiers over there and do more violence to these peaceable citizens. These Mexicans want to be at peace, and we are told that because this Government has not an arm strong enough to keep our own thieves from stealing our property and escaping to the other side, we must go over to the other side, using no more force than is absolutely necessary.

Now here is another place:

Question. And you think that if the Mexican government were to allow United States forces to penetrate that territory, the people of Tamaulipas would not revolt?

Answer. I do not think the government of Mexico would pay any attention to it. I do not think the government would ever know it, officially, at the city of Mexico.

Here we are told to send them there, and that the Mexican government can know nothing about it, and that when they come back again the government at the city of Mexico will have no knowledge of their proceedings.

Here is another question:

Q. I suppose that you are aware that sending a body of troops under the flag of the United States into a country with which we are at peace is a declaration of war?

A. I hardly think so. I do not know of any writer on international law who does not agree to the principle that where a nation is unable or unwilling to restrain its turbulent people from depredating on a neighboring territory, the nation so depredated upon has the right to pursue these robbers into their fastnesses across the line, and there to punish them for their offenses.

"A Daniel come to judgment," "yea, a very Daniel!" American citizens, or those claiming to be citizens, steal Texan cattle and escape over the border, and he knows of no international law that will prevent our following them and catching them on the other side. I do not believe that the people of the United States would stand quietly for fifteen minutes—ah, I will put it at that short space of time—when the telegraph should bring over the wires the news that a body of red-coated Englishmen had followed escaping criminals over into New York or Vermont. The whole nation would fire up, and the minute-men would leave their plows and hurry to the frontier; but here is a weak, a miserable republic that cannot take care of herself, and we are to send our soldiery over her borders.

Mr. Chairman, I say let us go to Mexico and demand of the government of that republic that if it cannot protect us from these wrongs we will take the matter into our own hands; but we should not pass a resolution here as an insult to her, and which she would be forced, in her pride, to consider a declaration of war.

I quote now from the testimony of General William Steele:

The inhabitants along the lines of the river are mostly Mexican-speaking; whether they are mostly citizens who expect to remain there or whether they are fugitives, I do not know; I think the latter are the largest class.

In Hidalgo County, at the same time, I inquired of him how many Americans there were. "Americans" is the general term for all English-speaking persons, those from the North. He told me there were ten. I asked him if there were any others who spoke English. He said there were three others, making thirteen in that county who spoke English. It is that large portion of floating population there who have produced such a state of terror upon those who really have the interests of the country at heart, that if they should see a drove of cattle being taken across the river they would be afraid to say a word. Many have been killed because they talked too much.

The people living on the borders speak Mexicano, and here is where the thieves are harbored. And it is among these people we should operate. There is the field for our labors. Make them within our own borders behave themselves. Declare martial law if no other law can be enforced. We had better do that to our own citizens than to allow our military men to go over the border and insult a sister republic. Captain McNally in answer to this question, "State to the committee what your means and facilities of information were about these raids," says:

After being on the river for some weeks, I found that I could employ for money Mexican cattle-thieves as spies; I made inquiry about the character of the men who composed the various bands on the opposite bank, and I found they were organized into bands of fifteen or twenty or thirty, according to the size of the ranch at which they live. I made inquiries into the personal character and reputation of the individuals of the band, and I selected those whom I knew to be tricky, and secured interviews with them. I made a proposition to them to sell their companions, tendering them handsome rewards, and promising to pay them more than they could make by raiding. For instance, if twenty of them crossed the river after a herd of cattle, and got two hundred head, the share of each of them would come to so many dollars. I proposed paying them $10 apiece for every one of their companions whom they would locate so that I could get in sight of them while on our side and in possession of stolen cattle. Then, if they escaped me, very well; I would still pay the amount, $10, for each one; that is, if they would notify me that they were going to cross the river on a certain day, and if they would place me at a certain point where I could see these men in the act of driving cattle, I would give them $10 apiece for each one that I saw in that manner, whether I succeeded in capturing the parties or not; and, if it was a strong party and well armed, I was to give $15 apiece, besides giving them a regular salary of $60 a month. All those whom I approached readily entered into my plans, and without any exception, I found them to be reliable and trustworthy.

The Mexican thieves can be hired for $15 apiece for each thief pointed out; and this wonderful Captain McNally found these thieves trustworthy.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust the gentleman will not pervert the testimony in that way. He was giving $15 apiece besides giving them a regular salary of $60 per month.

Mr. HARRISON. That is correct. They were to have $15 apiece and $60 a month, and he says that they were trustworthy, and yet in another place he says they are thieves. Why not employ them as spies on this side? Why do you send them to a sister republic because it is in a half-defenceless condition and almost in the state of revolution?

Sir, this is a proud and grand Government of ours. I want to see it always conducted as a proud and grand Government. Let our Republic deal with a weak sister as if that sister were her own peer. She is our peer in nationality; let us deal with her as if she were our peer in strength, and then we shall hand our name down to the future in honor.

I would inquire, Mr. Chairman, how much time I have?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has twenty-five minutes more.

Mr. HARRISON. General Steele says that in Hidalgo County only ten or fifteen speak English.

Now, there is a county with apparently only ten or fifteen persons in it who can speak the English language, and they would be afraid to say a word "if they should see a drove of cattle being taken across the river." And we are asked to let these men steal cattle and drive them past these men, and then to send our troops over on the other side and catch them, "using no more force than is necessary." Now that is not the way one nation should deal with another. If our nation deals so with a proud nation it is war; and if with a weak nation, it is a dishonor to ourselves, and I am unwilling to dishonor America.

Mr. WILLIAMS asks Steele:

Have you any reason to believe that the people on our side were co operating with them?

Answer. There are people living on this side who do that, but they can hardly be classed as citizens. In fact, it is very hard to define who is a citizen there. In this report of this county they are given as residents and citizens, and the residents largely outnumber the citizens. Many of these residents are mixed up with smuggling on this side. The Free Belt, where goods are admitted free of duty, affords fine opportunities for smuggling all along there.

That is, the Americans, men living there under the protection of Texas and United States laws, steal cattle from our own people, and we are asked to allow our troops to follow them into the territory of a foreign government. I say put an army there if possible, and whenever a man is seen who cannot give a proper answer as to what his business is arrest him. If you want to commit an outrage do it in the United States, and not on the other side of the line. If you want to commit an illegal act, do it in this country. Let General Dix go there, and whenever he sees a man driving a herd of cattle shoot him on the spot, and do not follow him into Mexico.

I will now quote from General Ord, who, speaking of the thieves on the Texan side, says:

These vagabonds on the northern side of the river are frequently in collusion with the robber-bands from Mexico, and for that reason the Mexican government states that those raids are not committed by Mexicans, but are committed by Americans, because some of these same fellows may have probably been naturalized, or had obtained some right under the Texas laws, which are very liberal, to remain there, and to have the benefit of citizenship; but they are nevertheless Mexicans.

Question. You do not apply that to the entire Mexican population on our side?

Answer. Not at all; only to the roving class, who have no permanent home. The best class of Mexicans are just as anxious as the American stock-raisers are to put a stop to these raids, and quite a company of them co-operated very actively in the recovery of the cattle by Captain McNally and Captain Randlett, when they crossed the river recently.

Q. Have you ever been on the opposite side of the river?

A. I have been.

This report here denies there are any such on the other side of the river. This report says the reason they say so is that these robber-bands come from the other side to help them.

Here is what Lieutenant Beacom tells about his horses being stolen, and he went quietly over into Mexico:

Early the next morning, accompanied by two soldiers and two Mexicans, I again crossed the river, and by circuitous routes followed the trail as far as the town of Guerrero, Mexico, accompanied by one Mexican, having left the other with the two soldiers on this side. I entered the town, obtained the assistance of the officials of Guerrero, and in two hours the thieves had been captured and horses with their trimmings in my possession

It is very curious that our soldiers can go over there and recover their horses, but we cannot catch these fellows who steal cattle which have wandered away two hundred miles from the owners. We are asked to give authority to follow them with our soldiers and violate the territory of our sister republic. I am with you, gentlemen, in putting in the hands of the President soldiers and power enough to protect you, but let the soldiers remain on this side the line. I have friends in Texas, and some of them not far from this border. I would like to have them protected, but I will never by vote consent that this House shall vote power to the President of the United States to order the soldiery of the United States across the border of a government with which we are at peace to arrest these thieves, "using no more force than is necessary." That is a pretty phrase, "necessary violence;" but the officer is to judge of that.

Now here is what Colonel Edward Hatch says, speaking of men who he was certain were cattle-raiders on this side the Rio Grande:

They are represented as citizens of Texas, and should the military make any arrests, they will be so considered until we can catch them in a body armed.

Speaking of certain ranches, he says:

The people of the ranches are Mexicans, and few have declared their intention of becoming American citizens. In this precinct there are nearly one thousand families, with eleven registered voters, five of whom are entitled to vote.

That is, they are considered Texans, and until we can catch them in a body armed we are utterly powerless to make arrests. Texas laws protect these marauders, and our soldiery dare not arrest them unless we see them in armed bands. And yet we are asked here to allow our soldiers to cross over the border. Now, I would do to Mexico as I would do to a nation that had behind it battalion after battalion to protect her borders. Then you would do as an honorable and high-toned nation should do.

Now here are some extracts from Texan papers which I take from the report of the Mexican commission:

Many stock-raisers of Refugio County have been in our city for several days examining hides by virtue of injunctions, of which they bring their pockets full. They seem to be exasperated from having found the remains of animals killed on the pasture, evidently for the purpose of taking hides.—Goliad Guard.

A commission of property-owners have arrived in our city (San Antonio) in search of stolen hides taken from dead animals. We have been advised that a large number of troublesome lawsuits have been instituted against several of our merchants to whom hides have been consigned for sale.—San Antonio Weekly Herald, March 8, 1873.

An organized band of cattle-thieves, under the leadership of the notorious thief Alberto Garza, are scouring Nueces and Duval Counties; said band numbering from twenty to thirty men.

The last number of the Gaceta, of Corpus Christi, gives an interesting account of the operations of these banditti, who killed and flayed in one place two hundred and seventy-five heads, in another three hundred, and in another sixty-six.—Daily Ranchero, Brownsville, March 1, 1873.

Another newspaper, referring to this same band and to the ineffectual persecution of it, says:

We believe that the cattle-owners of the Nueces and Rio Grande ought to do something better than to run after these robbers. They must direct their attention to the buyers of hides. A little discipline exercised against these supporters of thieves will soon put a stop to the trouble. If there were no buyers the thieves would soon take another course. The merchant who buys from the thieves is worse than the thieves themselves. He is only one, but he turns twenty into scoundrels, trusting in his position to save himself from reproach and censure.—The Sentinel. May 2, 1873.

This ranch carries on another speculation, which consists in branding all the young cattle that can be found, regardless of their owners. * * * It is said that some men of the Nueces County not far from here came and collected all the calves they could find and branded them for the benefit of those whom they serve. If this business continues nothing will be left to our stock-raisers but their corrals and wells.—The Sentinel, Brownsville, February 11, 1873.

There are many persons on this side (Texas) who maintain themselves by cattle-stealing. The peculiar character of our Mexican population, combined with the advantages of a very scattered population and the dense thickets, makes this cattle-stealing a very profitable business. Where there is fire there is smoke. This old proverb occurs to us when we hear it said "such or such a person has made his living by cattle-stealing." We know they cannot be reached by our tribunals. They have many able friends. * * * The public opinion certainly accuses many among us of being implicated in cattle-stealing.—Daily Ranchero, Brownsville, February 10, 1872.

Here is quotation after quotation showing that cattle are being stolen and branded and killed in Texas whenever they are caught away from their own localities, and we are asked therefore to pass a resolution that would dishonor the good name of our country. It may be very fine for gentlemen to forget their own country's honor in their hatred for Mexico; but the time will come when they will thank the Congress of the United States for refusing to pass this second resolution. I will vote for the first, but I will never vote for the second, nor do I think this House ought to do it.

I now yield the balance of my time to the gentleman from Texas, [Mr. REAGAN.]

Mr. DUNNELL. The gentleman promised to yield to me.

Mr. HARRISON. That is true.

Mr. DUNNELL. If the gentleman from Texas [Mr. REAGAN] desires to go on now, I will give way to him.

Mr. FOSTER. It is now nearly five o'clock, and I ask the gentleman to give way to a motion that the committee now rise.

Mr. REAGAN. If I can be recognized as entitled to the floor, I will give way for that motion.

Mr. FOSTER. I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker pro tempore having resumed the chair, Mr. MONROE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, pursuant to the order of the House, had had under consideration the joint resolution (H. R. No. 96) to provide for the protection of the Texas frontier on the Lower Rio Grande, and had come to no resolution thereon.

GEORGE H. GIDDINGS.

Mr. HANCOCK, by unanimous consent, introduced a bill (H. R. No. 3888) for the relief of George H. Giddings; which was read a first and second time, referred to the Committee on the Post-Office and Post-Roads, and ordered to be printed.

LEAVE OF ARMY OFFICERS.

Mr. REAGAN. I move that the House now adjourn.

Mr. BANNING. I ask the gentleman to yield to me for a moment.

Mr. REAGAN. If it will not interrupt the regular order of business.

Mr. BANNING. I ask unanimous consent to take from the Speaker's table House bill No. 1692 to amend an act approved May 8, 1874, in regard to leave of absence of Army officers. It has come back from the Senate with a single amendment, to which I think there will be no objection.

No objection was made; and the bill and amendment were taken from the Speaker's table.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

In line 4, after the word "allowed," insert the words "in the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. BANNING. I move the amendment of the Senate be concurred in.

The Senate amendment was concurred in.

Mr. BANNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment of the Senate was concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REAL-ESTATE POOL.

Mr. GLOVER, by unanimous consent, from the Select Committee on Real-Estate Pool and Jay Cooke's Indebtedness, reported testimony taken by that committee, and moved that it be ordered to be printed and recommitted.

The motion was agreed to.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

Leave of absence, by unanimous consent, was granted in the following cases:

To Mr. WHITE for one week;
To Mr. GOODE for three days;
To Mr. CHAPIN for eight days;
To Mr. WILLIAM B. WILLIAMS for four days;
To Mr. JOYCE for ten days; and
To Mr. CASWELL indefinitely after the thirteenth instant.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. BAKER, of New York, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners; when the Speaker signed the same.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The SPEAKER pro tempore announced that he had appointed as one of the conferees on the part of the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Army appropriation bill Mr. BANNING instead of Mr. RANDALL, who had asked to be relieved from service.

The motion of Mr. REAGAN was then agreed to; and accordingly (at four o'clock and fifteen minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

PETITIONS, ETC.

The following petitions and other papers were presented at the Clerk's desk under the rule, and referred as stated:

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message also announced that the Speaker pro tempore had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 2404) for the relief of John S. Dickson, late captain of paroled prisoners; and it was thereupon signed by the President pro tempore.

EXTENSION OF LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to continuing the legislative session for morning business, the presentation of petitions and matters of form?

Mr. EDMUNDS. Subject to a call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 7th instant, a report from General W. T. Sherman, together with the most recent reports received from Brigadier-General A. H. Terry as to demonstrations by the Sioux Indians; which, on motion of Mr. PADDOCK, was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. KERNAN presented the petition of over 600 seamen of the merchant marine of the United States, praying for the passage of the bill (H. R. No. 3187) to amend title 53 of the Revised Statutes relating to merchant seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

He also presented the memorial of the commissioners of emigration of the State of New York, and others, calling the attention of Congress to the present condition of the emigration laws resulting from the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States declaring the State laws on that subject unconstitutional and void, and in favor of speedy legislation by Congress in regard thereto; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. SHERMAN presented a petition of citizens of the State of Iowa, praying for the adoption of such legislation as will quiet the titles of actual settlers to certain lands in that State, embraced within the limits of the Des Moines River grant; which was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. MORRILL presented the petition of B. D. Carpenter, of the District of Columbia, praying that his claim against the United States for property taken and appropriated by United States troops be referred to the Court of Claims for adjudication; which was referred to the Committee on Claims.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CONKLING, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 981) for the better protection of life and property at sea, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, and that it be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, the same subject being in another form before that committee; which was agreed to.

Mr. SHERMAN, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 2922) to authorize the Secretary of the Treasury to make allowances for compensation to collectors of internal revenue who went out of office prior to February 8, 1875, upon final settlements of their accounts, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 972) authorizing the commissioners of the District of Columbia to issue certificates in the case of loss or destruction of registered certificates or bonds of the District, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. COOPER, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 1713) for the relief of Berthold Loewenthal, of Chicago, Illinois, reported it without amendment, and submitted a report thereon; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 256) for the relief of Herman Hulman, of Terra Haute, Indiana, reported adversely thereon; and the bill was postponed indefinitely.

Mr. CAPERTON. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Marie Louise Perrin and Trautmann Perrin, praying for compensation for the destruction of their property by the bombardment of Greytown, Central America, to submit an adverse report thereon. The Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. WADLEIGH] may desire the adverse report to be placed upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That order will be made if there be no objection.

Mr. CAMERON, of Wisconsin. I am directed by the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 56) for the relief of loyal citizens of Loudoun County, Virginia, therein named, to report it adversely, with a recommendation that the bill be indefinitely postponed. At the request of some persons who are interested in the bill, I ask that it go upon the Calendar.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The bill will be placed upon the Calendar, with the adverse report of the committee.

Mr. WRIGHT. Yesterday morning I reported adversely from the Committee on Claims the bill (S. No. 185) declaring the effects of permits to purchase products of the insurrectionary States in certain cases granted by the President of the United States, being somewhat general in its nature, and recommended its indefinite postponement. I now report from the committee the petition of Rees B. Edmondson, who prays relief in one of the cases proposed to be covered by that general bill, and I ask to be discharged from its further consideration. There is no written report in this case, but the written report upon the general bill is sufficient, as it covers all the points that are made in this petition.

The report was agreed to.

Mr. WHYTE, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Daniel G. Wright, administrator of the estate of Samuel T. Anderson, formerly naval storekeeper, United States Navy, praying for the allowance and payment of claims alleged to be due the estate of said Anderson for services rendered during the war of 1812, submitted a report thereon, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 986) for the relief of the administrator of Samuel T. Anderson.

The bill was read and passed to the second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. COCKRELL, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Ritzell, of West Virginia, praying compensation for the use and destruction of his property in that State during the late war, submitted an adverse report thereon; which was agreed to, and ordered to be printed.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to give notice that at the earliest possible moment the Committee on Appropriations will call up the river and harbor bill.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Mr. BAYARD asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 987) for the transfer of Paymaster Robert Burton Rodney from the retired list to the active list of the Navy; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. ANTHONY asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a bill (S. No. 988) authorizing the President to invite the international statistical congress to hold its tenth session in the United States and to appoint delegates to the ninth session thereof; which was read twice by its title, referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and ordered to be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That Mrs. Mary Walsh have leave to withdraw from the files her petition and papers upon leaving copies.

MISSISSIPPI INVESTIGATION.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I submit the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Printing:

Resolved, That 4,000 copies of the report of the special Committee to Investigate the late Election in Mississippi be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like the order amended so as to include the views of the minority.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution is to be referred to a committee for their recommendation. If there be no objection the order will be so amended, and referred to the Committee on Printing.

ISSUE OF SILVER COIN.

Mr. SHERMAN. I ask leave to have an order made to print the report of the committee of conference on what is known as the silver bill. The report is ready, and I wish it to be printed so that it may be laid before the Senate in due form.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair hears no objection, and the order to print will be made.

OTOE AND MISSOURIA INDIANS.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the amendments of the House to the bill (S. No. 779) to provide for the sale of the reservation of the confederated Otoe and Missouria Indians in the States of Kansas and Nebraska.

Mr. EDMUNDS. The amendments had better be printed.

Mr. PADDOCK. I move that the Senate non-concur in the amendments of the House and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Let the amendments be printed as well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be printed, if there is no objection.

By unanimous consent, the President pro tempore was authorized to appoint the conferees on the part of the Senate; and Messrs. INGALLS, PADDOCK, and RANSOM were appointed.

IMPEACHMENT OF W. W. BELKNAP.

Mr. SPENCER. I ask to have laid before the Senate the concurrent resolution of the House in relation to the conference report on the bill for the repavement of Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I call for the regular order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont calls for the regular order. The legislative and executive business of the Senate will be suspended, and the Senate will proceed to the consideration of the articles of impeachment exhibited by the House of Representatives against William W. Belknap.

The Senate then proceeded to the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap, late Secretary of War.

The Senate sitting for the trial of the impeachment of William W. Belknap having adjourned then resumed its

LEGISLATIVE SESSION.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senate resumes its legislative business.

Mr. ALLISON. I move to proceed to the consideration of House bill No. 3022, being the river and harbor bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I ask that no business be done until we have order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senators will resume their seats. Business will be suspended until order is restored. [After a pause.] The Senator from Iowa moves to postpone the present and all prior orders for the purpose of considering what is known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I do not rise to make any opposition to this motion, but to say to my friend from Maine that I find on looking at the RECORD that when I made the point of order yesterday evening his bill was already up and therefore there was no point of order about it. I did not hear the Senator, and the confusion was so great that I did not hear the Chair either put the question or state that it was carried; there was such a rumpus going on. I therefore apologize to the Senate for making a point of order after the occasion for it had gone by, and to my friend from Maine for the trouble I gave him.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will state that the unfinished business is the bill called up by the Senator from Maine yesterday, the bill (H. R. No. 3628) establishing post-roads, pending which the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] moves the postponement of this and all prior orders for the purpose of considering the river and harbor bill.

Mr. HAMLIN. Inasmuch as the post-route bill is now before the Senate, I hope the Senator will not interpose an objection to displace this, but let us go through with it and then take up the river and harbor bill. The Senator knows how easily that bill always goes through. I hope he will not interpose an objection to displace this bill. It is one in which many Senators are interested.

Mr. ALLISON. I suppose that bill will only take a short time.

Mr. HAMLIN. Then let us dispose of it.

Mr. ALLISON. But this bill ought to pass immediately if it is to pass at all, and therefore I trust there will be no objection to taking it up now. I understand the general consent of the Senate has been to take up appropriation bills when they are ready.

Mr. HAMLIN. I do not understand that that rule goes to the extent of displacing a question now before the Senate. The Senate can do as it pleases. I do not think I shall move to take this bill up again during this session. Twice we have had it before the Senate, and twice will it have been displaced if it is displaced now.

Mr. EDMUNDS. I wish to inquire of the Chair how this post-route bill gets up before one o'clock as the unfinished business?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Vermont objecting to the morning hour being considered as expired, it continues till one o'clock. The Senator from Iowa moves the present consideration of House bill No. 3022.

Mr. HAMLIN. That will involve the same trouble twenty minutes hence. When twenty minutes shall have expired the post-route bill will come up in its order as the unfinished business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine is correct.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope I shall be allowed to call it up now and go on with it.

Mr. ALLISON. I think it important to finish the river and harbor bill to-day.

Mr. HAMLIN. I have nothing further to say.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand that the morning business has been gone through with; and the morning business being concluded, then the morning hour has expired the same as if we had come to one o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair was not aware that morning business was through. The Chair when the Senate passed from the trial session to legislative business called for resolutions; and the Senator from Iowa [Mr. ALLISON] made his motion.

Mr. WRIGHT. I understand the ruling of the Chair to be that inasmuch as one o'clock had not arrived the morning hour had not expired.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the morning business is concluded, the morning hour has expired.

Mr. WRIGHT. Then the bill of the Senator from Maine would be the pending order, whether we had reached one o'clock or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. But the residue of the hour up to one o'clock would be open to any motion to take up any special matter.

Mr. WRIGHT. But I wish to inquire whether it will be necessary to move to displace the pending order in order to do that, as if we had reached one o'clock?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If the morning business has been concluded, the Chair would regard the morning hour as over, and up to one o'clock a motion would be in order to proceed to the consideration of any matter. It is only by common consent that the morning hour is declared concluded before the hour has expired.

Mr. BOUTWELL. What has become of the House bill in regard to the Pacific railroads?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It was cut off by the expiration of the day yesterday.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I supposed that would come up this morning in the morning hour.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. When the Chair has an opportunity, he will lay it before the Senate.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Would it be in order for me to call up a conference report on which I wish to submit a few remarks?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It would be.

CONSULAR AND DIPLOMATIC BILL.

Mr. FRELINGHUYSEN. Then, Mr. President, I move that the Senate further insists on its amendments to the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, and that a committee of conference be granted as asked by the House of Representatives; and, in view of some remarks which have been made elsewhere in reference to that bill, I wish to say a few words.

The diplomatic service was organized and the salaries fixed in 1856 under Mr. Pierce's administration. The purchasing power of a dollar then was certainly a third more than it is now. Since that time there has been an increase in salaries of about $50,000, that sum being compensated, as I understand it, by the price which has been demanded for passports, being $5 for each individual. The House of Representatives made extensive changes in this bill, in the countries to which we should send representatives and in the amount of salaries to be paid. The Committee on Appropriations referred the bill to the Committee on Foreign Relations. They appointed a subcommittee, and that subcommittee met the Committee on Appropriations, and without regard to their political views advised them that no change in existing laws should be made. Consequently, the Committee on Appropriations did not agree to the change of the law, but reported the bill to the Senate with amendments retaining the law as it now exists, and with great unanimity the Senate passed the bill with the amendments. The House, as they had a right, still insisted upon this change in the laws.

Mr. President, these existing salaries are moderate. They are such as are required to enable any person to live in republican respectability. They cannot be made less without rendering these positions mere decorations of millionaires.

This disagreement between the two Houses led to a conference. I am not aware that there was anything then said in reference to changing the law. The conferees on the part of the Senate hoped to bring the conferees on the part of the House to their views. Failing in that, the conferees of the Senate then offered to divide the difference between the amount of salaries fixed by the House and those provided by existing laws and insisted on by the Senate. That offer was rejected.

Another conference was called. The conferees on the part of the Senate proposed then, for the sake of coming to a settlement, to adopt the appropriation as made by the House, and that the President, as was the case in the earlier days of the Republic, should have the distribution, the administration of this fund; providing further that he should not apply any of this fund to pay a diplomat at any official post which did not exist under the present laws, and providing also that no salary should be increased, and providing further that a committee should be appointed, consisting of two members of each House, who should adjust these salaries, and that every person holding office in the diplomatic and consular service should be subject, in his salary, to such legislation as might be adopted on that report at the next session of Congress. Had this offer been accepted there would probably have been no difficulty, no question would have arisen; for the President in the exercise of his good judgment would doubtless have discontinued the less important diplomatic positions and paid the full salary to those which could not be dispensed with.

That offer was rejected by the House, they insisting that in addition the conferees on the part of the Senate should agree that there should be no claim for any salary beyond the amount thus appropriated. In other words, they called upon us as conferees to change the law which both Houses had established, and this we were to do to prevent the appropriations from failing. Well, Mr. President, for one—and I do not want to say anything that is indiscreet—I would let that appropriation bill fail and every other before I would legislate upon such terms.

Legislation upon appropriation bills is a bad practice, but it has precedent. It is a bad practice, for the reason that our Constitution creates three negatives on the passage of every law. The House has a negative on the Senate, the Senate has a negative on the House, the President has a negative on both. This legislation on appropriation bills virtually deprives the President of his negative. But that was not the question before the committee.

The question was whether the Senate at the close of a session should be driven to such legislation as they did not approve, as they had with great unanimity declared against, for fear that the appropriation bill should fail. I do not like to legislate under any fear, and my opinion is that the Senate does not. I deprecate this difference between the two Houses; but the Senate cannot do otherwise than to decline to accede to the claim that is made by the other House. That claim strikes at the very corner-stone of the Government. The first article of the Constitution declares that the legislative power shall be vested in the Congress, consisting of a Senate and of a House of Representatives. All civilized governments recognize the wisdom of having two branches of the legislature; every State of the Union has indorsed the policy of this form of government.

When our Constitution was formed an important compromise was made to preserve the popular feature of our Government. To prevent the States from having an undue power in matters of taxation, so as to prevent Rhode Island and Delaware and New Jersey having a voice in taxation equal to New York and Virginia, it was provided that all bills for raising revenue should originate with the House of Representatives, the Senate having the right to propose and concur in amendments as in other cases. This, according to my view, does not confer on the House the right to originate appropriation bills; but precedent, which makes law, which aggregates to itself power, is in favor of this claim by the House. I do not care now to dispute that position; but let us be careful how we make further precedents. The conferees of the Senate on this bill not only did not question the right of the House to originate the bill, but surrendered all the Senate amendments, and agreed to take just the sum that the House appropriated; but we were told that we must go further, and change existing laws. Thus while the Senate gives the House the fullest benefit of the great compromise, the House demands that the States as represented in the Senate shall be silenced not only on appropriation bills but on general legislation. The Senate is told in relation to this and other bills that it must alter the law naming the countries to which we send representatives; that we must alter the law fixing the salaries, to all of which the House has agreed; that we must alter the law organizing the Army; that we must reduce the Army from 25,000 to 11,000; that we must change our Indian policy; that we must repeal our registry and election laws, and such like legislation.

Now, Mr. President, the Senate cannot agree to this demand of the House, because it would be destructive of the most fundamental principle of the Government, which is, that the legislative power of the United States shall be vested in a Congress which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives. We cannot agree to it, because it would be violating the very compromise of the Constitution under which the House claims its right to originate money bills; the consideration for agreeing to that was the States should have their voice on all legislation in the Senate.

To agree to the demand of the House would be the most objectionable centralization and destructive of the rights of the States, if the Senate is to be brought at the end of a session to accede to just such legislation as is demanded of us or else the appropriations must all fail.

Further, to agree to the demand of the House would be to destroy that stability of the Government which is derived from the existence of the constitutional powers of the Senate. In order to give that stability the term of a Senator continues through three Congresses, only one-third of the Senators going out every two years. But where is the stability if at the close of any session we are to be brought to adopt just such legislation as one branch of Congress demands of us? The Senate might just as well have no legislative power as to have legislative power only when we are suffered to exercise it.

I have been surprised in looking at the RECORD at some remarks made by a Senator for whose judgment and unpartisan patriotism I have much respect, to which I must make an allusion. The Senator said:

> I say that upon the high responsibility of their oaths and their duty to the country, it might be, although not likely to be, that the House or the Senate would be justified in saying, "Reduce the Army one-half, reduce the Navy one-half, or take the alternative of no Army or no Navy at all.

Mr. President, a law, which the Senate and every member of it, the House of Representatives and every member are just as much bound to respect as the wayfaring man, declares that the Army of the United States shall consist of twenty-five thousand men; and we are told that the House of Representatives or the Senate, separately, have on their oaths and on their responsibility to the country the right to say that that Army shall be reduced to twelve thousand. Well, if the House or Senate has the right to say that the Army shall be reduced to twelve thousand, either has the right to say that it shall be reduced to nine thousand, and if to nine, to six, and if to six, it may be abolished. They have the same right, and it is so claimed, in regard to the Navy, and if either House acting separately can reduce the Navy one-half, it can on their oaths and their responsibilities to the country abolish it entirely. So either House can determine that the Executive shall receive but one-half of the compensation fixed by law, and that no greater appropriation shall be made, and if so, can say that no appropriation shall be made for the Executive. So, too, either House may say that the Supreme Court shall consist of but three instead of nine justices and make their appropriations accordingly. So the House may say that the Senate shall have but half the appropriation required by law for the salaries of Senators, and if but half, it may say there shall be no appropriation and thus abolish it. Mr. President, that will not do. The Senate and the House of Representatives are bound by their oaths, by their responsibilities to the country, to make the appropriations that are necessary to carry out existing laws. The Senate and the House of Representatives have no right to make appropriations for any other purpose than to carry out existing laws. Appropriations are incident to existing laws, and may not be used as an instrumentality to coerce legislation.

Mr. President, this nation has in our generation passed through a fearful ordeal. Five hundred thousand brave men, North and South, have died in that great trial; but our Republic, as it was given to us by our fathers, we possess intact. The Executive performs his functions; the judiciary discharges its duties; the Representatives of a free people at the other end of the Capitol legislate like freemen. This Senate hitherto has legislated freely and untrammeled and will, sir, I trust forever continue so to do.

I hope that a better spirit will prevail and that all will see that not because the Senate will not, but because it cannot, it declines to be placed in any position where it cannot legislate freely.

Mr. ANTHONY. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will call up the unfinished business, the morning hour having expired.

Mr. ANTHONY. I beg leave to add a single word in general terms to what has been said.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope this debate will not be closed on the termination of the remarks of the Senator from Rhode Island. There have been some things said in connection with this bill that need replying to. I am perfectly willing the Senator from Rhode Island shall go on, but I claim——

Mr. ANTHONY. I will not go on if it is to prejudice the appropriation bills. I have only a word to say.

Mr. KERNAN. I object. I think we had better go to the appropriation bills.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the Chair will call up the unfinished business, which is the bill (H. R. No. 3628) to establish post-roads.

Mr. ALLISON. I am sorry to disturb the Senator from Maine, who has charge of this bill, but I move to lay it aside and take up the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa moves the postponement of the unfinished business and all prior orders, for the purpose of considering what is known as the river and harbor bill.

Mr. SAULSBURY. I hope that will not be done. The bill of the Senator from Maine will pass in a very few minutes, and cannot delay the river and harbor bill long.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 22, noes 19.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the following bills:

No. 2684) to amend sections 246 and 251 of the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, and for other purposes; and

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. U. S. GRANT, jr., his Secretary, announced that the President had on the 12th instant approved and signed the following acts:

An act (S. No. 962) to amend an act approved April 17, 1876, providing for the sale of a part of custom-house lot in Rockland, Maine; and

An act (S. No. 560) for the relief of Benjamin L. Cornish, late second lieutenant of the Thirty-second Wisconsin Volunteer Infantry.

The message also announced that the bill (S. No. 375) for the relief of Maria W. Sanders, having been received by the President on the 30th of June, and not having been returned by him to the Senate within the ten days prescribed by the Constitution, had become a law without his signature.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask to have the amendments of the Committee on Appropriations read, as has been the custom during the session in reference to our appropriation bills, so as to dispense with the formal reading of the bill at length before acting on the amendments.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendments will be considered in their order as the bill is read if there be no objection.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 9 and 10 in the following words:

> For the improvement of the harbor at Dunkirk, New York, $18,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to make one or two explanations in reference to this bill before we enter upon it. The bill as it came from the House appropriated $5,872,850. As reported by the Senate Committee on Appropriations we have increased the amount of the bill $36,314. I ask the indulgence of the Senate while I state that the Committee on Appropriations have found great difficulty in the consideration of this bill. This bill has heretofore been considered by the Committee on Commerce and only came to the Committee on Appropriations at a late day in the session, and but for the fact that the Committee on Commerce had made great progress in the consideration of the bill and prepared the bill for the Committee on Appropriations, it could hardly have been reported in as brief a time as we have been able to report it.

The Committee on Appropriations in considering the bill have endeavored to reduce appropriations wherever it was possible to do so by omitting appropriations which appeared not to be necessary at this time, or if necessary, not so absolutely necessary but that they might be postponed until next year. Therefore we have struck out many items found in the House bill. We have added, however, additional sums in many cases to the House appropriations, finding from an examination of the reports of the engineers and from the condition of the harbors and rivers that the appropriations made by the House were entirely inadequate for the economical progress of the works at these various points where the sums have been increased.

We have also been compelled to strike out many appropriations which would be very useful but which can be postponed, as the committee think, for another year. The first item in the bill, the item just read by the Secretary, is one of the items that we have omitted. The bill as it came to us appropriated $18,000 for the harbor of Dunkirk. On examination of the reports it appeared that this sum would be entirely inadequate to do the work necessary to be done at that point; and inasmuch as the harbor is now in good condition the Committee on Appropriations recommend that this session no appropriation be made for it.

Mr. FERRY, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) I should like to have the Senator state whether the bill has been reduced or increased as it came from the House, by the Senate Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. ALLISON. The bill has been increased $36,314.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MITCHELL in the chair.) The question is on the first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, striking out lines 9 and 10.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 22, noes 5; no quorum voting.

Mr. SHERMAN. There is a quorum present.

Mr. CONKLING. I suggest that if the question is tried over again there will be a quorum voting.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will put the question again.

The question being again put, there were on a division—ayes 32, noes 8.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment is agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 12, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Buffalo, New York, from $75,000 to $100,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I desire to say a word in reference to this appropriation. Buffalo is one of the most important harbors in this country. More commerce passes through that harbor perhaps than through any other harbor except that at the city of New York. There is a great improvement going on at the city of Buffalo. On examination of the reports of the engineers the committee were satisfied that it would require $100,000 to economically push forward the work at that point, and therefore they increase the amount $25,000 over the House appropriation. While I am up, I will say that at all the important points in the State of New York, at Buffalo, Oswego, and New York City, the Committee on Appropriations have recommended a slight increase over the appropriations made by the House.

Mr. MAXEY. May I ask the Senator what is the estimate of the engineers for Buffalo?

Mr. ALLISON. Two hundred thousand dollars.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 15 and 16, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Olcott, New York, $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 18, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Oak Orchard, New York, from $2,000 to $6,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 19, 20, 21, and 22, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Pultneyville, New York, $5,000.
For the improvement of the harbor at Great Sodus Bay, New York, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 24, to increase the appropriation "for removing obstructions in the East River and Hell Gate, New York" from $200,000 to $350,000.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes 29, noes not counted.

The next amendment was in line 39, to reduce the appropriation "for the improvement of the harbor at Marquette, Michigan," from $5,000 to $2,000

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I should like to know the reason of the committee for this reduction. The amount is but $5,000. They propose to reduce that to $2,000.

Mr. ALLISON. That harbor is reported by the Chief of Engineers to be in good condition, and this sum is only enough for riprapping, and therefore I think $2,000 will keep it in repair.

Mr. FERRY. Do the engineers report the harbor in good condition and make no recommendation?

Mr. ALLISON. They recomended $15,000, I believe.

Mr. FERRY. They recommended $25,000, I think.

Mr. ALLISON. But that is for an extension of the harbor; and $5,000 would not extend the harbor very far. Therefore we concluded not to increase the appropriation but simply to keep the harbor in good repair.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to state, Mr. President, that the act of 1875 gave Marquette harbor $15,000, and this bill as passed by the House gives it $5,000, a reduction of about 66 per cent. Now, it is proposed by the Senate committee to reduce still further about 60 per cent. from the bill of the House, cutting down $5,000 to $2,000. I do not desire to be captious about these matters of appropriations, and still it is well known by those who are conversant with the matter that if these small appropriations are allowed to run by for next year the Government will be obliged to appropriate a larger amount to cover the deficiency and the waste and neglect of the current year. The action of the water and sand is more or less detrimental to these harbors. The policy of the Government thus far has not been to finish up the harbors at once, but to distribute the money appropriated to different harbors and keep them up together. While a harbor is unfinished, it is necessary to keep up the appropriations from year to year. It would be wiser to appropriate enough to complete at once, but this course has not been pursued. I trust this amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. ALLISON. I only have one word to say in reply. This harbor at Marquette is a very important harbor, and the engineers reported in favor of an extension of the breakwater four hundred feet, at a cost of $68,000, or $170 per linear foot, the depth of water where this breakwater is being built being thirty-three feet. Now the engineer estimates that one-half this sum should be appropriated this year and one-half next year. Evidently, if this breakwater is to be commenced, we should appropriate at least the amount required, $35,000. The House, instead of appropriating enough to begin a work necessary in the near future, appropriated $5,000, which would build about forty feet or perhaps thirty feet of this breakwater; and it occurred to your committee that that was a proposition certainly not in the interest of economy. Therefore the committee propose to appropriate $2,000 to preserve and protect this harbor, and yielding to the House in its desire for economy omit an appropriation to extend this breakwater. That is all there is in reference to this harbor at Marquette. If the sum is increased at all, it ought to be increased to $35,000, so that the work necessary can be commenced and pushed forward.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator if, in his judgment, the $2,000 is sufficient to keep the harbor in its present condition for a year?

Mr. ALLISON. I only know that the Engineer Department state that $2,000 will keep it in repair. Of course I do not know the details. I only know that that is the estimate of the engineers for keeping it in repair.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 40 and 41, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Frankfort, Michigan, $5,000.

Mr. FERRY. In looking through this bill it would seem as though the knife had been directed pretty effectually to Michigan.

Mr. EDMUNDS. It is the largest sore probably.

Mr. DAWES. Perhaps it could not go amiss.

Mr. FERRY. The Senator from Vermont says it is the largest sore, and the Senator from Massachusetts says it cannot go amiss. Now, I want to submit to the Senate that there has been a good deal said about Michigan having so large a proportion of the appropriations. For appropriation bills, unfortunately Michigan has the largest coast of any State in the Union. I think she has 15 per cent. of the whole coast of the country. That is one fact which should be kept in mind in considering an appropriation bill that necessarily contains items for different harbors. We have the whole commerce of the upper lakes passing by that coast, and if that commerce is to be protected the harbors should be developed and made safe; and it is with that intent the Government has controlled itself in distributing the public funds for this purpose. Take the harbors of Michigan with that extended coast of 15 per cent. to the whole of the country, and it seems a large number; but when we come to the aggregate amount appropriated the sum is not so large. Let me look at it. I want to call the attention of the committee to two appropriations. I see they have not directed the knife to those two places, one for Sault Ste. Marie, which I suppose would be considered in the light of a national work, for which the appropriation is $200,000, the same as last year, and the other the appropriation for a harbor of refuge on Lake Huron. Lake Huron unfortunately has not many harbors for commerce, but fortunately for an appropriation bill. For that harbor of refuge $100,000 was appropriated last year and $100,000 proposed this year, without change by the Senate committee. Those two harbors, I take it, are of such national importance that the committee deemed it not advisable to touch them. So I understand from the action of the committee and from the remarks of the chairman.

That being the case, it was, aside from these national works, provided for the whole State of Michigan the sum of $278,000 by the act of 1875. I call the attention of Senators to the amount, and then ask whether it is reasonable to cut out these harbors and leave the commerce to suffer when in the aggregate it is so small compared with the coast of the State and the amount of its commerce. I am taking up a little time on this, because I want what I say to apply generally to all the points stricken out by the committee. I do so now, and will not allude to the subject in its general aspect again. I desire to disabuse the impression that Michigan has so large an appropriation compared with other States, with due regard to its extensive coast and commerce. With a view to economize, the delegation of Michigan proposed to cut down the appropriation of last year about 19 per cent. The House conformed to that line of economy and passed the bill appropriating $225,000 for the whole of Michigan, except for the two national works named. It is proposed by the committee to cut down still further 20 per cent. on the House bill, reducing the sum to $180,000.

I desire to call the attention of the Senate to another fact in this connection with reference to the importance of the shipping involved. I have sought the latest official report that I could find, which is that of 1873. The commerce since then has increased. I want to give to the Senate a little view of the amount of the commerce of these inland lakes. The number of vessels engaged on all of our coastwise trade in 1873 was 76,801, and the amount of tonnage was nearly twenty-nine millions. On the northern lakes the number of vessels that cleared in one season was 54,605, and the tonnage 15,000,000. Compared with the whole amount of shipping of the whole coastwise trade of the United States, both on the Atlantic and the Pacific, with all the inland lakes, that on the northwestern lakes was 71 per cent. of the number of vessels, and 51 per cent. of the tonnage of the whole. I want now to narrow the comparison down to Lakes Michigan, Superior, and Huron touched by the coast of the State of Michigan. I am not stating these facts to waste the time of the Senate. I have not occupied this floor much, and I desire here, in justice to the State of Michigan and for the purpose of placing before the Senate stubborn and convincing facts, to show the amount of business upon Lakes Huron, Michigan, and Superior, tributary to and protected by these ports, which it is now proposed to neglect and injure by the proposition of the committee of the Senate.

Take those three lakes; and the number of vessels cleared in that year was 38,000, and the tonnage nearly ten millions, being 49 per cent., almost one-half of the whole coastwise trade of the United States, and the tonnage 34 per cent. I will speak now of Lake Michigan simply, and give you the commerce of the three customs districts of Lake Michigan, namely, the districts of Michigan, Chicago, and Milwaukee, the commerce of which bears directly upon the coast of Michigan, and what is that? The number of vessels clearing from those three districts was 29,164, and the amount of tonnage seven millions and over, making from those three districts of that single lake a percentage on the whole coastwise trade of the United States of 37 per cent. and the tonnage 25 per cent., so that you have a commerce on Lake Michigan equal to 25 per cent. of the tonnage of the whole coastwise trade of the United States and seventeen hundred miles of Michigan State coast—15 per cent. of the whole of the country—and it is proposed to cut $225,000 down to $180,000, notwithstanding the number of vessels cleared in a season was 37 per cent. and the amount of the tonnage 25 per cent. of the whole of the nation.

I have stated these general facts simply with a view of disabusing a wrong impression prejudicial to the State of Michigan. I know every time the harbor and river bill is up in Congress it is charged that Michigan has the lion's share. This remark was implied by my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. DAWES,] and probably the impression was caught in the House in which he has so long been a distinguished member; yet when I thus invite his attention to the comparison of the commerce he ought with others to dismiss that false and unjust impression.

Mr. DAWES. I beg the Senator's pardon. I do not want any such construction to be put upon the remark I made. I appreciate the commerce of Michigan, if the Senator will give me a moment.

Mr. FERRY. Certainly; I yield to the Senator with pleasure.

Mr. DAWES. There is no Senator who appreciates the commerce of Michigan more than I do; and there is no person either in this branch or the other who has been more liberal in regard to appropriations for the harbors in that State than I have been. I trust the Senator will not put such construction on my remark.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, there is nothing more in the remark than its tone and reflection. It was perfectly natural, and it agrees with the general impression, but it is an unwarrantable one. It is to correct that impression that I am occupying a little attention now, and the chairman of the committee must not be impatient, for I remind him that I have occasion at times to exercise some patience, and so I trust that this is the opportunity when the chairman will accord it to me. It is for that reason that I have gone into a statistical statement relying upon no vague declaration, but based upon fact. I have every harbor here, with the appropriations under the law of 1875 and the proposed appropriation by the bill of the House now pending, showing the percentage of deduction in each case and also the proposition of the committee cutting down that deduction still further, but I am not disposed to take up the time by giving the pro rata of each harbor, and will give the aggregate of all the harbors named in Michigan. Including Sault Ste. Marie and the harbor of refuge on Lake Huron, the law of 1875 gave $578,000. The bill of the House proposes to give $525,000, and the Senate proposes to cut it down to $480,000. Take out the two national works referred to, and the proposition of the Senate is to cut Michigan down to $180,000. I call the attention of the committee as well as of other Senators to the fact that there are other propositions in this bill looking to general interests, such as the improvement of the Mississippi River, such as the improvement of the Missouri River, the Arkansas River, Rock Island, for instance. I do not mention Rock Island because it lies in the vicinity of the State represented so efficiently by the Senator in charge of this bill; but I only want to call his attention to it that he may sympathize with me and with my State as he deplores the unfortunate condition of his river and his channel fronting his State, to remedy which he asks for a substantial appropriation, and I heartily support him in it.

I have always regarded the river and harbor bill as a bill general in its character and of vastly more importance than most bills we pass here in Congress. I have always been an advocate of its provisions for North or South, East or West, and while aggregating four or five millions of dollars the resulting benefits are so multiplied that we cannot well compute the value to the country. There is no bill, I repeat, of so general importance to the nation as the river and harbor bill. It is now proposed to cut down the sums fixed by an economical House by a still further reduction of 20 per cent. as respects the State of Michigan, appropriating but $225,000 all told except for the two places of what is admitted of national importance. I ask, as compared with other appropriations running up to hundreds of thousands, whether it is fair to strike out, as has been done here, so many harbors around that State? If I were to allude to other considerations it would be to say that if Senators lived upon the water as I do, and were conversant with the loss of property and of life, their sympathies as well as their duty here in a legislative capacity would appeal convincingly to them. Yet I do not wish to make that appeal, because I have based my claim upon justice; and upon that I stand. With a coast of 1,700 miles, with a proportion to the whole commerce of the United States of 25 per cent., with a number of vessels and proportional tonnage of 37 per cent., but $225,000 is asked for these harbors in a bill appropriating over $5,000,000. How much, I will ask the Senator from Iowa, is the aggregate of this bill?

Mr. ALLISON. Nearly $6,000,000.

Mr. FERRY. There is asked for Michigan, aside from those two national works, $225,000 out of a bill of $6,000,000; yet we see an amount of tonnage here on the three lakes involved of 34 per cent. of all our coastwise tonnage. I ask, Mr. President, in the light of this, whether I am wrong in appealing to the justice of the Senate and asking if Michigan is getting more than her share because forsooth she has more harbors and because she has more coast? I trust the amendments will not be concurred in, but that the amount appropriated by the House shall be awarded to the State of Michigan.

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I sympathize with my honorable friend in regard to the appropriations for his State. I also appreciate and understand the importance of improvements at the several places in his State which are named in these bills annually; but the committee proceeded upon an entirely different theory from that suggested by the Senator from Michigan. We did not look at State lines and State boundaries in preparing this bill. We said, "We will take those improvements that are of national importance wherever they may be found, and we will appropriate money enough to carry them on, because that is true economy; we will not dole out $1,000 to this harbor, $5,000 to that harbor, and $200,000 to this State, and $50,000 to that, as though we were making a sort of division of spoils in this river and harbor bill." On the contrary, we proceeded upon the theory that these great improvements of national importance should go on, notwithstanding the disposition to economize. Therefore we said for the canal at Sault Ste. Marie $200,000 shall be appropriated; for the harbor of refuge on Lake Huron, by which harbor passes the entire commerce of the upper lakes amounting to hundreds of millions annually, we said we will give a hundred thousand dollars; so that when those poor sailors are wrecked by storms they may find there a harbor of refuge built by the United States sufficient to protect them from the elements. But when we come to consider the question of these various harbors along the lakes and along our sea-coast we went into a specific and detailed examination of the engineer's report in each individual case. If we found a harbor to be in good condition, and if we found the amount appropriated by the House bill not sufficient to carry on the work economically, we omitted it entirely for this year. Let me take the harbor at Frankfort. The harbor at Frankfort is one of some importance upon Lake Michigan. The House appropriated $5,000 for it. We examined the engineer's report with reference to this harbor. We found that it had received in all a considerable sum of money already. The original estimate was $46,000. There has been appropriated since $30,000, leaving $16,000 to complete the work; but owing to a diversion of some of the funds of the original appropriation of $30,000 the engineer estimates for $25,000, and here is his language:

> It will require $25,000 to make the extension as proposed. This sum should be appropriated at one time, so that the work can be done in a single season.

There is the engineer's estimate. He says $25,000 will complete this harbor. The harbor is in good condition and $25,000 will complete the extension of it, but that the $25,000 necessary to complete it should be appropriated in a single season. Therefore we had left to us the alternative of either appropriating $25,000 or nothing, because $5,000 will do absolutely nothing toward the completion of this work. Let me say here that these appropriations are not covered into the Treasury. I have no doubt that if we appropriate $5,000 this year the Engineer Bureau would not expend one dollar until we should appropriate the additional $20,000 necessary to complete this work.

Mr. FERRY. Mr. President, I have a word or two more to say. I am glad that the chairman of the committee has referred to the harbor of refuge on Lake Huron, and also to the Sault Ste. Marie appropriation. They have been considered two points of national importance. The appropriations have been uniform. They were last year $200,000 at Sault Ste. Marie for the purpose of widening that canal, and $100,000 for the harbor of refuge in Lake Huron. That is the appropriation suggested for this year. It is accorded by the House bill, and has not been changed by the committee.

When the Senator speaks of the vast amount of commerce, he forgets the fact that it comes largely from Chicago and Milwaukee, and all that commerce has to pass through the straits. Any one who is conversant with the lakes knows that the prevailing winds are westerly, and that the western coast of Michigan is the most dangerous. It is well verified by the fact that on Lake Huron it was considered necessary only to make one harbor of refuge, when the policy of the Government has been to make two or three harbors of refuge on the western coast of Michigan. With the prevailing winds westerly and the route of commerce lying along that shore in order to reach the straits, these very harbors are necessary for protection and safety. The nearer you approach any coast the less the working room and the more easy must be access to places of safety, and the more you must facilitate entrance to your harbor. Where a vessel has the whole scope of the lake she can take care of herself. I want to cite you to a fact that is forcible in this connection. Take the salient point of Big Point au Sable, on the western coast of Michigan. There never was a light-house there until 1866. Prior to that time from one to four vessels loaded with grain, generally from Chicago, went ashore every fall, sinking enough to build two such light-houses, yes, three lights, every year. When the attention of the Government was called to it it appropriated $30,000 for a light-house; and I believe it is a fact that there has not been a vessel ashore since then. Why? It was right in the line of commerce and vessels generally hugged that shore, and whenever the wind veered to the northwest they frequently went ashore, and generally at night. With that light before them they sight and keep clear of the coast. I give that as an illustration of governmental protective works for the safety of commerce. So with harbors on the western coast of Michigan. Make them safe and easy of entrance and commerce is protected. I acknowledge that Michigan harbors are numerous, but they are a necessity of an extended coast.

If it is to be the policy not to distribute public money to various harbors and not farm it out as it seems to be termed, why not then apply it to the completion of such harbors as may be deemed ample? The committee do not see fit to recommend this. I am not questioning their judgment, but I am taking issue with a policy which would deny to these places such sums as will enable vessels to enter, so that life and property are kept in safety, even by the small installments of from five to ten thousand dollars, and I think in most instances they do not exceed $15,000. With the exception of Saint Joseph and Saginaw Harbors, $15,000 is the highest sum the committee propose for any; and I think in no other instance is the amount appropriated by the House bill larger than $15,000. Having regard to my duty and my relation to this body and to the Government, I frankly say that, considering the commercial interest of these lakes and the appropriations to be distributed throughout the States, it is not only unfair but it is not altogether just to confine Michigan even to $225,000.

I have no desire, Mr. President, to occupy more time. When, however, the honorable representative of the Committee on Appropriations is pressing the importance of protecting the property and the life of citizens passing through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal, I want him to remember that the commerce of Lake Michigan cannot pass to the lower lakes and the Atlantic coast except through the straits, and to do that it must pass by and be secured by these very harbors. Between Beaver Island and the coast vessels have but little sea-room. If the wind veers adversely they have no other recourse than to these harbors, which governmental generosity seeks to provide. It is to keep up these harbors that annual appropriations are asked, and, though small each year, they save larger appropriation perhaps succeeding years, even if the same policy of keeping the harbors in their present condition without developing them further is pursued. I must confess my surprise that with an aggregate so small and a coast so extended and important the committee should have adopted a policy that does stick the knife into this Michigan sore, as characterized by the Senator from Vermont.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations, which has been read.

The question being put, a division was called for, and the ayes were 14.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ALLISON. Before the vote is taken I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that the engineers state in reference to this harbor that it requires $25,000 to complete it, and that it ought to be completed in a single season. This bill appropriates only $5,000, and the Department could not enter upon the work. Therefore I hope the amendment will be agreed to, striking out this item.

Mr. DAVIS. There is considerable difference between the amount appropriated by the committee and the amount asked for by the Senator from Michigan. It is true if any appropriation for new work is to be made it ought to be much larger. In regard to the last amendment of the committee which has been agreed to, the committee thought $2,000 necessary after consulting the report of the Engineer Department for keeping the work in repair for the present year and the committee believed that it would be an economy to fix the amount at $2,000. The committee, it will be found, has lessened the appropriations not only for Michigan but in other places.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Kernan, McCreery, Sherman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Windom, and Withers—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Key, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Morton, Norwood, Oglesby, Paddock, Ransom, Robertson, Spencer, and Whyte—27.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Morrill, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Stevenson, Thurman, and Wright—31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CONKLING. That I may not be found in laches I want now to give notice to the honorable Senator who has charge of this bill that I shall feel it my duty and my privilege also to move to reconsider—I shall not interpose to do it now—the vote by which the Senate has agreed to sundry amendments the subjects of which were in the State of New York, and which were identical, as I understand it, with the amendment just rejected, except in some instances the merit of the work was greater and the occasion more urgent than in the instance upon which the Senate has now voted. My colleague and myself—I believe I can speak for my colleague in that regard—did not feel at liberty to interpose and resist the amendments striking out works in the State of New York as long as we supposed it was the judgment and purpose of the committee to adopt a fixed line of policy touching this bill. That line of policy we understood to consist mainly in this, that wherever there was a work local in a sense in its character as distinguished, for example, from the blasting of rocks and removing the obstruction at Hell Gate in the Sound, which concerns many other States, indeed I might say all the Atlantic States, quite as much as it does the State in which that work resides—where there was an instance of a work local in a sense, circumscribed in the interest which it affected, and a large estimate made shown to be necessary by the engineers to complete that work, and where a trifling sum would preserve the harbor, would keep whatever had already been completed, there the committee took the lower sum. Or to restate myself in other words the committee refused, first, to appropriate for new enterprises; second, they refused to appropriate a partial and inadequate amount for the performance of a work which the engineers reported required a larger sum, and a larger sum in a single season. In place of making such partial appropriations, the committee said, "We will now appropriate so much as is necessary to protect, preserve, maintain, guard against the deterioration of harbors and other works, and in instances local in character we will not go further. We cannot appropriate, as in the case in hand, $35,000, the estimate of the engineers, held by them to be necessary for expenditure in one season, to make one job of it, and to do an economical and business-like thing; we cannot afford to do that; it is unwise to appropriate $5,000, a fraction of the required sum, and yet a sum larger than is needed for preservation; and therefore we take from the engineers a statement of the amount of money necessary to preserve and protect the harbor," which the Senator having charge of the bill tells us in one case was $2,000. They appropriate that; they recommend it; but now the Senate overrules that recommendation.

Mr. President, the case I have stated is stronger for the reduced appropriation, stronger for eliminating the appropriation than in three instances in my own State which I can point out, which the Senate has already passed, and passed without contention on the part of my colleague or myself.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from New York to the fact that the amendment just voted upon is in lines 40 and 41. The amendment of the committee, in lines 38 and 39, was agreed to by the Senate.

Mr. CONKLING. That is, to strike out altogether the $5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate agreed to the amendment of the Committee on Appropriations making the alteration in line 39.

Mr. CONKLING. I beg pardon of the Chair; but it is a still stronger illustration of what I am talking about.

Mr. FERRY. Will the Senator from New York allow me a moment?

Mr. CONKLING. Certainly.

Mr. FERRY. I at first rose to vote against striking out the item for New York to which the Senator has referred; but I discovered that the Senators from New York did not want it in the bill, and I supposed it was because they judged that it was not really necessary. I notice in lines 23 and 24 an amendment for which I voted, striking out $200,000 and inserting $350,000 for an item in New York, because I felt that it was of importance. I am heartily in sympathy with the Senator from New York in his desire to reconsider and replace the items struck out in regard to that State.

Mr. CONKLING. Mr. President, it was to relieve myself and to relieve my colleague too, although he is abundantly able to speak for himself, of such a misunderstanding as the Senator from Michigan now suggests, that I rose to ask the attention of the Senate. I did not vote to strike out these prior lines 15 and 16, 19 and 20, 21 and 22, and so on relating to the State of New York, because I did not believe that the work, within the general scope and genius of river and harbor bills, ought not to be done, that it was not important, that it was not suitable, that it was not well in all regards tried by the principles of our river and harbor bills; but I acquiesced in the report of the committee and voted to sustain their report for a reason which I have endeavored to state, namely, that the committee at this time had found itself so straitened by the considerations operating upon it as to feel bound to restrict appropriations first to the preservation of work which has been done, and second to the continuation of such works as seemed paramount and exigent in their importance, and to postpone to a more convenient or a less straitened season, other and intermediate works. Therefore it was, I repeat again, that I assented to the amendments striking out works in the State of New York which I may say, without intending to institute any disparaging comparison with Michigan or any other State, can be demonstrated, for reasons as strong as exist in the case of the amendment just passed upon, to be appropriate and important subjects of appropriation at a proper time.

The Chair has reminded me that lines 40 and 41 contain the amendment on which the Senate has voted, and that amendment was to strike out $5,000, for the improvement of the harbor at Frankfort, Michigan. What are the facts? As I understand, the engineers report that that work, when it is to be done, will cost $25,000, and it ought to be done in a single season. Why? For some occult scientific reason which we cannot understand? Not at all; but for a reason of common sense which addresses itself to every man in this body, whether he lives on the water or lives inland. We all understand that if the machinery, the apparatus, the gangs of hands, the whole outlay and preparation for a definite and limited work are to be assembled in order to do that work, the true way is, if it is so small that they can dispose of it in a single season, to do it and make an end of it, and not by an appropriation this year of $5,000 to go on and dredge to a certain extent and have the wash and effect of time and tide undo a large part of the work by another year, and then come in again with a second installment, redredge, re-assemble these dispersed hands, bring together again the machinery which is there and which has fallen into disrepair or been carried elsewhere, and then the third year follow it up again. We all understand that the same reasons which would lead a man who proposed to build a vessel or to construct a house, or to do any other definite and entire thing which could be done within a limited space, to do it at one continuous time and not to scatter it through a period of years and build it up by sporadic and isolated efforts, renewed from time to time, justify the engineers in saying that if a certain work is to be done on a certain harbor which costs $25,000, it ought to be done and the mode ought to be taken to do it, and not to show "how not to do it" by pecking away, a little this year, and something more next year, and something in addition the year after, and spreading it over a series of years to manifest loss and increase of cost.

I understand the Senator in charge of the bill to say further that the engineers report that for the preservation of anything found in that harbor, as it is now, no appropriation is necessary this year. The honorable Senator tells us that the board of engineers say that unless their work or some part of it is to be undertaken no appropriation whatever is necessary this year. Now, what has the Senate done? The Senate, resting its action on the action of the House, which it is not for me to criticise, has proceeded to guess off here that $5,000 which happens to be just one-fifth of the definite sum required for a definite work if it be performed, shall be appropriated for what? To be committed to the discretion of some officer, we know not who, to be applied in violation of the recommendation of the board of engineers. That is all we know about it.

Mr. President, I intended when I arose to occupy but a moment about this bill, and although I have been led to say something more than I meant to do, I will not be tempted at this time into a line of remark with which I may at some time trouble the Senate touching the philosophy and methods of our river and harbor appropriations. I believe them to be radically wrong. I believe that river and harbor bills at last are apt to be matters of bounce and chance, industry and push; I use all these words with respect for everybody; and the question is, as has been illustrated this morning, which work, which State, which instance shall be espoused by some Senator who, resolutely making an outcry against reduction, prevents reduction being made? And it is largely, from first to last, a matter of perseverance, of industry, of activity, of zeal, of espousal by members of this body and by members of the House represented in committee and represented elsewhere. We have but one gauge in the whole business; we have but one yard-stick, but one safe-guard by which we pretend to go. What is that? The reports, the estimates, the certificates on oath and on honor of the board of engineers. We say by that we can measure somewhat our judgment and our duty in making these appropriations. Here comes a board of engineers to the two committees of this body, last to the Committee on Appropriations, and say that in this instance to maintain that harbor as it is no appropriation whatever is necessary for this year; they say that if an appropriation is to be made this year it should be for $25,000, to do a definite work during this season; and thereupon the Senate turns round against the recommendation of the engineers, against the recommendation of the committee, and says "We will do neither one nor the other; we will not stand by the idea of merely maintaining this harbor; we will not take the idea of doing this work, but betwixt and between, as a matter of guess, we will say that one-fifth of the amount required for the work, which amount is totally unnecessary if the work is not to be commenced, the one-fifth being totally inadequate, shall be appropriated and the engineer in charge shall be permitted to use his own discretion as to whether he will spend it or not, and, if so, how, and then we trust to the winds, the waves, the chances of time and opportunity, the question whether all the work done with this $5,000 shall be obliterated, the dredging filled up, and the whole thing lost, or whether it shall be lost only in part, knowing as we do at this time that in large part it must be lost.

Mr. President, without wishing to aim my remarks at any instance in Michigan or elsewhere, I do humbly submit to the Senate that there should be some "method in this kind of madness" found in river and harbor bills; that professing, as we do, to receive light from the engineers we ought to legislate upon some theory consistent either with their judgment or with our own common sense, and not by mere guess and caprice establish one rule for one State and another rule for another State and make appropriations which the individual judgment of no Senator can heartily approve.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending amendment is to strike out $15,000 and insert $14,000 in line 43, "for the improvement of the harbor of Manistee, Michigan."

Mr. FERRY. I merely rise to ask the gentleman in charge of the bill if that is the suggestion of the engineer?

Mr. ALLISON. That is the revised estimate of the engineer, and if the Senator will turn to page 246 of Executive Document 1, Forty-fourth Congress, volume 2, part 1, he will see that the engineer reports in relation to this harbor:

> There is now an available water-way of but nine and a half feet between the piers. To increase this water-way to twelve feet, $5,000 will be needed for dredging, making a total aggregate of $13,771.40 for dredging and building the three hundred and twenty feet of pile revetment.

That is so near $14,000 that we thought we would make the appropriation $14,000, as we supposed this amount of $13,771.40 was a sort of guess-work, as the rest of it seems to be.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 46, 47, 48, and 49, in the following words:

> For the improvement of the harbor at Pentwater, Michigan, $10,000.
> For the improvement of the harbor at White River, Michigan, $10,000.

Mr. FERRY. I ask the Senate to non-concur in this amendment. What I said before covers this case; but I will say a word or two more, especially as I intended to interrupt the Senator from New York, but disliked to do so then. I wanted to put to him a question. The Engineer Department recommend the completion of the different harbors and the appropriation, say for illustration, of from $50,000 to $200,000 each, and declare the necessity for their completion as harbors of protection to the shipping of the lakes. Disregarding this, the Senate adopts the policy of appropriating only a part, and by that method even the water is deepened, so that in some cases from seven feet it is deepened to ten, as was stated in the case of Manistee and in other places to eleven or twelve feet. I wanted to ask the Senator if that did not prove beneficial, and if the harbors cannot be completed on the department plan? Why abandon benefits derived from a modified policy?

I agree perfectly with the Senator that if the Government should adopt the policy of completing entirely these necessary works we should then have valuable harbors, and not left as now in an unfinished condition, necessitating annual appropriations to provide for destruction incident to incompletion. We know very well that if we were to meet such necessary appropriations at once it would take so large an amount from the Treasury that it would not be wise to do it; nor would it be possible to do it now. If we cannot pursue that policy, ought we not to adopt a modified one, by which in a measure commerce is protected, life saved, and the country flourish? In that line of policy I hope the Senate will non-concur in this amendment.

I have shown that the aggregate to Michigan in the House bill is only $225,000. The amendments of the committee lessen that by $40,000. The Senator from New York remarks that he did not wish to draw any discriminating comparison between States; neither do I. I feel in the case of the increase for New York Harbor, as the committee propose by a larger appropriation for Hell Gate, that there ought to be a large appropriation for the improvement going on there. I am ready to vote for it. I have heretofore voted for that because foreign commerce is protected by safer entrance to New York and the prosperity of the whole country is advanced.

So also I see that notwithstanding the cases that are cut out the increase for New York Harbor is almost as much as the whole amount of the appropriation to Michigan. That increase is nearly $200,000 on the House bill, and yet I do not allude to that to show that New York is getting more than Michigan—not at all. It is necessary for New York; I appreciate it; I vote for it, because I believe that the House had under their economical policy cut lower than the circumstances justified.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. I wish to remark that in reference to the amendment now under consideration, as well as the next—that is, for Pentwater Harbor and White River, Michigan—there is no such recommendation from the Engineer Department as that to which the Senator from New York and the member of the Committee on Appropriations in charge of the bill have alluded; no recommendation that the money asked for should be expended at one time. Therefore there is nothing in any such ground as applied to these two appropriations.

Mr. CONKLING. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him to correct a misapprehension, not of mine, but of some other Senators? The Senator says that there is no such recommendation touching the amendment to which he is now speaking; not that there was none touching the other amendment.

Mr. CHRISTIANCY. O, no; I take no issue there; but, on the contrary, as I read the recommendation of the engineer and the statement in reference to the facts connected with the harbor, I draw the inference, which I think every one must draw, that unless there be some amount appropriated here this work will not be found another year as good as it now is; in other words, there should be an amount of money appropriated to keep the work in as good condition as it is now and to avoid the loss of a considerable amount of money already expended there. Such would be my inference from the reading of the engineer's report. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will not agree to this amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. If we are to have a struggle upon each and every amendment to this bill on the theory that New York has not had enough, or that Michigan has not had enough, or that Oregon, if you please, Mr. President, has not had enough in the bill, we might as well take the bill as it came from the House and simply add to it such sums, as in our judgment, we think necessary to carry on the great works of internal improvement which are national in their character and concern the whole people. Now take for example this improvement of the harbor at Pentwater, Michigan. There is an estimate in this case of $49,200, and the Engineer Department say that that ought to be appropriated and could be profitably used this season. Thirteen thousand two hundred dollars of that sum is to be used for dredging; $18,000 is to be used for what is called pile revetment to protect that dredging, and they should be done together. In other words, $31,200 of this sum shall be expended at one time, or none of it. Now you appropriate here $10,000 in order that Michigan may get her share, and I speak that not disrespectful of my good friend, for I want Michigan to have her share. How are you going to divide that $10,000 between the dredging and the pile revetment necessary for this harbor? If you appropriate anything here whatever, appropriate in a manly way $31,200 to go on with this improvement. If you cannot do that, then stand and in the same manly way omit this appropriation until next year and then appropriate $31,200.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to ask the Senator if it would not be prudent and good policy if under the manly pressure, which we did not seem to have with the committee, we cannot get the larger amount to complete both, to appropriate enough to dredge out and keep the channel usable rather than to divert the whole sum and let the channel fill up, so that then when next year comes around you would have not only to double but quadruple the amount to be appropriated to put the harbor in as good condition as it was before? I say if we cannot get enough for revetment and get enough for dredging, let us have enough to make the harbor accessible so that commerce can pursue its way.

Mr. ALLISON. But this dredging is to widen the channel. They have a channel there twelve feet deep and they propose to widen it from seventy feet to one hundred feet, I believe, and therefore dredging is required. The revetment is also required as part of this improvement. It does seem to me that we ought to pay some regard in these appropriations to the recommendations made by the Engineer Department, and the Engineer Department say "the estimate or omit;" that is their language. Perhaps I ought to say here that this committee, or a portion of them at least, undertook in the presence of the Engineer Bureau to make a careful statement of this bill with a view that whatever money we did appropriate should be economically and prudently expended, and when we came to this harbor they showed us the character of this work and said that $10,000 was of no account toward its completion, and I do not believe that if we were to appropriate this sum this year the Engineer Bureau would use one dollar of it. This harbor does not need dredging for the purpose of keeping it in repair; it needs nothing for repair; it needs only this dredging for the purpose of widening it; and therefore unless you appropriate at least $31,000 you may as well leave it out. I trust the Senate will leave it out.

Mr. FERRY. I have but a word to say on this amendment. I wish to call the attention of the Senator from Iowa to one fact. Take the one at my residence, a harbor that I know all about, and it is also a harbor of refuge; and we owe it to the Government, too, in the main. The work was partly done by private citizens, but largely by the Government. The entrance, which only had seven feet and a half of water, now has eighteen feet of water, made so by a moderate expenditure. Grand Haven has not received a very large amount of appropriation. What is the report of the engineer for this year? He asks that $51,000 should be appropriated to complete it and make it permanent. With a view of economizing and providing for the other places, we can get along without so much. Last year I declined taking any appropriation for Grand Haven, that other harbors along the coast of Michigan might receive more. The recommendation was for a large amount, but I thought we could get along then. This year there was a certain amount needed to secure existing cribs and to prevent the water working out the sand and stone, and that moderate amount should be given to this harbor to protect it. For the purpose $15,000 is given instead of $51,000 for completion. Now if we had a full Treasury I would ask the whole amount on the principle that the Senator from Iowa suggests, but we are not in a condition to do that. Now, I say rather than let it run to waste and destruction, let us keep it along with a moderate sum, and keep up in this way all of these harbors so that at each place vessels can enter and business can succeed. Who is desirous of blocking up harbors by allowing sand-bars and shifting of cribs, for lack of small protective appropriations, and thereby destroy the business of a locality, when the Government has taken it in hand to develop its resources? And, as my friend from Vermont suggests, such denial absolutely cribs the business. It does in a double sense, and it is for that reason I would try to obviate it.

Mr. DAVIS. The amendment now under consideration, in my judgment, affects many more items in this bill. I was not one of the subcommittee that carefully examined this bill, but I am a member of the Appropriation Committee which considered it. I think that on the fate of these two amendments, as well as the one for Frankfort, already passed, depend many other items in this bill. It would be unfair to other sections of the country, to other States, to re-instate the two items now under consideration and not include many others that have been stricken out in this bill, and I think the Senate ought at once now to settle what its policy will be. If these two items are to be kept in the bill and not stricken out, then by general consent all the items that the House appropriated for should be retained. All have merit. There is not one in the bill that is without merit, and there are many not in the bill of as much merit as some already in the bill. I believe it is just to the entire country that this should be a test; and if the items now under consideration should remain in the bill, then let us keep them all in the bill.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the particular cases to which the Senator from West Virginia refers in respect to which this would be a test? He has some in his mind clearly.

Mr. DAVIS. There are two items now pending.

Mr. EDMUNDS. But the Senator said that this applied in many other respects, and spoke of cases that were equally meritorious that ought to be guided by this vote. What are those cases?

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator misunderstood me. I have nothing in my mind whatever except the two cases before me, but all in the bill have merit or they would not be here. I have reference to no particular amendment in the bill, but upon the principle that the Appropriation Committee considered this bill and recommended the striking out of these two items, they have recommended the striking out of a hundred other items, and if the principle is not good and will not hold here let us put them all back.

Mr. MAXEY. I concur in the necessity of making appropriations for the great national arteries and highways of commerce. So concurring, I voted, and without hesitation, for the increase of the appropriation for the harbor at Buffalo, New York, because I know that that is important. I voted in like manner for the increase of the appropriation at Hell Gate, near the city of New York, because I know that is important. But, sir, as States are made up of counties and the Federal Union of States, so the great commerce of the country is made up of these small streams of commerce, and it has been the policy of this Government almost from its foundation to aid and encourage commerce not only by appropriations to the great arteries but by fostering and encouraging the development of commerce by making appropriations for the improvement of the smaller rivers and the smaller harbors. While we who may be little fish are perfectly willing to help the big whale, we think the whale ought not to try to deprive us of the little there may be for our benefit. Hence I have taken this view of the matter, that the House of Representatives have carefully examined this bill and they have passed this bill of appropriations and it has come to us, and the Appropriation Committee of the Senate seem to have stricken out the bill by wholesale. I have a case in point in my own mind where an appropriation has been made for years, was made I believe last year, and an appropriation was recommended by the Chief Engineer for the present year, and by some oversight it was not in the Book of Estimates that I have obtained and have here, a most important work. And so knowing of a case in my own State, I apprehend that same character of knowledge is in the possession of those from other States in respect to their States. The idea presented by the Senator from West Virginia is, in my judgment, correct. I do not think it would be right to call upon me or to call upon any other Senator to aid in the improvement and development of the great harbors, such as Buffalo, such as the city of New York, and others that might be named, and deprive the smaller rivers and the smaller harbors of their appropriations, because it is what goes out of the small harbors into the great harbors that makes up this great commerce in the great places. I think comity, justice, equity, and the usages of the country clear back to the foundation of the Government all sustain the general policy of the House bill; and for one, therefore, I shall vote to non-concur in all these amendments striking out items.

Mr. KERNAN. Mr. President, I hope I shall be pardoned for saying a few words in addition to what was said by my colleague. The present amendment proposes to strike out an appropriation of $10,000 for the improvement of the harbor at Pentwater, Michigan. The Senator in charge of the bill informs us that the work to be done there requires in round numbers $40,000, and the Engineer Department advises us to omit it or appropriate all. It is not a work that can be continued with small sums of $5,000 or $10,000 from year to year continuously, and it seems there is no great detriment to the service if we omit it for a year, as we are informed. I concur in the general view expressed by the Senator from Iowa that where a work can be preserved for a small appropriation so as to furnish useful facilities and advantages to commerce, or where without great detriment we need not commence the work at all, this is a proper year to reduce or omit appropriations. I do not believe it is wise for us to act in the spirit that we should have a sort of distribution of this money, each State getting something. This is the business of the Government of the United States, and I think we should do as good business men would do, omit appropriations where they can be properly deferred, and complete works in progress, if it can be advantageously done.

With this view I did not make a struggle against striking out the appropriation in lines 9 and 10, and yet that was for a harbor, a harbor at a dangerous place on Lake Erie, where the Erie Railroad, one of the great arteries of transportation, reaches the lake at Dunkirk. It was useless to struggle for it this year, for the reason that the harbor is in reasonable condition; it will answer fairly for the year; and if there is to be a general policy of cutting off where we can do it without serious detriment, we were disposed to submit. So take lines 21 and 22, an item for the improvement of the harbor at Great Sodus Bay,

New York, $5,000. A railroad runs to that point. We should like an appropriation there; but we thought that if the policy acquiesced in by the Senate should be that which I have stated we would forbear for this year, and only ask for appropriations where they were really necessary and would be well used.

Mr. MAXEY. The Senator from New York is a man who understands as well how to take care of his own State as any of us, and I call his attention to the fact that in two items our committee increase the appropriations for New York $175,000, and all that is stricken out amounts to $36,000.

Mr. KERNAN. I utterly disclaim here and now that I am here to take care of the State of New York and get all the appropriations I can for her. I am here to ask that which is for the public good, and not otherwise. While the committee have increased the appropriation for Hell Gate, a work that has been going on for years, yet I believe the estimate of the engineer was $400,000; and it is a work going on, it is a work of great importance; and is there any comparison in the estimation of my friend from Texas between that work and dribbling out $5,000 apiece to harbors on Ontario and Erie and Michigan? Is it not better for us, as a good business man would do, to say, "I will finish up this work this year; let another that the public do not suffer for go for another year, and then finish that." For one I do not believe it is my duty to my country or my State to say, "You have so much, and let us have so much, whether it is really important this year or not." Suppose a man owned a large tract of country; would he think of starting his buildings on different farms, laying out $5,000 or $10,000 there and another $5,000 there and another there, and so on? We should look as careful men at the interests of the country, in my judgment, to preserve what has been completed if it answers reasonably well in this year, when our appropriations are required to be as low as possible, cutting off the others, particularly if they are appropriations of $5,000 or $10,000, which the engineers say will do no good. I disclaim the notion that I am looking to New York, except as I would look to every other portion of the country, giving what is necessary for the public good and cutting off this year where without detriment it can be done. However, if this is to be done in this way, then I know that at Dunkirk, I know that at Sodus Bay and one or two other places, it is certainly far more important that we should have even the small sums given by the House bill than to distribute them in the way we are doing at some other places. All I ask is to act with my brethren on the policy which they adopt. I am in favor of the policy recommended by the committee and will act with it; but if the Senate differ I want their policy applied to my own State as well as to others.

Mr. FERRY. I desire to ask the Senator from New York a question. Does he not appreciate the fact that the House bill in the case of Michigan to which of course the allusion now is, as that is the pending question, is a reduction from last year's bill of 20 per cent.? I ask him as a question of economy and in consideration of the condition of the times, where we are unable to complete in one harbor and where the committee deem it impossible to appropriate to complete harbors and are obliged to distribute the appropriations more or less, whether there is not a comprehension of the necessities of the case in the reduction of 20 per cent. on last year's bill?

Mr. KERNAN. If my friend will state facts, as against what are stated by the committee, to show that $10,000 is needed at Pentwater either to preserve the work or to economically continue it, then I will vote for it; but I will vote for it upon no theory that it is a reduced percentage or anything of that kind. It is on the necessity of the money that I vote. If the public good demands it, I will vote for it; but if we begin in the various States to say "You have got so much, and so must we," it seems to me we shall not be doing what we should wisely do as a Senate for the various States. I want to repeat that I am prepared to vote, no matter in what State, where the facts show that there is more required, and let each proposition be considered alone; but when we are giving $5,000 here and $5,000 there on no other argument than that we ought to vote it because another State has it, I for one most respectfully say we had better not act upon that argument. Let us look at each case alone. If there is a state of things requiring the House appropriation, I shall vote for it; if it requires more I shall vote for it; but I do not want to get into the notion that I vote something for New York because another State has got a large amount. I want to act in the light of the facts given to us by the committee and by the gentlemen from the respective States, doing that which a good, prudent business man would do to preserve the work and further the public good.

Mr. FERRY. One word. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that the report from the Engineer Department recommends $49,000 for the completion of this harbor.

Mr. KERNAN. I alluded to that, and the Senator from Iowa stated after consultation that in consequence of the condition of things they advised that we appropriate the whole or none, and he says "appropriate none because they can get along this year."

Mr. FERRY. I do not know on what theory or basis the Engineer Department has settled a judgment. I only give you fact against theory. Take the harbor where I reside. The Engineer Department have recommended appropriations for it year after year, and it is only this year that they recommended $51,000. They recommended $200,000 for building a north pier. What was the action of Congress? They appropriated, I believe, only $50,000, and they added to that $15,000 or $20,000 more, so that we have now a depth of water of eighteen feet, and we had before but seven and a half feet. I say there is a fact showing that by a moderate appropriation and expenditure of money the depth of water is increased and the harbor made safe.

I do not know what the theory of the Engineer Department may be. I do not know under what pressure the Engineer Department have been brought to send a supplemental report here that certain harbors can as well be shut out this year as not. If I were applied to as head of a Department and told, "Here is so much; we must frame the bill within some limits; now we ask you to report certain harbors that can be shut out, in the face of your report that they required a large amount to complete them," I might make such a supplemental report temporarily; but I ask on the basis the Senator has stated, one of common sense, business judgment, what are we to do? If here were large appropriations beyond the capacity of the Government, I should have nothing to say; but I repeat what I have stated before, that the aggregate to Michigan is but $225,000 outside of Sault Ste. Marie and the harbor of refuge, which the chairman has declared are national works in the broadest sense, and for which appropriations have been made from year to year, and will be, I suppose, until they are completed. Now aside from them the aggregate is $225,000; and in the face of that I merely urge for these places the moderate amounts by which the depth of water can be preserved and property made safe. If you shut them out and let them fill up, by and by when we again appeal to you, then the argument will be made, "They are of no value; they have filled up mean time;" when, if you had pursued the course we are asking here, you would have kept them along year after year until you were able to complete them, and the while business would be developing and the best interests of the Government conserved.

Mr. ALLISON. I move that the five-minute rule be applied to this bill. I hope there will be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Is that in order? I should like to have the rule read. I think the rule applies to the general appropriation bills, and not to the river and harbor bill; but I am not sure about that. I should like to hear it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The order will be read.

The CHIEF CLERK. The Senate on the 28th of February, 1876,

Resolved, That during the present session it shall be in order at any time to move a recess, and, pending an appropriation bill, to move to confine debate on amendments thereto to five minutes by any Senator on the pending motion, and such motion shall be decided without debate.

Mr. EDMUNDS. All right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa to apply the five-minute rule to this bill.

Mr. ALLISON. If any Senator will say he wants to speak to this bill more than five minutes, I do not desire to press the motion now.

Mr. STEVENSON. I raise the point of order that this rule does not apply to the river and harbor bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It applies to all appropriation bills, and this is certainly an appropriation bill within the meaning of the order of the Senate.

Mr. STEVENSON. I think not; I think the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ANTHONY] will bear me out that the rule is always made specifically to apply to the river and harbor bill, when it is desired to be done.

Mr. CONKLING. The rule says any appropriation bill. What is this bill? An act making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. ANTHONY. Does it say "any appropriation bill?"

Mr. CONKLING. It says "an appropriation bill."

Mr. ANTHONY. I was under the impression that it said "a general appropriation bill;" and I know formerly we had to pass a special order for the river and harbor bill to bring it under the rule.

Mr. WEST. There does not seem to be any appeal from the decision of the Chair; but I should like to state what is within my recollection, and I have no doubt within the recollection of many other Senators, that this five-minute rule has always been applied to the river and harbor bill as well as to others. I remember standing in this place, having that rule applied to me in debate on a very important question in connection with a river and harbor bill, and by the courtesy of the Senate the time was extended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is not a debatable one.

Mr. CONKLING. Is there any appeal from the decision of the Chair?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has not heard any. Does the Senator from Kentucky appeal?

Mr. STEVENSON. No, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Iowa.

The motion was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 31, noes 9.

Mr. WALLACE. Mr. President, it is very certain that we are brought to one of three propositions upon the pending amendment: either we must adopt the theory of the committee that money should be appropriated for great national objects, for the development of important harbors and the continuance of work that is vital and essential, or adopt the theory of the House bill, which gives small amounts to national works and distributes small amounts to very many new works on small rivers, or we must adopt both theories and increase this bill by the amount of a million dollars. For my part, and speaking for the people of the State I represent, I cannot consent to agree that the proportions of this bill as it came from the House are to be swollen. It contained $5,800,000 then and it contains about that amount of money now. Beyond this amount I shall be unwilling to vote. I am then brought to the settlement of this question in my own mind as between the theory of the committee and the theory of the House bill; and it seems to me that there can be but one decision reached as between these two propositions: the one is the continuance of works that are vital and essential to the whole commerce of the country, the improvement of the great national arteries, those great streams that are boundaries between States; the other is the appropriation of money to small streams and new work. It does seem to me that the Senate cannot hesitate in its choice as between these two propositions and that it ought to sustain the theory of the committee. If this amendment be voted down, the Senate is at sea, and combinations and anti-combinations will be made in the Senate and the propositions of the bill will necessarily and inevitably be swollen.

Mr. COCKRELL. I desire to ask the Senator from Pennsylvania one question. If the theory of the committee be adopted that all appropriations must be made for works already commenced, when will those works be completed in order that other works of equal necessity may have an opportunity? As I understand, there are some works for which appropriations have been made for the last fifty years consecutively. Now, the theory of the committee, I understand, is to confine appropriations to that class of works and cut off new works?

Mr. WALLACE. "Order is Heaven's first law." We must take them in their order, the order of their necessity, the order of their indispensable necessity to the commerce of the country; and I shall always vote for that which my judgment tells me is the most necessary to conduct the commerce of this great country. I will not vote for a new appropriation to a small river when I know that one of the great ports of the country requires an appropriation in order to make the harbor more safe or to protect the vessels that enter there.

Mr. FERRY. I should like to call the attention of the Senator from Pennsylvania because he is of the committee. If the bill had been reduced a million of money I could see the force of what has been said by the Senator from Pennsylvania, but inasmuch as the bill has been increased, as stated by the Senator in charge of it in his opening remarks, some $36,000, I cannot understand how this distribution can be done for the best interests of the country. Take an illustration, (and it is always best to illustrate upon home matters:) For Sault Ste. Marie more is required than $200,000. That, in the public judgment, is a question of national importance. Yet the committee do not decide to increase that, but in the State of Michigan, which is the case now pending, instead of increasing on those large works, the appropriation for the State is decreased. I know those items are not touched as they came from the House, but they are not increased, and yet they are of national importance, it is said.

The bill is increased but $36,000. It is not diminished. If it was cut down one-half, then some places must be left out; but it is more like a redistribution. Now, with that view in changing the aggregate, ought we not to keep in mind these places which the Government has already taken in hand?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out lines 46, 47, 48, and 49.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 19, noes 21.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 20, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Conkling, Davis, Dawes, Eaton, Edmunds, Howe, Kernan, McCreery, Morrill, Oglesby, Robertson, Thurman, Wadleigh, Wallace, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Bogy, Caperton, Christiancy, Cockrell, Cooper, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Key, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Paddock, Ransom, Spencer, Stevenson, and Whyte—22.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Harvey, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Morton, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, and Sherman—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WITHERS. Mr. President, in view of the character of the votes which have been cast on these amendments and the manifest purpose of the Senate to dissent from the views which have guided the committee in the presentation of this bill, I think it would be only just to other schemes which have equal merit with many of the amendments that have been put on the bill that the bill should be recommitted to the committee, and that they should frame a bill embodying the House items and other amendments, many of which have been suggested, possessing equal merit with those incorporated in the bill. It is clear that the Senate dissent entirely from the views of the committee; that they are not willing to restrict the appropriations to the objects to which the committee deem it proper that they should be restricted. I think it would be best, under all the circumstances, to recommit the bill. I make that motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia moves to recommit the bill to the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. WINDOM. I hope the bill will not be recommitted. I think it will be disposed of much more promptly if the Senate continues with its present consideration.

Mr. WITHERS. I will not insist on the motion to recommit if the chairman of the committee is opposed to it; but I thought it would lead to a more fair, equitable, just, and symmetrical bill to recommit it rather than to thrust each individual amendment to the contingency of an active or eloquent advocate on the floor, or the absence of some person whose special interest it might be to guard that appropriation. It seems in the way we are proceeding we might modify any amendment of the committee or deny appropriations to subjects of great merit, and permit others to be stricken out, simply because they had an eloquent and earnest advocate on the floor.

Mr. WINDOM. The committee have exercised their best judgment on the bill, but the Senate does not seem to concur in it. It seems to me the best way is to take the sense of the Senate. I think that is the quickest way to get through with it. I have no other objection to the proposition.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Virginia insist on his motion?

Mr. WITHERS. No, sir; I withdraw it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to recommit is withdrawn. The next amendment will be stated.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 55, to increase the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Green Bay, Wisconsin, from $8,000 to $12,000.

Mr. STEVENSON. I should like to ask the Senator in charge of the bill why that is done. I see other items are stricken out that I think are more important than that.

Mr. ALLISON. Green Bay is a very important harbor, I would state to the Senator from Kentucky. The engineer in charge states that the sum of $12,000 is the lowest sum that he can carry on the necessary improvements for at this place. Therefore the committee give him the amount requested in his revised estimates. I cannot, just at this moment, say exactly how this $12,000 is to be expended. Major Roberts is a very faithful engineer.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment, and declared that the noes appeared to prevail.

Mr. ALLISON. I dislike to annoy the Senate, but I must ask for the yeas and nays on this amendment.

Mr. MORRILL. I suggest to the Senator to take a division.

Mr. ALLISON. I will try a division first.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Take the yeas and nays. I like this record.

Mr. RANSOM. I think the Senate voted under a misapprehension. I think the amendment will carry on a division.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is the call for the yeas and nays insisted upon?

Mr. CONKLING. Let us have the yeas and nays.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOWE. I do not know but that I ought to say a word about this amendment, though I do not care to say more than that. There is a cut across a point which has formed in front of the entrance to Fox River, and to straighten the entrance to the river the engineers have heretofore cut a channel across that point and have protected it by breakwaters at each end. The engineers want to finish the dredging of this channel. They say it will cost $12,000. The bill appropriated $8,000. Here is a proposition to give them what they want to complete the work. If it is the opinion of the Senate that there is economy in appropriating $8,000 this year and $4,000 the next, and leaving the commerce which enters that river to another year to have an entrance provided for it, I shall acquiesce in that judgment, but I should think it rather a poor sort of economy.

Mr. THURMAN. Do I understand the Senator to say it is needed to complete the work?

Mr. HOWE. It is, I understand.

Mr. THURMAN. Has the Senator any objection then to inserting before the word "improvement" the words "completion of?" Then I would very cheerfully vote for the amendment.

Mr. HOWE. I have no sort of objection to that.

Mr. CONKLING. That would be a perfectly harmless amendment. Whether they be in or not, the words will not save anything.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say one word with reference to this amendment. This is principally for dredging. The idea of appropriating $8,000 for dredging and preparing and placing in this harbor all the machinery necessary to carry on dredging, seems to me to be rather an absurdity. I think $12,000 is too little, but the engineer, Major Roberts, who has charge of this work, in his revised estimates, having been telegraphed to by the Engineering Bureau to reduce the estimates two-thirds, says that $12,000 is the lowest sum he can get along with. I think we ought to adopt his view. He certainly, being on the ground, has some knowledge of this subject that we cannot have here in the Senate. Therefore, I think we had better take his view than our own, as the difference is only $4,000.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 32, nays 10; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Bogy, Caperton, Christiancy, Conkling, Cragin, Davis, Dawes, Dennis, Eaton, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Harvey, Howe, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill, Oglesby, Ransom, Robertson, Sherman, West, Windom, Withers, and Wright—32.

NAYS—Messrs. Cockrell, Cooper, McCreery, Merrimon, Norwood, Paddock, Saulsbury, Spencer, Stevenson, and Thurman—10.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Anthony, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Boutwell, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Hitchcock, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Morton, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Sharon, Wadleigh, Wallace, and Whyte—30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 56 and 57, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Menomonee, Wisconsin, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 61, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Two Rivers, Wisconsin, from $15,000 to $5,000.

Mr. HOWE. I wish the Senator in charge of the bill would state the reason for making that amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. Major Roberts, the same engineer who recommended the increase at Green Bay to $12,000, said he could get along at this place with $5,000; and we thought we should have to take his recommendation in both instances, as we had taken it in one.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was in line 69, to reduce the appropriation for the improvement of the harbor at Sandusky City, Ohio, from $30,000 to $25,000.

Mr. THURMAN. There is a very small difference between the House bill and the proposition of our committee, $5,000. I wish to say that I have a personal knowledge of the harbor at Sandusky City, and I know of no harbor that requires an appropriation much more than that harbor. It is one of the most tortuous channels that I know of on Lake Erie into the port, and my own impression is that $30,000 is a small appropriation. I do not, however, want to call any yeas or nays upon it or make any division. I should be glad if the appropriation should be left for Sandusky as the bill came from the House. It is a matter too small, however, for much contest.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have no desire to interfere with the bill merely because an appropriation in regard to my own State is proposed to be reduced; but I wish to call attention to some facts that I have discovered in this bill to show that the committee have reduced in one place and have not followed the same policy in reducing in another place. The appropriations here made for the two harbors in Ohio—there are not many of them for the State—are not near up to the estimates submitted to us at the beginning of the session. The House reduced the estimates and placed the amounts very low. A paper, which has been furnished me very kindly by the Committee on Appropriations, from which I will read, shows that they have made no reduction in some of the places, but have made it in this case. The rule ought to be applied equally. This letter is dated February 25, 1876:

UNITED STATES ENGINEER OFFICE, BUFFALO, NEW YORK.

GENERAL: After replying to the Department telegram of to-day in relation to the reduction of estimates, I found that I had misunderstood it and had only reduced the aggregate one-third instead of to one-third.

Brigadier-General A. A. HUMPHREYS,
Chief of Engineers, U. S. A., Washington, D. C.

Quite an important difference.

I have consequently sent a second telegram in which I suggest the following appropiations: Toledo, $75,000.

They have adopted that reduction.

Sandusky, $25,000.

Reducing it $5,000 below what it was in the bill as it came from the House.

Buffalo, $85,000.

The committee have not reduced Buffalo, but have increased it to $100,000.

Mr. ALLISON. We increased it $15,000 more than was recommended.

Mr. SHERMAN. So I say; but you have reduced in the case of two principal harbors in Ohio. At Sandusky City there is a reduction of $5,000, and the breakwater at Cleveland, which I have the chief interest in because I know more about it, has been reduced from $75,000 to $50,000. The engineers report in their printed estimates that a large sum ought to be appropriated at Cleveland and recommend the sum of $500,000 on the ground that that is a work of supreme importance already commenced and entered upon, being not specially for Cleveland but the whole lake, a breakwater and harbor of refuge intended for all the commerce of Lake Erie. It is not a mere protection of the harbor, but a breakwater and port of refuge for the vessels entering into Lake Erie. That work has been entered upon. It has been commenced and the engineer recommends an appropriation of $500,000 for that purpose. That would be a very large sum, and I would not ask that that large sum should be appropriated; but $75,000 is the amount fixed by the House, and it seems to me that it ought not to be reduced without a very strong reason for it. The reason that is given in this paper is no reason at all. It seems that the Chief of Engineers called upon the subordinate engineers to reduce their estimates to one-third of the amount they had previously recommended, and upon that the engineer undertakes to reduce them to one-third of the amount he had previously recommended. These reductions were based upon that idea. Here is the estimate showing that the engineer does not estimate what he thinks is necessary, but he estimates by an arbitrary rule furnished him by the Chief of Engineers and says that one-third of the given sum is so much. That is the way this reduction is made.

I think, therefore, in regard to these two appropriations, both of which are important, especially at Cleveland, that the amount ought to be left where the House put it, unless it is increased. I want to stand by the committee so far as I can; but I think in those two cases, at least in the case of the breakwater at Cleveland, they ought to leave the amount as fixed by the House.

Mr. ALLISON. I only desire to say a word in reply, and in doing so I think I ought to state to the Senate that the engineer or the Engineer Bureau was only endeavoring to carry out what was supposed to be the wish of Congress. The Engineer Bureau estimated for rivers and harbors an aggregate of $14,000,000. The House committee said to the Bureau, "you must reduce that about two-thirds." When it was supposed that the policy of Congress would be to reduce the appropriation to $5,000,000, then the Chief of Engineers sent to these various district officers and asked them to say how this money could be economically and prudently expended without reference to what they recommended for each specific case in their regular estimates. The Senator from Ohio says that in the report made by Colonel Blunt he estimates only $85,000 for Buffalo. But if the Senator will turn upon the other page of the letter he will see:

Cleveland can, I think, get along very well with the $50,000 which I estimate, the same as last year. Buffalo, which I have put at $85,000, should really have $100,000.

That seemed to be his best estimate, that he ought to have $100,000 for Buffalo, and the committee gave it to him. That was their policy, to follow out in both instances what seemed to be the estimate and opinion of the engineer in charge. In Sandusky he recommended $25,000. I know Sandusky is an important harbor and there is very little difference between $25,000 and $30,000; but it seems to me we must establish some rule with reference to these appropriations. I have no doubt twice $25,000 or twice $30,000 could be applied at Sandusky City, as I believe $150,000 might be expended at Cleveland; but that is not the question. The question is how can we bring the bill within a reasonable sum which we can afford to appropriate at this session, and in order to do that we must take the smallest sums at each one of these places.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment proposed by the committee in line 69.

The question being put, there was on a division—ayes 16, noes 22.

Mr. ALLISON. I ask for the yeas and nays. I want to get the judgment of the Senate with reference to the action of the committee.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WEST. I should like the Senator in charge of this bill to read to the Senate what the engineer in charge of that harbor says definitely in regard to the appropriation required. If I am correct, he asks $25,000 for this work, and the committee have amended the bill in accordance with that recommendation; and now the Senate proposes to put on more than our engineering authority asks for.

Mr. SHERMAN. I read the very letter to the Senate.

Mr. WEST. I ask to have it read again. What does it say?

Mr. SHERMAN. The letter is in response to a demand made by General Humphreys that the estimates should be reduced to one-third. Upon that peremptory order Colonel Blunt submits estimates based upon one-third of the amount he supposes to be necessary.

Mr. EDMUNDS. How much is the amount of business at Sandusky? What is the amount of commerce there?

Mr. SHERMAN. It is very large. I cannot state it.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What is the amount of duties collected?

Mr. SHERMAN. I cannot tell. Sandusky is not so important by far as Cleveland, the chief port of entry. I can say to the Senator that it is very large at Sandusky, because it is the terminus of two large railroads running through the State of Ohio.

Mr. ALLISON. Its tonnage is 524,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. It has 524,000 tonnage. That is a very large tonnage.

Mr. EDMUNDS. Going by water?

Mr. SHERMAN. Yes, sir; by water, on Lake Erie. An immense amount of coal comes into Sandusky for shipment to the upper lake.

Mr. EDMUNDS. What are the commodities exported, may I ask the Senator?

Mr. SHERMAN. The Senator takes me rather by surprise.

Mr. COCKRELL. Where does the Senator from Louisiana get his statement?

Mr. WEST. I will answer as soon as I have the floor. I did not know I had yielded.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will answer the question before taking my seat:

Sandusky Harbor, Ohio, is in the collection district of Sandusky, Ohio. * * * Entrances and clearances during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, 3,271. Tonnage of same, 524,941.

Mr. EDMUNDS. That is the tonnage of the vessels. What do they carry? What are the commodities that are shipped from there?

Mr. SHERMAN. The shipments there I know of are wheat, and largely coal and iron-ore.

Mr. WEST. And oil?

Mr. SHERMAN. No oil, I think. Cleveland is the great oil port; but iron-ore, and wheat and other agricultural products, corn and whisky, are shipped there, and it is also a large lumber port.

Mr. WEST. I wish to say a few words in respect to this reduction of the estimates originally made by the Engineer Corps for the improvement of rivers and harbors to be appropriated for at the present session of Congress. The total estimates of the Engineer Corps were $14,301,000. As soon as they were submitted to Congress there was a notification sent to the Engineer Corps that there was an absolute necessity for cutting down these estimates to one-third of the amount, leaving the Engineer Corps the discretion as to how the money should be applied. On the proposition of the Senator from Ohio we are cutting loose entirely from our usual reliable authority as to the amount of money required for each specific appropriation, and the Senate in voting against the amendment of the committee actually adopt the estimate of the Senator from Ohio as against the estimate of their constituted authorities. The engineer here in this letter says absolutely and positively that he can get along with $25,000 at Sandusky. Does the Senate propose to give the engineers more than they say they can do with? I think not. If you depart from that proposition now, you will do it all the way through the bill, and you will so load it down that it will break of its own weight. If Senators expect to get their appropriations passed here as recommended originally, they had better send this bill forward and not load it down, or they will have the amendments set at naught by both Houses, and we shall have to go back to the original proposition. The only safety is to stand by the recommendations of the committee.

Mr. THURMAN. I believe a part of my five minutes remains. The Senate has not set a very good example of standing by the committee so far as taking its reductions is concerned; that is to say, they have not stood by it at all.

Mr. WEST. That was not by my vote.

Mr. THURMAN. The Senator asks us to stand by the action of the committee in regard to the engineer's report, and tells us that the engineer says he can get along with $25,000. I dare say he can get along with $10,000 or with $500.

Mr. WEST. Is it not the time to get along with as little as we can?

Mr. THURMAN. Undoubtedly it is the time to get along with as little as we can; but that mere getting along does not overthrow the estimate which was sent in first, and which is far above the amount which is in the bill. This response of his to the letter to know the very least amount he could get along with, is not the estimate of the Department as to what really is needed for the improvement. That is all I have to say upon this particular amendment. When the amendment is reached in regard to Cleveland I will have something to say about it. There are some very singular provisions in this bill in respect to the harbors on Lake Erie, I must say.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The yeas and nays have been ordered on the amendment, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 18, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Conkling, Davis, Eaton, Edmunds, Harvey, Howe McCreery, Morrill, Oglesby, Robertson, Wadleigh, West, Whyte, Withers, and Wright—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Bruce, Caperton, Christiancy, Cooper, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Norwood, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, and Thurman—24.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Cragin, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Wallace, and Windom—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 73, to reduce the appropriation "for a breakwater at Cleveland Harbor, Ohio," from $75,000 to $50,000.

Mr. THURMAN. I ask, and I do it from a sense of duty, that the Senate disagree to that amendment. The Engineer Department estimated the appropriation needed for the continuance of that work at $200,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. They estimated it at $500,000 in their printed report here. They say that amount is necessary to go forward with the work.

Mr. THURMAN. The House cut it down to $75,000 and now our committee has cut it down to $50,000. I beg the Senate to remember that Cleveland is the largest city, except Chicago, on the lakes; that its commerce is equal to that of any city on the lakes; that there are large lines of internal improvement, railroads and canals, that terminate at Cleveland; and that this work, which ought to have been commenced many years ago, and which really was commenced too late, is a great and urgent public necessity. There is not a member of the House or a member of the Senate who has been at Cleveland who has paid the least attention to this subject who does not know the necessity for this improvement; and to cut down the appropriation to the poor sum of $50,000 is really to do very great injustice to that port and to those who transact their business with it. The truth of it is, I do not quite understand how this bill is framed. The House made appropriations for several ports in Ohio, not large but small, reasonable appropriations. The House, on page 16, appropriated for the harbor of Ashtabula $10,000; for the harbor of Port Clinton $5,000; for Fairport Harbor $8,000. Our committee have stricken them all out. They have reduced Sandusky $5,000 and Cleveland $25,000, and have left but one appropriation that concerns Ohio in the whole bill untouched, the appropriation for Toledo, and that is not near what it ought to be. If we are to have harbors at all, these appropriations proposed by our committee in reference to harbors in Ohio are too small. I do not understand precisely upon what principle the committee went, and so far as Cleveland is concerned I do hope the Senate will disagree to the amendment.

Mr. ALLISON. I have only one word to say in relation to this harbor. I endeavored to state a moment ago the principle upon which the committee acted. That principle was to adopt as nearly as we could the suggestion that comes from the House for economy, namely, to limit the total aggregate of this bill to a certain sum. In order to ascertain how that sum should be expended, we had to resort to the recommendations of the engineers in charge of the works. We did not resort to the method which seemed to be adopted elsewhere of parceling these appropriations out in some respect as to States, at least, but we followed the directions of the engineers. Cleveland is an important place. I agree with the Senator from Ohio with reference to this harbor at Cleveland; they have a very large commerce there. We have made appropriations for Cleveland Harbor ever since 1827. Last year we made the first of a series of appropriations for a new harbor virtually at Cleveland, a harbor which is to cost when completed $1,800,000. We began that harbor last year with an appropriation of $50,000. The engineers say, and very properly, that they can use $500,000 or $200,000 in the completion of that harbor. Certainly they can. They recommend that the harbor shall be completed in three years, and in order to do that they must expend large sums each year. That is true. If we had the $14,000,000 to appropriate, estimated for by the Engineering Bureau, we could give Cleveland $200,000 as the estimate provides for in our Book of Estimates.

Mr. THURMAN. But you cut it down more than two-thirds.

Mr. ALLISON. Why?

Mr. THURMAN. You cut it down three-fourths.

Mr. ALLISON. We cut it down because the engineer says $50,000 there will do. If we should make a sliding scale cutting below the knee and going up on all these appropriations we could come up to this method; but we do not do that. We follow the Engineering Bureau, and therefore we have fixed $50,000. We do not seem to have had much success with our amendments. I leave it to the judgment of the Senate.

Mr. WEST. As a member of the committee, I wish to say merely one word in support of the amendment. After the estimates from the various Executive Departments were submitted, upon the sounding call for economy and reform that we have heard, those estimates were curtailed materially, and the principle of economy is going into effect on all propositions from other Departments except in the direction of improvement for rivers and harbors. I merely, before the vote is taken on this question, desire to lay officially before the Senate the report of the engineer in charge of this work, who says that with $50,000 he can meet all the requirements of commerce the present year at that harbor:

Cleveland can, I think, get along very well with the $50,000 which I estimate, the same as last year.

What other authority is to be our guide except the officers who are making these improvements? Here we have the official notification that $50,000 is all that they ask, and yet it is proposed to give them $75,000. If that is in accordance with the doctrine of economy and reform, I must confess I do not understand it.

Mr. THURMAN. What engineer has said what the Senator has just read?

Mr. WEST. C. E. Blunt, lieutenant-colonel of engineers, in a letter dated "United States Engineer Office, Buffalo, New York, February 25, 1876," addresed to Brigadier-General Humphreys:

Cleveland can, I think, get along very well with the $50,000 which I estimate, the same as last year.

Mr. THURMAN. Then what did they mean by estimating for $200,000?

Mr. SHERMAN. They estimated for $500,000.

Mr. WEST. I have explained that over and over again. They asked for $14,000,000, and we propose to give them but five million and a half. Here is an instance in which you propose to give them more than they ask absolutely. I do not understand the logic of such a proposition.

Mr. SHERMAN. I have here a printed report signed "C. E. Blunt lieutentant-colonel of engineers," who, I think, is the same officer who wrote the letter from which the Senator has just read. It is a statement submitted to us, giving the details of the commerce of Cleveland and describing the work that is going on there, the nature of the work, and the importance of it. The terms are as strong as it is possible for human language to express. I find among other items that he states that the commerce of Cleveland to be 1,978,115 tonnage. He also says:

Amount required for completion of project, $1,750,000.
Amount that can be profitably expended during the next fiscal year, $500,000.

This is signed by this same Colonel Blunt. I hope Senators will remember these facts which have been submitted to us. From the annual estimates referred to by my colleague it appears that they found that $500,000 was a larger sum than it was necessary for them to call for, but they said that amount might be profitably expended and urged the necessity of appropriating one-third of the whole amount. However, General Humphreys, in submitting the annual estimate to Congress, submitted the amount as necessary to be appropriated for this Cleveland project at $200,000, thus reducing Colonel Blunt's proposition to $200,000. But as the House of Representatives called on General Humphreys to reduce the aggregate from $15,000,000 down to $5,000,000 or $6,000,000, or to about one-third, then Colonel Blunt being called on by General Humphreys to reduce his estimates sends in these sums, and he puts it at even less than one-third of the amount that had been estimated by General Humphreys, and one-tenth of the amount that he said ought to be expended at this harbor. Senators say that the report of Colonel Blunt has recommended only the appropriation of $50,000. Colonel Blunt says they can get along with $50,000, and so they would rather have $50,000 than nothing at all. For my part I am perfectly willing to lay this bill on the table as a matter of public policy, if we are in such a condition of affairs that the House of Representatives think they can resort to revolutionary expedients in order to promote economy. If that is the case let us lay this bill on the table at once. I would not hesitate in doing it, because we can suspend all the operations and can get along without any of this money if it is a matter of necessity to do so; but we are now acting upon the idea that we are to appropriate what is necessary for the Cleveland Harbor, taking a reasonable view of it, and we are justified in doing that. There is nothing in the condition of our country or the state of its finances that should make us do anything in an extraordinary way. We ought not to appropriate much money. We ought to make our appropriations as low as possible.

Mr. WEST. Except simply for Sandusky!

Mr. SHERMAN. I am willing to have an equal rule of reduction; but the Senate will not apply evenly the rule of appropriating one-third of the estimates first made. The board of engineers estimated $200,000. One-third of $200,000 is not $50,000. You reduce the amount more than by the rule which you apply to other cases.

Mr. WEST. There is no necessity for it when the engineer says he can get along with $50,000.

Mr. SHERMAN. The engineer simply says he can get along with $50,000. He said in regard to Buffalo that he could get along with $85,000, but you have given him $100,000 there; and you have given appropriations in many instances more than they stated they could get along with.

Mr. WEST. "Get along very well" is the engineer's expression.

Mr. SHERMAN. So they can by not doing anything. We must be reasonable in regard to these matters. I know it is unpleasant for the Committee on Appropriations to have their bills differed with by the Senate, but they must take things as they come. I believe this Cleveland Harbor, or port of refuge as it is called, or breakwater, is the most important work on the northern lakes, not for Cleveland, because so far as Cleveland is concerned they have their harbor and are getting along very well.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator's time has expired.

Mr. SHERMAN. I will end. I hope this amount will be left as it was in the bill as it came from the House.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Boutwell, Cockrell, Conkling, Dawes, Eaton, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, McCreery, McMillan, Morrill, Oglesby, Robertson, Wallace, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bogy, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Conover, Cooper, Davis, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Mitchell, Norwood, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, and Thurman—26.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Bruce, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cragin, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Merrimon, Morton, Paddock, Patterson, Randolph, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, and Wadleigh—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

MILITARY POSTS ON THE YELLOWSTONE AND MUSCLESHELL RIVERS.

Mr. WINDOM. I ask the Senator from Iowa to yield to me that I may call up a bill on the President's table, to which I think there will be no objection.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well.

The bill (H. R. No. 2118) to provide for the construction of military posts on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers was read twice by its title.

Mr. WINDOM. I am instructed by the Committee on Appropriations to recommend the passage of the bill. It has not been referred to the committee, but the committee has examined it, and I have in my hand three brief letters from the War Department which I will ask to have read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to take up the bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The preamble recites that Lieutenant-General Philip H. Sheridan and Brigadier-General Alfred H. Terry have, in their reports to the Secretary of War for the year 1875, set forth the great importance and immediate necessity of the construction of military posts at certain points on the Yellowstone and Muscleshell Rivers, in the Territory of Montana, and in the Military Department of Dakota, and such recommendations have been transmitted to Congress with the approval of the Secretary of War.

The bill appropriates the sum of $200,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for the construction of such military posts or depots at such points as may be selected by the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment.

Mr. WINDOM. Unless it be desired, I will not ask to have the letters read. I suppose every Senator understands the purpose of the bill.

Mr. SHERMAN. Let the letters be printed in the RECORD.

Several SENATORS. Let us hear the letters read.

The Secretary read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington City, July 13, 1876.

SIR: I have the honor to invite your attention to the inclosed copies of telegrams, dated the 7th and 12th instant, from Lieutenant-General Sheridan, asking an appropriation of $200,000, for the establishment of two military posts on the Yellowstone.

Concurring in the views of General Sheridan, I have respectfully to request that House bill No. 2118, which passed the House yesterday, be reported to the Senate, with the favorable recommendation of your committee, at the earliest practicable date.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. D. CAMERON,
Secretary of War.

[Telegram.]

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS, July 12, 1876.

To General W. T. SHERMAN, Washington, D. C.:

Do not neglect to urge the appropriation for the two posts on the Yellowstone—one at or about the mouth of Tongue River, the other in the Big Horn Valley. Our summer's work with all its hardships and losses may be of no avail if these posts are not established. If we could only get one, namely, that at or about the mouth of Tongue River, it would be of incalculable value.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

Extract copy telegram dated

PHILADELPHIA, PENNSYLVANIA, July 7, 1876.

To General W. T. SHERMAN, Washington, D. C.:

Your dispatch received. I think it premature to think of asking for volunteer cavalry, with the attendant expense. * * *

If Congress will give the $.00,000 which I have asked for for the past two years for the establishing of the posts at Tongue River and the mouth of the Big Horn, it will be in the interest of economy and will settle the Sioux question.

P. H. SHERIDAN,
Lieutenant-General.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. G. M. ADAMS, its Clerk, announced that the House further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 3478) making appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1877, and for other purposes, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL J. RANDALL of Pennsylvania, Mr. WILLIAM A. J. SPARKS of Illinois, and Mr. STEPHEN A. HURLBUT of Illinois, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House insisted an its amendments to the bill (S. No. 332) to amend the act entitled "An act to amend and supplement an act entitled 'An act to establish a uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States, approved March 2, 1857,' and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1874, agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. WILLIAM P. LYNDE of Wisconsin, Mr. SCOTT LORD of New York, and Mr. WILLIAM P. FRYE of Maine, managers at the conference on its part.

The message also announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin.

RIVER AND HARBOR BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 3022) making appropriations for the construction, repair, preservation, and completion of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 76, 77, and 78, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at New Haven, Connecticut, by constructing a breakwater, $10,000.

Mr. EATON. I desire to inquire of the Senator in charge of the bill—I do not ask any favors for my State but such as are entirely proper and just—why this $10,000 is cut out? I want to be treated as others are.

Mr. ALLISON. I will say to the Senator from Connecticut that this breakwater has been estimated for by the Bureau of Engineers at a cost I think of a million dollars.

Mr. EATON. Four hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. ALLISON. It is a very large sum at any rate. Perhaps the Senator is right as a matter of fact. Ten thousand dollars would go but a very short distance in building the breakwater, and therefore the committee thought they would omit it entirely this year, and let the breakwater be commenced next year. I may say in addition that we gathered from the Engineer Office that the improvement at Saybrook Bar was a very important work and very necessary to the commerce of the entire Connecticut River, and therefore we increased the appropriation from $20,000 to $50,000 in the next item.

Mr. EATON. The work on the breakwater has not been commenced, the Senator says.

Mr. ALLISON. Yes.

Mr. EATON. I think the estimate is less than $400,000.

Mr. ALLISON. The engineer says:

For the most economical construction of the breakwater a period of four years would be required, and should Congress see fit to direct the construction of the breakwater, the sum of $150,000 could be profitably expended during the next fiscal year.

The committee thought it was hardly worth while to commence on $10,000 so great an undertaking as the construction of a breakwater.

Mr. EATON. I am very much inclined to think that the committee are entirely right, although the item is for my State, and I feel an especial interest in public works in my own State as well as other States. I think it is a bad time to commence new works. There is one work in my State that was in process of construction, a very important work, upon which $25,000 was expended, and by some neglect, perhaps owing to the death of Mr. Starkweather, it has failed to be included in this bill. I shall at the proper time move an amendment that a certain amount of money be appropriated for that work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment to strike out lines 76, 77, and 78.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was in line 80, after "Hartford," to insert "including Saybrook Bar," and to strike out "$20,000" and insert "$50,000;" so as to make the clause read:

For the improvement of Connecticut River below Hartford, including Saybrook Bar, Connecticut, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 82 and 83, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Milford, Connecticut, $5,000.

Mr. EATON. I want to ask the Senator in charge of the bill, because I wish to be satisfied of the reasonableness of this action of the committee, the reason why this item is struck out. It has been supposed to be necessary in years past to make appropriations for this harbor. Why is it not necessary now?

Mr. ALLISON. I believe at this harbor they have adopted a system of small jetties for the improvement of the harbor, and the Engineer Department recommends a small breakwater here at a cost of $55,000. The same argument applies to a breakwater costing $55,000 that applied to the breakwater at New Haven. We thought $5,000 too small a sum. It might be that $5,000 could be used for some other purpose.

Mr. EATON. Is the honorable Senator certain that there is such a recommendation?

Mr. ALLISON. I have before me the report:

The general interests of commerce require frequent harbors of refuge along Long Island Sound, and, as one such, Milford Harbor possesses many natural advantages; it is so nearly land-locked that a breakwater of moderate dimensions would cover a large anchorage-ground for the class of coasting-vessels which constitute the principal shipping in the sound; it has good holding-ground, and lies near the channel most frequented by such vessels.

Then he goes on to estimate $55,000 for this purpose, and that is the only estimate.

Mr. MORRILL. Mr. President, I noticed the Senator from Connecticut did not ask the Senator in charge of the bill the reason of the increase on line 80, where the sum proposed by the committee is $30,000 more than was proposed by the House. The Senator from Connecticut did not seem to have his attention attracted to that amendment.

Mr. EATON. The Senator from Vermont will favor us I suppose with his views of the matter. He did not hear what the Senator from Iowa said as to the reason for that amendment. It was that very much more money ought to be expended upon the mouth of the Connecticut River, and nobody knows better than my honorable friend from Vermont the great importance of the commerce of that river. It was sufficiently explained to me, and I took the $30,000 from the committee and the Senate very kindly passed it, just as I did not ask the striking out of this $10,000.

Mr. FERRY. I have noticed that the Senator from Connecticut has been very logical on all these amendments. He has sustained the committee, and necessarily he should sustain this amendment. I had the pleasure of voting with him for the increase in line 80, because my theory is that money thus expended is well expended; and whenever a Senator gives good reasons why an appropriation should be made for a locality, I feel in duty bound to stand by him. I thought I could not resist the opportunity of suggesting to the Senator that he is really logical in sustaining the committee.

Mr. DAWES. I am constrained to make an inquiry of the committee why these words "below Hartford" are in this appropriation?

Mr. EATON. That has passed.

Mr. DAWES. I was inquiring of the committee. For several years there was an appropriation made for the Connecticut River. I supposed, because I got it into the bill, that it was going to be expended between Hartford and Springfield, but somehow or other our Connecticut friends were always too smart for me, and have got it expended down below Hartford. Now, I see they have taken care to put these words "below Hartford" into the bill, so that I shall be relieved from all trouble or effort in getting any portion of this expenditure above Hartford. There is a portion of the river above Hartford and below Springfield that is capable of great improvement; but I never could get a dollar expended on it, although $40,000 was appropriated for that purpose one year, and $20,000 another. It all floated off down below Hartford, and I congratulate my friend from Connecticut on these words in this paragraph. I observed them as soon as my eye fell on the bill.

Mr. ALLISON. These words were found in the bill as it came from the House.

Mr. DAWES. Yes, sir.

Mr. EATON. What is the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment to strike out the lines 82 and 83, as to Milford Harbor.

Mr. EATON. My honorable friend from Massachusetts was speaking about the Connecticut River above Hartford and this amendment is as to the harbor of Milford.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 84 and 85, in the following words:

For the improvement of the Housatonic River, Connecticut, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was to strike out lines 88 and 89, in the following words:

For the improvement of Taunton River, Massachusetts, $5,000.

Mr. DAWES. I have been sustaining the committee all along as far as I could conscientiously, but I am inclined to believe that the committee have proposed four or five amendments here all in succession striking out items on the Atlantic coast for the want of information in respect to the condition of the improvements there and in respect to the importance of the improvements. I think if they understood them, carrying out their own principle they would not have applied it to these cases. Take this at Taunton River. Taunton River is a very short river and is substantially a harbor of the coast, but in order to make it of the slightest value the river has to be deepened a few miles up to the wharf. It was estimated that it would cost $10,000 to complete that improvement so as to make it of the slightest value. Five thousand dollars was expended last year, so expended as to deepen it up half way. Five thousand dollars more will complete the improvement up to the wharf, so that that which was done last year will be of some avail. Without the expenditure of the $5,000 additional, that will be of no avail. There is a large commerce entering Taunton River, coal from New York and Philadelphia, and a large amount of commerce for that section of the country. There has been a good deal of shipping built with reference to this improvement. All of it will fail and be of no use unless this $5,000, which will complete the work, is appropriated now. I think, therefore, that it is a departure from the principles established by the committee, and there is something like that to be said about the other items which I will say when they are reached.

I agree with the committee that it is useless to make a small appropriation that will not complete the work but will leave it incomplete and in a condition not to be of any practical use; but where it can be completed, if it is of importance enough to begin, I think it is of importance enough to finish. These items are for the Atlantic coast. I think if all the items for the Atlantic coast were gathered together on one page, it would be a pretty bad page, as bad as Michigan. I appeal to the Senator from Iowa if he is not conscious of having made a mistake here.

Mr. ALLISON. In reply to the Senator from Massachusetts I would say that we received from the proper Department a telegram from General Warren, upon a request for a reply with reference to these reductions, and General Warren stated that if he was reduced to one-third, all should be left out except Block Island and Saybrook Bar. I mention Block Island for the benefit of my friend from Rhode Island. The committee adopted the suggestion of General Warren, that, if ruled down to one-third, these two projects, one at Block Island and one at Saybrook Bar, were so important that all the others could be left out.

In reference to the Taunton River, I know that the engineer's estimates are that $5,000 will complete it.

Mr. DAWES. If $5,000 will complete the work, it is hardly worth while to withhold it, for it is an important work.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment striking out the item in lines 88 and 89.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 23, noes 11; no quorum voting.

Mr. DAWES. I call for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire if there has been before this an appropriation upon the pretension that that appropriation would complete the work? So many appropriations are made with that pretension, that that particular appropriation will complete the work, that I make the inquiry in this case.

Mr. DAWES. I never heard so in this case. The whole estimate, as I understand it, was that it would take $10,000 to do the whole work. Five thousand dollars of that, with that understanding, was appropriated last year, and $5,000 was proposed for the completion of it this year—$10,000 in all. It never has been eked out by any pretense of the kind suggested.

Mr. PADDOCK. No lingering, long-drawn-out appropriation for completion?

Mr. DAWES. No; there is not any "linked sweetness" about it. I should like to have the vote taken over again on this amendment. I do not want the yeas and nays unless they are necessary. I think if the Senate really understand the matter they will not refuse this $5,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will submit the question again on this amendment.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think we had better have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Booth, Cockrell, Conkling, Davis, Eaton, Hitchcock, Howe, Kernan, McCreery, McDonald, Morrill, Norwood, Oglesby, Robertson, Wallace, West, Whyte, Windom, Withers, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Bruce, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Key, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Patterson, Ransom, Spencer, and Stevenson—23.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Clayton, Conover, Dorsey, Edmunds, Goldthwaite, Gordon, Harvey, Johnston, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, Morton, Paddock, Randolph, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, and Wadleigh—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. EATON. I desire to give notice that I shall ask the reconsideration of the vote of the Senate on the amendment in lines 82 and 83 and also in lines 84 and 85. I will not ask for a reconsideration of the vote striking out the item for the improvement of the harbor at New Haven, because that is a new work, but these two items are old works, and if it be necessary that the improvement at Taunton River should go on they ought to be continued also.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest that the Senator can accomplish his purpose when the bill is reported to the Senate.

Mr. EATON. I propose to give notice now.

Mr. MORRILL. The Senator from Connecticut can hardly move a reconsideration unless he voted with the majority.

Mr. EATON. I did vote with the majority.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The next amendment will be reported.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 90 and 91, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at Fall River, Massachusetts, $10,000.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I wish to say to the Senate generally that this bill contains for the Atlantic coast of Massachusetts, I believe, $105,000, $50,000 for the completion of a work in the harbor of Boston, and six other small appropriations, one of which has been passed upon, and all of them relate to works that are important, that have been undertaken. I believe in no case has the amount expended or the amount called for been in excess of the original estimate.

As regards this particular amendment for Fall River, the original estimate was $45,000. Twenty-five thousand dollars have been expended, and the probability is, from the reports of the engineers, that the work will be completed not only for the original sum, but for an amount somewhat less than the original sum estimated. Fall River is the largest manufacturing city in this country. It obtains large supplies from other portions of the country for the support of its large manufacturing population.

The same is true of another appropriation for the Merrimac River, through which supplies are furnished not only for Newburyport at the mouth of it, but for Haverhill and Lawrence and Lowell and Nashua, all of which are great manufacturing cities lying upon that river.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to inquire of the Senator from Massachusetts if there was a year before this a small appropriation, or is there have been preceding this an appropriation for the same purpose?

Mr. BOUTWELL. I suppose the Senator from Nebraska means to ask whether any of these are new works.

Mr. PADDOCK. Yes, sir.

Mr. BOUTWELL. They are not. They are works undertaken and in progress, and I believe two or three of them will be completed by the appropriation that is now asked for; but at any rate none of the works are likely to cost more than the estimate. I hope, therefore, the Senate will, without my troubling them with remarks on the four appropriations that are now immediately before us, agree to sustain the original bill.

Mr. ALLISON. I should like to say one word with reference to this Fall River appropriation. The three harbors, Taunton, Fall River, and New Bedford, were all struck out on the recommendation of General Warren that the money assigned to him by the Chief of Engineers should be used on Block Island and Saybrook Bar. All these works have been appropriated for heretofore. I think these two yet undisposed of can very well remain over until next year, although the money, as stated by the Senator from Massachusetts, can be properly expended. There is no question about that fact at these two harbors. It is a mere question for the judgment of the Senate whether or not this bill shall be kept down within reasonable bounds, and only such appropriations made as are absolutely essential, or whether we shall enlarge it beyond the limit proposed by the committee.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 92 and 93, in the following words:

For the improvement of the harbor at New Bedford, Massachusetts, $10,000.

Mr. PADDOCK. I should like to hear some explanation of that.

Mr. DAWES. New Bedford is one of the most important harbors on the Atlantic coast. The tonnage at New Bedford is among the largest on the Atlantic coast, excepting, of course, New York. It has had this improvement in its harbor estimated for to cost $25,000, of which $10,000 was expended last year. Owing to the reduction of the cost of materials, it is now estimated that $10,000, instead of $15,000, will complete that work. The work itself until completed is of no use. It is an important improvement to one of the most important harbors upon the Atlantic coast, and it is precisely like the first one which I have spoken of. There has been just that much expended last year upon a general estimate of $25,000. The re-estimate this year is that $10,000, instead of $15,000, will complete what it was supposed would cost $25,000.

Mr. ALLISON. At this harbor of New Bedford they seek to secure sixteen feet of water. The appropriation last year was used for dredging. The material is hard mud, so called by the engineers. Of course $10,000 or $15,000 more would probably secure sixteen feet of water at low tide, and the result of not having this improvement completed is that occasionally when vessels reach this harbor at low tide they are obliged to wait until high tide to float; that is, if they draw more than sixteen feet of water. The committee thought this work might, among others of a similar character, lie over until next year.

Mr. DAWES. Here is one of the most important harbors upon the Atlantic coast in the condition that the Senator from Iowa states, that can be completed and made one of the best harbors in the world, where all the whaling-vessels of the world have in times past gone in to discharge their cargoes from all the Frozen Ocean after years of adventurous voyages. More wealth has been brought into that harbor through the adventures and the dangers and the perils of the whalemen of Massachusetts for the benefit of the commerce of the country than into any other harbor on the Atlantic coast, excepting New York. And yet $10,000 to complete that the Senator from Iowa begs the Senate to withhold. I trust they will not do so.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 10, noes 19; no quorum voting.

Mr. ALLISON. Let us have the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 14, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Conkling, Eaton, Edmunds, Harvey, Hitchcock, Howe, Kernan, McCreery, Oglesby, Wallace, West, Whyte, and Windom—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bogy, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Hamlin, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Key, Maxey, Mitchell, Morrill, Norwood, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Spencer, and Stevenson—29.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cockrell, Conover, Davis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, McMillan, Merrimon, Morton, Randolph, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Withers, and Wright—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 94 and 95, in the following words:

For the improvement of Merrimac River, Massachusetts, $10,000.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 15, noes 21; no quorum voting.

Mr. EDMUNDS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allison, Conkling, Eaton, Edmunds, Hamlin, Hitchcock, Howe, Kernan, McCreery, Morrill, Oglesby, Saulsbury, Wallace, West, and Whyte—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Anthony, Bayard, Bogy, Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Caperton, Christiancy, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Dennis, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Gordon, Hamilton, Harvey, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Key, McMillan, Maxey, Merrimon, Mitchell, Paddock, Patterson, Ransom, Spencer, and Stevenson—30.

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cockrell, Davis, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Jones of Nevada, Kelly, Logan, McDonald, Morton, Norwood, Randolph, Robertson, Sargent, Sharon, Sherman, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, Withers, and Wright—27.

So the amendment was rejected.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was to strike out lines 96 and 97, in the following words:

For the improvement of the entrance of Salem Harbor, Massachusetts, $10,000.

Mr. ALLISON. I think I will make one more effort to have an amendment adopted. I believe the committee has not been sustained to any great extent yet. The engineers say that this appropriation is unnecessary practically; but I suppose that makes no difference. The engineer in charge of this work, who is a Mr. Thom, says:

Under the appropriation of March 3, 1873, this channel was opened for a width of about one hundred feet, and under that of June 23, 1874, it has been completed to the projected width of three hundred feet. To complete the sea-wall and breakwater, which are comparatively unimportant works, will require an additional appropriation of $23,000.

Here is a harbor that is actually completed, but there is some little unimportant work that might be continued at an expense of $25,000. Ten thousand dollars of it is appropriated in this bill.

Mr. BOUTWELL. I think upon the statement made, which is supported I see by the report of the engineers, we shall all concur in the report of the committee.

Mr. ALLISON. I am glad to have one amendment concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. INGALLS. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. SHERMAN. I should like to make a conference report.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion to adjourn.

The question being put, there were on a division—ayes 24, noes 20.

Mr. WITHERS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Boutwell, Bruce, Cameron of Wisconsin, Christiancy, Conkling, Conover, Cooper, Cragin, Dawes, Edmunds, Ferry, Frelinghuysen, Hamilton, Harvey, Hitchcock, Ingalls, Jones of Florida, Jones of Nevada, McCreery, McMillan, Mitchell, Norwood, Patterson, Ransom, Sherman, Spencer, Stevenson, and West—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allison, Anthony, Bogy, Caperton, Davis, Dennis, Eaton, Gordon, Hamlin, Howe, Kernan, Key, McDonald, Maxey, Merrimon, Oglesby, Paddock, Wallace, Whyte, and Withers—20

ABSENT—Messrs. Alcorn, Barnum, Bayard, Booth, Burnside, Cameron of Pennsylvania, Clayton, Cockrell, Dorsey, Goldthwaite, Johnston, Kelly, Logan, Morrill, Morton, Randolph, Robertson, Sargent, Saulsbury, Sharon, Thurman, Wadleigh, Windom, and Wright—24.

So the motion was agreed to; and (at five o'clock p. m.) the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, July 13, 1876.

The House met at twelve o'clock m. Prayer by Rabbi Dr. M. LILIENTHAL, of Cincinnati, Ohio.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. SYMPSON, one of their clerks, informed the House that the Senate was ready to proceed upon the impeachment of William W. Belknap and to receive the managers on the part of the House, and that the Senate Chamber was prepared with accommodations for the reception of the House of Representatives.

POST-OFFICE BIDS.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I move, by unanimous consent, that the House take from the Speaker's table the bill (H. R. No. 2684) to amend sections 246 and 251 of the act entitled "An act to revise and consolidate and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department," approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of the act entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes," approved June 23, 1874, and for other purposes, which has been returned from the Senate with amendments, in order that they may be concurred in.

There was no objection, and the amendments of the Senate were read.

The first amendment was to strike out the following words, from line 3 to line 11: "246 and 251 of the act entitled 'An act to revise, consolidate, and amend the statutes relating to the Post-Office Department,' approved June 8, 1872, as amended by the twelfth section of the act entitled 'An act making appropriations for the service of the Post-Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1875, and for other purposes,' approved June 23, 1874," and to insert in lieu thereof "3946 and 3951 of the Revised Statutes;" so as to read:

That sections 3946 and 3951 of the Revised Statutes be amended to read as follows.

The second amendment was in line 14, to strike out after the word "section" the words "246" and insert "3946."

The third amendment was in line 33, to change "section 251" to "section 3951."

The fourth amendment was in line 39, after the word "bidder," to insert the words "or bidders, in the order of their bids;" and in line 42, after the word "bid," to insert "or bids;" and in the same line, after the word "high," to insert "and in case each of said bids shall be considered too high, then the Postmaster-General shall be authorized to enter into contract, at a price less than that named in said bids, with any person, whether a bidder or not, who will enter into contract to perform the service in accordance with the terms and provisions prescribed for the execution of other contracts for similar service; and in case no satisfactory contract can be thus obtained, he shall re-advertise such route;" and in line 51, to strike out the words "in which case he shall re-advertise such service;" so as to read:

SEC. 3951. That after any regular bidder whose bid has been accepted shall fail to enter into contract for the transportation of the mails according to his proposal, or having entered into contract, shall fail to commence the performance of the service stipulated in his or their contract as therein provided, the Postmaster-General shall proceed to contract with the next lowest bidder or bidders, in the order of their bids, for the same service, who will enter into a contract for the performance thereof, unless the Postmaster-General shall consider such bid or bids too high, and in case each of said bids shall be considered too high, then the Postmaster-General shall be authorized to enter into contract, at a price less than that named in said bids, with any person, whether a bidder or not, who will enter into contract to perform the service in accordance with the terms and provisions prescribed for the execution of other contracts for similar service; and in case no satisfactory contract can be thus obtained, he shall re-advertise such route.

Amend the title so as to read:

An act to amend sections 3946, 3951, and 3954 of the Revised Statutes.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I move the amendments of the Senate be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

VETO POWER IN ARIZONA TERRITORY.

Mr. PATTERSON, by unanimous consent, from the Committee on the Territories, reported back the bill (H. R. No. 1970) relating to the approval of bills in the Territory of Arizona, with amendments by the Senate, and with the recommendation that the Senate amendments be concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate were read, as follows:

In line 15, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "ten."
In line 18, strike out the word "three" and insert the word "ten."
At the end of the bill insert:
And provided further, That acts so becoming laws as aforesaid shall have the same force and effect, and no other, as other laws passed by the Legislature of said Territory.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. FORT moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate were concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PAY OF COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. FORT, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Real-Estate Pool and Jay Cooke Indebtedness be, and they are hereby, allowed to retain the services of a clerk from the expiration of the last term of said clerk to the 15th day of July, 1876, with compensation of $4 per day.

Mr. FORT also, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Accounts, reported the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Expenditures in the State Department be, and they are hereby, allowed to retain the services of a clerk for thirty days, from the 16th of June to the 16th of July, at a compensation of $4 per day.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. MACKEY, of Pennsylvania. I offer the following resolution for reference to the Committee on Appropriations:

Resolved by the House of Representatives, (the Senate concurring.) That the Speaker of the House of Representatives and the President of the Senate be, and they are hereby, directed to adjourn their respective Houses sine die on the 25th July, 1876, at twelve o'clock meridian.

Mr. SPRINGER. I object.

Mr. PAGE. If in order, I move to amend by inserting "the 20th" instead of "the 25th of July."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The resolution can only be referred at this time by unanimous consent.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I would like to inquire if that is not a privileged question?

Mr. SPRINGER. I have no objection to the reference of the resolution. Let it be referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That is what the gentleman from Pennsylvania asks.

Mr. GARFIELD. The resolution ought to go to the Committee of Ways and Means. That has always been the custom with such resolutions.

Mr. SPRINGER. I understand that the usage has been that resolutions of this kind have gone to the Committee of Ways and Means. I agree to its going to that committee.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MACKEY] object to the change of reference?

Mr. GARFIELD. I hope the gentleman will not object to that. If he does, I move that it be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. COCHRANE. I call for a division on that question.

The question being taken, there were ayes 101, noes not counted.

So Mr. GARFIELD's motion was agreed to; and the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. GARFIELD moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION—BUTTS VS. MACKEY.

Mr. THOMPSON. I rise to present a report from the Committee of Elections. I ask that the resolution may be read, and that the report and resolution be printed and lie on the table.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.
The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That neither C. W. Butts nor E. W. M. Mackey was lawfully elected to the Forty-fourth Congress from the second congressional district of South Carolina, nor is either of them entitled to a seat in said Congress.

Mr. PAGE. I ask that the resolution may be again read.
The resolution was again read.
The motion of Mr. THOMPSON was agreed to; and the report and accompanying resolution were ordered to be printed and to lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. SAMPSON. I rise to a privileged question.
Mr PAYNE. I rise to present the report of a committee of conference.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] rises to present the report of a committee of conference, which is of higher privilege than the question to which the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. SAMPSON] rises.

SILVER COIN.

Mr. PAYNE. I present the following report:
The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the joint resolution (H. R. No. 109) for the issue of silver coin having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, and agree thereto amended, as follows:

In line 4 st ike out the word "now" and insert "at any time."

And the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the second amendment of the Senate to said joint resolution, and agree to a substitute for said House amendment, as follows:

Add to the second amendment of the Senate the following:

SEC. 3. That in addition to the amount of subsidiary silver coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints and issue through the Treasury and its several offices such coin to an amount that, including the amount of subsidiary silver coin and of fractional currency outstanding, shall in the aggregate not exceed at any time $50,000,000.

SEC. 4. That the silver bullion required for the purposes of this act shall be purchased, from time to time, at market rate, by the Secretary of the Treasury, with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue, as herein provided, without loss to the Treasury; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury, as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $200,000.

And the House agree to the same.

H. B. PAYNE,
SAML. J. RANDALL,
Managers on the part of the House.
JOHN SHERMAN,
GEO. S. BOUTWELL,
LOUIS V. BOGY,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I presume that the House understands the questions that are involved in this report.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I am opposed to this report, and I merely want information as to the action that will be taken in regard to it.

Mr. PAYNE. The gentleman from Indiana asks me not to move the previous question, so as to enable him to move that the House non-concur in the report. If I understand it the question will be on concurring, and a failure to concur would be a non-concurrence. A motion, therefore, to non-concur is unnecessary.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The result in either case will be the same.

Mr. PAYNE. It will be remembered by the House that the first resolution upon this subject passed by the House was one simply for the distribution of the silver coin that had accumulated in the Treasury in anticipation of the ingathering of the fractional notes, for which, under law, silver coin was alone exchangeable.

That resolution went to the Senate, having in it the word "now." That appeared to confine the application of it to so much subsidiary silver coin as was at that time in the Treasury. The Senate amended that by striking out the word "now." That was the first amendment.

It will also be remembered that in the mean time, on the recommendation of the Committee on Banking and Currency, the House had passed what is known as the Randall bill, a bill which provided that an additional amount of subsidiary silver coin should be manufactured at the mints—I mean in addition to what the previous law authorized, which was limited by the amount of fractional currency outstanding—to the amount of $20,000,000, and providing a bullion capital, so to term it, of $1,000,000, the use of which was supposed to be necessary in order to carry out this additional coinage.

There was a third section to that bill which provided that the "trade-dollar," so called, which under the present law is a legal tender to the amount of $5, should be deprived of its legal-tender quality. That was the third section of what is known as the Randall bill.

The Senate amended this specie-distribution resolution by adding a section to this clause in regard to the "trade-dollar" depriving it of its legal-tender quality, and then the original resolution was so returned to the House with those two amendments, the first striking out the word "now" and the second adding to it a clause depriving the "trade-dollar" of its legal-tender qualities. To the first amendment the House non-concurred; that is, as to striking out the word "now." In the second amendment they concurred, but adding an additional amendment which embraced the two first sections of the Randall bill, namely, providing for the issue of $20,000,000 additional subsidiary silver coin and providing a capital of $1,000,000 to carry it out.

In addition to that there was added to it as a proviso the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] I have the words before me and will read them:

And provided further, That the Secretary of the Treasury is directed to authorize the coinage of a standard silver dollar of the same weight and fineness as that in use January 1, 1861, and that said dollar shall be a legal tender in payment of all debts public or private.

To that amendment the Senate disagreed, and hence the committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes.

The committee have agreed with reference to the first amendment striking out the word "now," and in order to remove all ambiguity of expression they have agreed to substitute for the word "now" the words "at any time," so that the resolution will simply and distinctly provide that to the extent of $10,000,000 the subsidiary silver coin in the Treasury at any time hereafter may be distributed throughout the country on the security of an equal amount of legal-tenders, but these legal-tender notes are to be held in the Treasury until the fractional currency coming into the Treasury shall equal the amount of the subsidiary coin issued. To that I apprehend there can be no objection on the part of the House. As to the second proposition, so much of it as embraces the two sections of what is called the Randall bill, the committee of conference have agreed to a substitute substantially confirming what the House desired in regard to that bill. The committee, however, instead of providing that this increased issue may be $20,000,000, thought it would be better to provide that the amount of fractional currency outstanding, including both paper and subsidiary silver coin, should at no time exceed fifty millions, it being believed that is the limit to which the necessity or wants of the country will reach for the next one, two, or three years. They also reduce the amount of bullion capital, so called, from one million to two hundred thousand dollars, and that provision it is believed should be satisfactory both to the House and to the Senate. It is satisfactory to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. RANDALL,] who introduced the bill.

The House may understand the precise change made in the two respects to which I have alluded, by the substitution of $50,000,000 in place of $20,000,000 as the highest limit of this additional coinage, and the reduction from $1,000,000 to $200,000 of the "bullion capital," so called, I will ask the Clerk to read again the substitute for the House amendment to the second amendment of the Senate.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add to said second amendment of the Senate the following:

SEC. 3. That, in addition to the amount of subsidiary silver coin authorized by law to be issued in redemption of the fractional currency, it shall be lawful to manufacture at the several mints and issue through the Treasury and its several offices such coin to an amount that, including the amount of subsidiary silver coin and of fractional currency outstanding, shall in the aggregate not exceed $50,000,000.

SEC. 4. That the silver bullion required for the purp se of this act shall be purchased from time to time at market rate by the Secretary of the Treasury with any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; but no purchase of bullion shall be made under this act when the market rate for the same shall be such as will not admit of the coinage and issue as herein provided without loss to the Treasury; and any gain or seigniorage arising from this coinage shall be accounted for and paid into the Treasury as provided under existing laws relative to the subsidiary coinage: Provided, That the amount of money at any one time invested in such silver bullion, exclusive of such resulting coin, shall not exceed $200,000.

Mr. REAGAN. As this report has not been printed, I desire to ask a question for information. As I understand it this silver is to be purchased by legal-tender notes, and those legal-tender notes are to be held as a separate fund until fractional notes to that amount are taken up.

Mr. PAYNE. If there shall be $6,000,000 or $10,000,000 of increased coinage of subsidiary silver, the bullion for that purpose is to be purchased by the use of this $200,000, and the coinage of that bullion and the seigniorage to be covered into the Treasury will have no connection whatever with the fractional notes or with the legal-tender notes.

In this connection I wish to state a fact of some interest to the House. The Senate had contended in their discussions, and had virtually decided, that they would not permit any increase of this subsidiary silver coinage unless for every dollar of such increased coinage put in circulation a dollar of legal-tender notes was surrendered and canceled. But the Senate have not insisted upon that before the committee of conference, and have yielded. There is therefore no connection whatever between the subsidiary silver coinage and the legal-tender notes. If there should be six millions, or eight millions, or ten millions of dollars of increased silver coinage issued under this law, there will be no corresponding reduction of legal-tender notes in consequence of that issue. That point was yielded by the Senate, and most gladly accepted by the conferees on the part of the House.

I apprehend there will be no difficulty on the part of the House in yielding a ready assent to these amendments. In regard to the other provision, relating to the silver dollar, we were unable to agree, except that a majority of the conferees on the part of the House and all the conferees on the part of the Senate agreed to drop from this bill all that related to the silver dollar. I will explain in a very few words so that it may be understood.

It will be remembered by the House that early in the session a bill was passed which recognized the old silver dollar of 1861, as a legal tender to the amount of fifty dollars. That bill was amended in the Senate by reducing the amount for which it should be a legal tender to $20. It has since transpired that it is exceedingly doubtful whether a measure can be passed through the Senate that will recognize this old silver dollar as a legal tender for more than $5. It is an ascertained fact that no bill can pass the Senate that will recognize it as a legal tender beyond $20. We were therefore met in conference with this stubborn fact: that if any provision was to be made in regard to the remonetizing, so to speak, of the old silver dollar, the amount for which it would be received as a legal tender must be reduced at least to $20, and probably to $5.

Now, the proposition introduced by the distinguished gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] who feels himself unable to agree to the action of the committee of conference, was in its general terms ill-advised as a measure upon so important a subject. I trust the House will bear with me for a few moments while I suggest some of the important features involved in the proposition to make the old silver dollar of 1861, containing 412.8 grains of silver, a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public and private.

Owing to the remarkable decline in the price of silver within the last few months, and its more remarkable decline within the last ten days, the silver dollar of 1861 is now worth less than eighty cents in gold. It will strike the mind of every gentleman that so extreme and sudden a change in the value of the silver dollar renders the proposition to make it a legal tender in the payment of all debts, public or private, a proposition of the most startling and revolutionary character.

I will not stop to dwell upon the want of definiteness and distinctness in the proviso as worded by the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] except to say that it is wholly impracticable. The proviso says that the Secretary of the Treasury shall be directed to authorize the issue of this silver dollar. It does not provide any of the details which are necessary in a statute to enable an officer to carry it out. In some way, by some general proclamation, the Secretary of the Treasury is instructed to authorize the re-issuing of the silver dollar of 1861.

Now, right here is one very important feature, and I am only submitting these suggestions to the consideration of the House as reasons why the committee could not agree in recommending the adoption of this proposition by the two Houses. Here is a profit of twenty cents on the dollar for every dollar's worth of bullion manufactured into coin and put into circulation. The Government by the power of the statute authorizes the bullion, which is the private property of an individual, to undergo manufacture at the Mint, to receive the stamp of the Government, and then to have an enforced circulation at 20 per cent. above the value of the silver bullion. Who is to have the profit of this 20 per cent. increased value? My friend from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] will say that this enforced increase of value shall inure to the benefit of the owner of the bullion, and not to the benefit of the Government; while those who look to the interests of the Government will say, and with great propriety, that this artificial or enforced increase of value to the extent of 20 per cent. given to this article of merchandise in the form of silver bullion should inure to the benefit of the Government as the power that gives this increased value; that the benefit of this increase should go into the Treasury of the nation. This question is not settled by the proviso of the gentleman from Indiana, and it is a very material one.

Another question is presented here. This silver dollar is to be made a legal tender for all debts, public and private. I grant that this comes directly to the proposition that the bondholder for his principal and his interest shall be compelled to receive this silver dollar in payment at par. I am not going to discuss that question here, for there is not time and this is not the occasion. I believe myself that legally the Government has a right to coin this silver dollar and to require the bondholder to receive it in payment of his debt. Whether it is desirable, whether it is equitable, whether it is politic is a question which needs to be discussed very seriously by this House and the Senate before such a proposition is enacted into a law.

The difficulty does not stop here. It will be observed that this silver dollar at its present discount of 20 per cent. is worth nearly 10 per cent. less than greenbacks. There is to-day $5,000,000,000 of indebtedness in this country the consideration of which was the legal-tender currency. Is this House prepared to enact by law that the creditor in those obligations shall be bound to receive his pay in a currency 10 per cent. less than that which was valid when the debt was contracted? For, although this silver dollar was a legal tender when the bonds were given, it has not been since 1873 a legal tender in payment of anything; so that every creditor who holds an obligation the consideration of which was legal-tender notes, an obligation contracted when silver was not a legal tender, would be compelled to receive in payment of this legal-tender indebtedess a currency 10 per cent. less valuable than that in which it was contracted and with which but for this legislation it must legally be discharged.

There are other questions arising in connection with this proposition. I am suggesting these considerations as showing the important features of this provision, which contemplates a reduction of 20 per cent. in the currency with which debts may be discharged. It reduces the tariff 20 per cent. the very moment it is enacted into a law. That may or may not be desirable; but it will occur to every one that this is a question to be considered, to be deliberated upon, to be discussed.

I venture to say that no member of this House or the Senate is to-day prepared to decide in this provisional, imperfect, and inconsiderate manner that this policy, to be attended with such important, vast, and vital results throughout the whole extent of the country, shall be adopted without reflection and without discussion.

There is another consideration that ought not to be overlooked. Why has this silver dollar been out of circulation since 1834? Simply because the gold dollar was relatively cheaper than the silver dollar, and for no other reason in the world. It has not been coined, it has not been kept in circulation since 1834, simply and solely for the reason that the gold dollar, being equally a legal tender, was cheaper than the silver dollar; and the cheaper currency always displaces the dearer. Now it will follow that if you adopt as a legal currency a silver dollar worth but eighty cents, as compared with the gold dollar, you will drive gold out of circulation. Within six months after a supply of silver dollars shall have been provided by the mints there will be no gold in the country. With absolute certainty it will be excluded from circulation by the cheaper currency which this provision proposes to make a legal tender in the payment of debts.

Mr. Speaker, this is all and more than I intended to say. I did not propose at all to introduce upon this report a discussion of the merits and demerits of the silver currency. My individual opinion is that silver must be made a very important instrumentality in regulating the future currency of this country. My own opinion is that during the next twelve months or two years, no subject connected with finance will press itself upon the attention of the American people and their Government so firmly and obstinately as this very question of utilizing silver or regulating the currency of the country. All that is meant by this report is that a proposition of this sort would be attended with very important consequences and that it is premature and immature legislation, which neither this House nor the Senate nor the country without further examination and discussion is prepared to adopt.

Silver is now on the decline. Within ten days it has gone down in London from fifty-two to forty-seven and one-half pence per ounce. None of us can tell where this decline is going to stop. How much further may silver be reduced in value, and how much of a depreciated standard is this country prepared to adopt as a legal tender in the payment of debts? My individual opinion is that Congress and the country should wait. Perhaps the next session will enable us to determine whether silver has reached the bottom mark, whether it has acquired a stable position, whether a standard value of silver may be adopted by Congress, not a depreciated one, not one which may perhaps be rendered unstable, if not otherwise undesirable, in consequence of the rapid fall of silver, and whether we may not give to the silver dollar a value something like that of the gold dollar, thus securing stability and with it equity between creditors and debtors everywhere.

For these reasons, thus imperfectly and summarily given to the House, the committee were unable to agree to recommend any policy in regard to the silver dollar.

It was suggested (and I suppose I am guilty of no parliamentary impropriety in saying it) that, as a matter of compromise, perhaps we could agree, the two Houses might agree, on adopting this dollar as legal tender for debts to the amount of $20; but, as the Senate unanimously insisted on not making it legal tender for duties on imports or interest on the public debt, my friend from Indiana was not satisfied by any sort of means. Nothing less than absolute legal tender for all public and private debts, in the face of the fact that probably not a single member of the other body—but I cannot judge of that, and it is merely conjectural—that not a single member of the other body was prepared to adopt it, and the House will readily see there was no agreement of opinion among us, for if we consented it should be a legal tender to $5 or $20, excepting as to duties on imports and the public debt, it accomplishes but very little. A legal tender to the amount of $5 is only a provocation, and it amounts to very little. Evidently that is not the measure of policy this House and Congress ought to adopt. When they grapple with this great question of silver currency and the silver dollar and the making it legal tender in payments of debts, I think they should take in the whole subject, looking to the widest extent to which it may be received as legal tender for payment of debts, and consider also the question whether they will have a violation of the public faith, if not of the letter of the contract yet the spirit of the contract and the expectation of the parties to the contract.

Mr. HARRISON. Will the gentleman from Ohio let me ask him a question?

Mr. PAYNE. Be very brief; I have already exceeded my time.

Mr. HARRISON. Has there not been an abnormal appreciation of gold? I use the expression abnormal not in proportion to its supply, but by reason of the demonetization of silver in European countries.

Mr. PAYNE. I understand you very well.

Mr. HARRISON. Is not the debtor injured by that appreciation which has been brought about by foreign nations throwing silver out of the money of the world?

Mr. PAYNE. I understand your question. Mr. Speaker, it will be after all but an individual opinion, an approximate opinion, and if my individual opinion is worth anything to my friend from Illinois I am very glad to give it to him.

Mr. HARRISON. It is, and I am asking you for it.

Mr. PAYNE. In my opinion there has been relatively an appreciation of gold, but no one, in my opinion; there is not a living man who can approximate an estimate of that appreciation.

Mr. HARRISON. Does not that appreciation, though, injuriously affect the debtor class?

Mr. PAYNE. Do not occupy my time, as I wish to be brief.

Mr. HARRISON. Has not that hurt the debtor class as much as the other would?

Mr. PAYNE. Not as much, but to an extent. It is in that direction undoubtedly, but there is no standard by which you can measure the appreciation or depreciation of gold. No financier has yet been able to find any standard by which he can tell whether, as compared with this period, five years hence, or five years after, there has been appreciation or depreciation of gold. No discovery has been made.

Mr. WILLARD. I should like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PAYNE. Be brief.

Mr. WILLARD. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he thinks silver has depreciated from the gold standard more than the products of industry of the country?

Mr. KASSON. Yes, it has.

Mr. PAYNE. That is opening a wide field, and a very interesting one, and I should be glad, when my time is not so brief as it is now, to enter into its discussion. Undoubtedly that is a consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Will my colleague let me make an inquiry?

Mr. PAYNE. You must be brief.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does my colleague mean to say that Government bonds may be properly paid in silver dollars? This question is not involved in this bill, nor can it be made by an amendment, since it has been decided that the report of a committee of conference cannot be amended, but as reference has been made to the question I ask my colleague for his opinion. I may say also that I do not believe it was wise to commence this silver resumption now, but since it has been commenced and threatens to result in a scarcity of change-money, I do not see any remedy but to continue it.

Mr. PAYNE. I mean to say, in my opinion, they can be legally paid in silver dollars. If the gentleman will refer to the famous law of 1869, about which a great deal has been said unfavorable as well as favorable, he will find there the solemn pledge of the Government given that the public debt shall be paid in gold or silver coin.

Mr. BRIGHT. It does not say coin; it says coin or its equivalent.

Mr. PAYNE. I must be excused from going into these collateral questions, because the time is limited in which this discussion is to take place.

I merely wish in closing to say that I have not brought out these features of this policy with the view of discussing their merits or demerits now. I think such a discussion would be out of place at present. In a matter of such vast interest, affecting every other interest in the country, affecting its honor, its credit, reaching and extending into the future for an indefinite time, it is not the place, in the shape of a sort of rider or proviso to a House amendment or a Senate amendment to a bare, simple resolution, providing for a little distribution of silver coin, to discuss the merits of these questions. And that was the view of the committee. They had no desire to belittle its importance or to evade its discussion, but they thought this was an unsuitable occasion for settling this policy.

Let a bill to establish the silver dollar as a legal tender come before the House at a proper time and in proper a shape. It has not been discussed in the House at all. Under the previous question, on motion of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS,] it was adopted as a proviso to something with which it has no sort of connection and no sort of relation, except that the word "silver" may perhaps be mentioned in both. It is for that reason, without prejudging, without forestalling an opinion on the merits of the various propositions that have been suggested, that this committee of conference have dropped this provision from their report. At the proper time they, with others, will be prepared to discuss it.

I now yield twenty minutes of my time to the gentleman from Indiana. [Mr. LANDERS.]

Mr. PHILLIPS, of Kansas. Will the gentleman from Ohio, before he resumes his seat, allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. PAYNE. After the gentleman from Indiana has spoken.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. Mr. Speaker, I do not understand the arrangement that has been made as to the disposition of time allotted to this debate. I understood the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] to say that he would occupy but ten minutes. He has now occupied thirty and parceled out to other gentlemen favoring the report so much of the remainder of the hour allotted as to allow me and my friends only twenty minutes. It was proposed that we were to have one-third of the time. I objected to that, and insisted we should have half.

Mr. PAYNE. If the House will extend the time I should be very glad.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio is entitled to an hour, during which he controls the floor; and out of sixty minutes he proposes to give twenty minutes to the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] It is within the power of the House either to extend the time, or to sustain the demand for the previous question. It is a matter for the House and not for the Chair to decide. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] is entitled to the floor.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. The House can clearly see my object in introducing this amendment; it is couched in language so plain that no man can fail to understand it. My object is to restore the silver dollar to its proper position, the position it has occupied ever since 1792, until by the action of Congress it was demonetized in 1873.

My friend from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] objects to this proposition because silver has depreciated in value, and insists that to agree to my proposition "would be a great hardship upon the creditor class." Mr. Speaker, I want to be understood here as being disposed to give every man, whether debtor or creditor, the benefit of his contract. The large portion of our debt has been created under the act of 1862. That act provided for the sale of bonds. It provided for the use of legal-tender currency and for the payment of interest on the bonds. It also provided in what way the tariff dues should be collected. It will be found by examining that act that the interest on the bonds of the Government was to be paid in coin. It also provided that the tariff dues shall be collected in coin. It provided further that the bonds should be placed on the market and sold at par for gold and silver or Treasury notes. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether or not the creditors of the Government have not obtained every privilege that belongs to them under that law?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. I suggest that the gentleman speak from the Clerk's desk, where he will be better heard by the whole House.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I prefer to speak from my seat. The gentleman will excuse me.

The creditors of the Government invariably took their option. They bought our bonds with Treasury notes when they were not worth over fifty cents on the dollar! I am not complaining of that, because it was the law; and when a man lives up to the letter of the law there is no ground for complaint. But the debtor class has an option in that law. They have a right to pay those bonds and the interest on the same either in gold or silver coin. Now it is clearly to be seen that the object of this law of 1873 was to deprive the debtor class of that right; and it is for that right I am now contending. I contend that the right which was taken from the debtor class by the act of 1873 should be again restored to them.

Did not that act repudiate the contract? Did it not say that the debtor should not have the rights that belonged to him under the contract? And is not that repudiation? It is of the same class of legislation as that of 1869. The act of 1869 was a repudiating act. It repudiated the contract, and said that the bonds should be paid in coin, which under the original contract should have been paid in lawful money. It said that hereafter they should be paid in coin alone. And now because one kind of coin is depreciating in value this bondholding class is not satisfied with the first repudiation, but come in with a second repudiating act, and declare that such silver coin shall not be regarded as money.

The object of this amendment is to prevent this second outrage and act of repudiation. Now, if the debtor class has a right to pay their debts in silver, will this Congress deny to them that right? If they have not that right and Congress should say that silver is a full legal tender, it is a question for the courts to determine, and as a matter of course they are always open to decide such questions. From the legislation of the past it would seem that the debtor class have had no friends here. Shall this thing continue? Are your constituents all creditors? Mine belong to both classes.

But the gentleman from Ohio dwells on the fact that silver has declined in value. Now, when a contract has been made and parties bound by it to pay a debt either in silver or gold coin at its fixed lawful rate, I ask if it is any fault of the debtor if either of these commodities decline in value before the debt falls due? I never heard that question raised before. Suppose a contract to be made to pay a debt in wheat or corn and the price fixed is the standard of a certain number of pounds to the bushel, and when the time for delivery arrives grain has declined in value, would any sensible or honest man say for that reason more pounds should be put into the bushel to pay the debt? There is just as much sense in one proposition as the other. Certainly your contract is not to pay in the precious metals at what they are worth at time of payment, but to pay in them at their value when the contract was made; and it would be as much an act of injustice to the people to change that standard as it would to the bondholder should they appreciate in value. But I would like the gentleman from Ohio or any other gentleman occupying the position on this question that he does to prove to this House that silver has declined and that gold has not advanced in value. I would like any gentleman to show how he would determine the question of value compared with each other. We know that they are separated and apart. Is there not just as much argument to prove that gold has advanced as that silver has declined? The argument that silver has declined is because in many governments, including our own, it has been demonetized. Has not that act alone created a greater demand for gold? The value of all commodities is regulated by supply and demand; if you cut off the demand for one and increase it for another, I ask if each would not be equally affected by the change.

The question now is whether or not we have a right to pay our debts in silver? The word coin used in all the acts authorizing the issue and sale of bonds, according to Chief Justice Chase, means "That we have two kinds of dollars; we have one dollar a paper dollar, and we have a coin dollar, which is a piece of gold or silver of a certain degree of weight and fineness." Again in the act of 1869, which was an act to explain what the language of the various acts relating to the issue of bonds meant. You will find that the word "coin" means gold and silver, and it was in consequence of the use of that language that the infamous act of 1873 was passed. I want the double standard restored, because all contracts have been made under the double standard, which has existed since the foundation of the Government. The silver dollar that we now seek to restore was inaugurated by Mr. Hamilton in 1792, and has never been changed since that day so far as the amount of pure silver it contains is concerned, while the standard of gold has been changed at least twice. The law of 1792 fixed the gold eagle at 270 grains. In 1838 it was changed to 258 grains, which is the standard at this time.

The silver dollar has been changed only in the amount of alloy and not in the amount of grains of pure silver it contains. I want gentlemen to remember that there has been more changes in the legislation of the country relating to gold than there have been in silver. And I solemnly believe that if we restore the double standard the value of the two metals would soon be equalized. If, on the contrary, you have but one standard, you have nothing left to use in its stead. Under such a policy should a demand for it come from other countries, it would go there in accordance with the laws of trade, and this country would be left without a standard, and business would go to rack and ruin in consequence. If you pass this bill making silver a full legal tender you will find, in my judgment, that in a very short time it will approximate to the value of gold.

Should the majority report be adopted, what will we have left as money? Gold! Nothing but gold to measure the value of all the property of this vast country! All its commodities and its labor be regulated by it! While to-day there is not a dollar of gold in the Treasury beyond its demand obligations. What then will be the condition of the debtor class? "I pause for a reply!"

You will find under that policy the labor of the country will come down to forty cents per day. The labor of the country is its wealth and its value is measured by its money. I have passed sleepless nights fearing that this republican policy, under the dictation of certain leaders of both parties, might be carried out under the bill reported by the majority. Our condition would be far worse than it was before the war, because then we had silver with gold in use as money. If you deprive the debtor class of that now you will be doing them a great act of injustice. If you countenance this act of repudiation for the benefit of the creditor class the people will hold every one of you to a strict account for so doing.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] be extended for ten minutes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] has ten minutes of his hour remaining.

Mr. PAYNE. I desire to use that time myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the time of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] will be extended for ten minutes.

There was no objection, and the extension of time was accordingly made.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. It is not my object to defeat this bill. I am in favor of all its provisions, but I am also in favor of the further provision to make the standard silver dollar a full legal tender. I want to say to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] that he is very much mistaken as to the temper of the Senate. When he hears from the Senate on this report, I think he will find it will be voted down. I have been assured that it will be rejected. The Senate has discussed this question thoroughly.

Mr. KASSON. I must remind the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDERS] of the rule which prohibits a reference to the action of the other body.

Mr. FORT. Why did not the gentleman interpose when the honorable gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] was threatening this House so terribly with the action of the Senate?

Mr. KASSON. Because he spoke of the conference committee, which he had a right to do.

Mr. KELLEY. He said that not a single member of the other body, referring to the Senate, were willing to adopt this measure.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. The Senate has discussed this measure quite fully, and some of its members most intelligently. While it did not receive much attention there at first, it is now receiving the respectful consideration of that body, and I am satisfied what the result will be when its action is reported on this question.

Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has nine minutes of the extension granted him by the House.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. My friend from Ohio [Mr. PAYNE] started out with ten minutes and consumed thirty. However, I will yield five minutes of my time to the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. FORT.]

Mr. FORT. Mr. Speaker, there are many things in and affected by this bill and amendments which it might be well to discuss. It occurs to me, however, that the principal question now before the House is whether silver should continue to be demonetized as a coin of the United States. If I have read and understood the laws aright, up to 1873 silver coin in standard dollars was a legal tender to any amount for all debts, both public and private, and had so been a legal tender for all debts since about the year 1792. If that be so, why was it demonetized? Let those who did it answer. It will occur to every gentleman here that all or nearly all of the public debt of this country was contracted while silver in standard dollars was a full legal tender for all sums. And nearly all the private debts of the people of this country, at least all that are three years old, were also contracted while silver in the form of silver standard dollars was a legal tender to any amount. And as a matter of course all of such debts were legally and in equity payable in silver coin of the United States. And no creditor of the Government, whether resident or foreign, could ask or expect his debt to be paid in anything better, and no private citizen had any right to demand anything else of his debtor up to that date. That had been the law of our country for more than eighty years.

With this law upon our statute-books, venerable for its age and for its distinguished paternity, our Government negotiated all its immense loans and borrowed its billions of dollars with which to carry on war and conquer peace. And in this silver coin of the standard dollar it agreed to pay the lender. And never in any one instance did it promise to pay exclusively in any other coin.

The promise was to pay in the coin of the United States where specie was mentioned at all; and in no instance did the Government promise to pay in any dearer or more precious metal.

In 1873 the law of eighty years' standing by which silver dollars had been made a legal tender was repealed. How I know not; to inquire, I have but little time. It is enough for me to know that I was not responsible for that repeal. The history of the passage of that most mischievous law may not be fully written, and some may hope that it never may be written; but by some maneuver it was done. And whether it was discussed or understood here at the time I cannot state, but I am told by gentlemen who were here that it was not. But this I do say, Mr. Speaker, and I here emphatically declare that the people of this country were not consulted about the repeal of that important and satisfactory law. It slipped through one House and then the other, as things sometimes do, and as I fear this, to my mind, most objectionable and pernicious measure will get through this House, for want of proper discussion and consideration.

Mr. LAWRENCE. Does the gentleman refer to the act of February, 1873?

Mr. FORT. I refer to the act repealing the legal-tender quality of silver in standard dollars, passed, as most bad laws do pass, near the close of the session, in February, 1873.

Mr. KASSON. I want to remind the gentleman that it was before Congress two or three sessions.

Mr. FORT. I ask the gentleman to search the records and see if that question was ever discussed in Congress. No, Mr. Speaker, it was put through under the suspension of the rules at the bidding of the bondholders and, as the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD shows, without even being read to the House. Of course I was not here at that time, but I have examined the records, and state that so far as they show the House was not advised that this old, time-honored law was even to be modified, to say nothing of its being repealed by the then pending bill.

This little mischievous law repealing the legal-tender quality of silver dollars was stolen through Congress, as I believe, by being hidden in the body of a long bill professing only to modify the coinage laws, and was not discovered by the good men who were on guard here then.

And, Mr Speaker, one thing is certain, that no matter what transpired here in Congress, the fact remains that the repeal of that old law was never discussed before the people. They were never asked to give their views upon the question or consent to repealing the legal-tender quality of silver, with the payment of which they might make good almost all their promises. Why was this repeal? I know not. It certainly was not in the interest of the tax-payers. I imagine, from the speech of the honorable gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. PAYNE,] that it must have been in the interest of somebody else than the tax-payers. Ay, Mr. Speaker, the story is told in a few words. It was in the interest of the bondholders and hence it was done.

The honorable gentleman says that silver has depreciated; that it is not honest now to compel the creditor to receive his pay in silver because it is not par with gold. This he says would be cheating our creditors. Dishonest, is it? Ah, was not silver a legal tender when he, the creditor, the bondholder, took his bond? Did he not then know that he might be lawfully and in honor paid in silver? Did he not in taking the bond assume and in like manner promise to take his pay in silver coin? I say that the tax-payer ought to hold the bondholder to his contract.

Mr. Speaker, the bargain was—because the law defining what our coin was and what its quality was was a part of the contract between the tax-payer and the bondholder—that the debt was to be paid in the coin of the United States, either silver or gold. We had, and in my judgment still ought to have, the option to pay in either. We were and are a silver-producing country; and shall we voluntarily to our own great damage yield to the desire of our creditors and pay them in the most costly metal, and thus virtually throw away one-half our precious metal so far as using it as money at least goes, the certain effect of which will be to increase the value of gold and thus increase the value of our bonds, thereby enriching foreign bankers and impoverishing ourselves, and make it more and more difficult for the people to secure the desired coin, gold, with which to pay our debts. Mr. Speaker, the position gentlemen take amazes me.

Ah, but silver has depreciated, it is said. It is not honest money. I wish to ask the honorable gentleman this question: Suppose that gold should depreciate; suppose that by the discovery of some immense bonanza in our own country or some other country gold should become so abundant as to become depreciated, what then would the gentleman do? Will he come in here with a bill in the interest of the bondholder, and say that as gold has depreciated, and that it is "dishonest money," and that we must not ask the bondholder to take his pay in gold, but that we must pay him in diamonds or some other more valuable commodity?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANDERS. I now yield the remainder of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. Is it in order to move that the time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FORT] be extended?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That can be done by unanimous consent. What extension does the gentleman propose?

Mr. FORT. I do not think that I shall require more than three minutes.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. FORT. I am very much obliged to the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. CLARK] and to the House for the courtesy.

Mr. Speaker, are we to dance to the caprice of Shylocks, and become ridiculous and run mad in trying to please our creditors, and insist on paying them more or something more valuable than we and they at the time agreed should be paid? Wherefore is it that gentlemen manifest so much interest in our creditors and so little in ourselves? They bought our bonds at greatly depreciated rates. Our bonds have appreciated, and are worth from 25 to 50 per cent. more than we got for them. We do not complain of that, but are willing to pay them in full in the same metal mentioned expressly and by implication in the contract. And now that the bonds have appreciated and that gold has also appreciated, we are asked, and by our own countrymen, too, to purchase the most costly metal and pay with it, and to abandon silver—our own most abundant product—as money, and not ask our creditors to take it as pay, although they agreed to do so.

Sir, we all profess to be desirous to return to specie payments, do we not? For one, that is my earnest desire. I may not be so very anxious about it as some of my friends farther East; but I wish to reach a specie basis as soon as possible by the road of economy and prosperity. I would do nothing to delay the coming of that day when a greenback shall be par. And we all wish to pay all our demands in coin as soon as we can consistent with national prosperity. Now I ask gentlemen to consider this question: If we discard this vast volume of precious metal which can be coined into money, and thereby reduce our means at least one-half and thereby make it impossible to resume as soon by perhaps years, are we not then traveling from resumption, and not toward it? How can we resume without precious metal and what have we to gain by discarding one-half of what we have?

Gentlemen are certainly hard to please. The greenback is not good enough for a domestic currency because they say it is below gold. Silver is not good enough for the bondholder because it is depreciated below gold and is not honest money.

But, Mr. Speaker, by demonetizing silver they are appreciating gold and making it more dear and still widening the margin between it and the greenback, and making it that much harder to resume, and putting off the desired day that much longer. Are you not, gentlemen, in fact doing all you can to retard resumption, as you certainly are doing all you can to increase our debt and making it harder to pay, and placing so much more burden upon an overloaded people? I beg gentlemen to pause and consider.

By demonetizing silver you throw away one-half your means essential to resume specie payment. Will some financier tell me how he expects to reach specie payments thereby?

Ah, Mr. Speaker, I hope for no resumption by this road, and, with all respect to the gentleman, say that, in my judgment, that result will not be promoted by this measure.

In my judgment there is a conflict now pending between the debtor and creditor classes, and the creditor class has secured the first advantage by demonetizing silver, thus making bonds and other evidences of indebtedness so much the more valuable and also depriving the debtor class of that much of their means to pay.

Property may rise and fall in value, but indebtedness remains at the same amount, measured by dollars and cents. And so it is that the creditor gains by the value of the dollar. If that class can by any means or measure increase the value of money they increase the value of their notes and bonds, and so in this case if they can dethrone silver they reduce the volume of coin, and of course render the remaining quantity, which would be gold, by so much the more valuable.

Mr. Speaker, in my humble judgment, the most gigantic scheme ever organized has been set on foot all over the world by the Rothschilds and others of the creditor class to double their own enormous wealth and to double the debts of the debtor class. The promise to pay is so many dollars, and the value of the dollar doubled, and you have the result as stated. Mr. Speaker, why is it that our countrymen, of all other people, are to be the greatest losers by this unholy scheme? Why is it, I earnestly ask, do they join the conspirators, and help thus to bind the helpless and aggrandize the money kings of Europe?

Mr. Speaker, the silver dollar was the first legal-tender coin we ever had. About the year 1792 the Hamiltonian dollar was authorized by law, and was made of the same value as the Spanish milled dollar then in circulation here. It remained our only dollar, and it was not till long after the beginning of the present century that we had any gold coin of our own, when the coinage of the eagle and half eagle was authorized, the dollar being the unit and the standard of value all this time and up to and till the lamented repeal of its legal-tender quality. And now it is by the wise men of our day degraded and dishonored for all sums over $5; and I would ask, why have you left it a legal tender for any sum if it is so dishonored, so dishonest? I presume the gentleman will say, O well, it will do to pay off small debts; do to pay for a day's labor; do to pay small tradesmen with.

Ah, Mr. Speaker, if it is good enough to pay the poor hired girl for a week's work or good enough to pay the laboring-man for a day's work, is it not good enough to pay the bondholder, inasmuch as he agreed to take it? Mr. Speaker, this cry of dishonest money will not do for all ears. If it is dishonest money why will gentlemen pay it out for honest labor? The poor man must take it. It is a legal tender for him; but the rich having large amounts must have better money. This doctrine of the distinguished gentleman, with all respect to him personally, I may be allowed to characterize as monstrous. The purchaser of real estate or any other valuable thing must take it subject to the chances as to whether it shall rise or fall in value. And so it should be with bonds, bills, or gold, or silver. Congress cannot stand ready to regulate the value of one to suit the other.

Mr. Speaker, I have no prejudice against the bondholders; none in the world. I have none against anybody. They got our bonds cheap; they have made a handsome profit in their advance, and ought to be content; and, so far as I am concerned, they must be. I would pay them all we owe them according to the bond and the contract, and nothing more. We have some rights reserved to ourselves, and, for one, I am not willing to yield them; not willing to pay them so many millions more than we agreed to pay. And, more than all, I am not willing to reduce our volume of money by dishonoring all the silver we have and all our mines may produce.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that if we are disposed to resume specie payments we should hold all our resources ready to subserve that end. If we can redeem our paper currency in any kind of precious metal, is it not best to reserve the right to do so? Should we demonetize and discard that metal of which we have most and which our country produces? Let it be understood here in this House to-day that he who votes to sustain this report of this committee votes to continue demonetization of silver coin, and that he votes to deprive the Government that much of its wealth and of its ability to meet its demands, that much of its ability to redeem the legal-tender notes and pay its bonds in coin. He who votes to disagree to this report votes, in my judgment, to retain all that we have with which we can make good our promises and votes to promote the prosperity of the country.

Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that our duty is plain; that we should retain within our control every means we have to redeem the promises we have made; and, mark you, every dollar of indebtedness which this Government owes was contracted when the silver dollar of standard value of 371¼ grains was a legal tender; and every bondholder who bought a bond at from fifty to seventy-five cents on the dollar took the bond with the understanding and agreement that he might be, and in all probability would be, compelled to take his pay in silver coin of the United States. Why is it that gentlemen from the East come in here and so eagerly insist that we must pay our debts in a better and more valuable coin than that in which they were contracted to be paid?

Mr. MACDOUGALL. Will the gentleman from Illinois tell us what bonds of the Government were taken at forty cents on the dollar?

Mr. FORT. The gentleman very well knows that many of our bonds were sold upon the market when gold for greenbacks was at 150, 200, and 240 in greenbacks; but we do not complain of that. The bonds have appreciated, and now the bondholder ought to take the same coin he agreed to take.

Mr. KELLEY. Two hundred and eighty.

Mr. FORT. Yes; 280, as the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania suggests; those bonds were paid for in greenbacks. We are now asked to pay those bonds not in silver but in something more valuable; they want them paid in gold. We are told that silver is not good enough for the bondholder. Mr. Speaker, it is singular that the Government, and in fact the debtors as a class, come out second best in all these contests; and I doubt not that if gold should for any reason depreciate a few cents these same gentlemen would be here eloquently and persistently demanding that the Government must make good to them the depreciation, having their bond for the pound of flesh, that they must have it nearest the heart.

Mr. MACDOUGALL. When gold was at 240, what were greenbacks?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I yield now the balance of my time to the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. BRIGHT.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee has five minutes of the original time of the gentleman from Indiana, [Mr. LANDERS.] More than an hour has expired, and gentlemen have been speaking by consent of the House.

Mr. BRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, it will be impossible within five minutes to enter upon the discussion of this question. I can only throw out a few suggestive thoughts.

Mr. LANDERS, of Indiana. I move that the time for discussion be extended one hour, to be divided into five-minute speeches.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will state that unless the previous question is called and sustained at the close of the hour of the gentleman from Ohio, discussion may be extended indefinitely. It depends entirely on the action of the House. As the hour has not yet expired it is better not to anticipate it.

Mr. BRIGHT Mr. Speaker, I will state to the House that there are some profound questions connected with the subject of the demonetization of silver, and there is great propriety in its restoration to its ancient place. It will be remembered, sir, that there is an implied recognition in the Constitution of the United States that gold and silver should both be the standard coins of the United States. In the analysis and discussion of this subject by the old statesmen they clearly demonstrated that the States made a surrender of the question of coinage and the regulation of the value of coins to the Government of the United States with the understanding that the double standard of gold and silver should remain with them.

And now the question is presented, Mr. Speaker, why is it that the Constitution of our country has been invaded and one of the most important rights of the States and people has been stricken down by congressional legislation? Was this question ever submitted to them? Never. Were they consulted about it in any popular canvass? Never. Then why is it when they are oppressed, burdened, tax-ridden, bled almost to death by taxation, you deprive them of one of the constitutional means of discharging their obligations to the creditor? What would you think, Mr. Speaker, of the guardian who intending to discharge the obligation of his ward should pay twofold the value of that obligation when he could have discharged it for one-half? What would equity, what would the courts of the country say? They would deprive him of his fiduciary relation and substitute another who understood the relation better and would discharge the obligation fairly.

Now, it was admitted by Mr. Calhoun, by Mr. Benton, and by all the old statesmen, that gold and silver should be the currency and legal tender of the United States. I have the authority before me, and will quote a few of them on the subject:

* * * He (Mr. Benton) fully concurred with the Senator from South Carolina (Mr. Calhoun) that gold in the United States ought to be the preferred metal; not that silver should be expelled but both retained; the mistake, if any, to be in favor of gold instead of being against it. Mr. Benton believed that it was the intention and declared meaning of the Constitution that foreign coins should pass currently as money and at their full value within the United States; that it was the duty of Congress to promote the circulation of these coins by giving them their full value; that this was the design of the States in conferring upon Congress the exclusive power of regulating the value of these coins; that all the laws of Congress for preventing the circulation of foreign coins and underrating their value were so many breaches of the Constitution, and so many mischiefs inflicted upon the States; and that it was the bounden duty of Congress to repeal all such laws; and to restore foreign coins to the same free and favored circulation which they possessed when the Federal Constitution was adopted.

* * * * * * *

He denounced this exclusion of foreign coins as a fraud, and a fraud of the most injurious nature, upon the people of the States. The States had surrendered their power over the coinage to Congress; they made the surrender in language which clearly implied that their currency of foreign coins was to be continued to them; yet that currency is suppressed; a currency of intrinsic value for which they paid interest to nobody is suppressed.—Benton's Thirty Years' View, pages 444, 446.

Thus it appears, sir, that when the States surrendered the power to the General Government of regulating coins and coinage it was with the implication that all the avenues of commerce should be so kept open that foreign coins should be permitted to flow in and the people should be permitted to avail themselves of that privilege; and why is it now that foreign coins are demonetized in like manner, and you are narrowing the means of discharging the obligations of the people down to a single standard? Sir, it is discrimination in favor of domestic and foreign bondholders against the tax-payers of our country.
